

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

HOMICIDE—CONSPIRACY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a prosecution for murder, the giving of an instruction on conspiracy between defendant and another, though correct as an abstract proposition, held error, in that the evidence did not show any conspiracy or combination.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Watauga County; Long, Judge.

Clarence Potter was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Bower, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

MONTGOMERY, J. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree of A. W. Howell at spring term, 1903, of the superior court of Watauga county. There was evidence on the part of the state tending to show that a warrant was issued by a justice of the peace, and placed in the hands of Calvin Turnmire, a constable, to be served on the prisoner, and that another warrant, issued by a justice of the peace named Smith, in which the prisoner and Boone Potter, his near kinsman, were intended to be charged with a forcible trespass, was placed in the hands of the deceased as a specially deputized officer for service on the accused; that Turnmire and the deceased, together with Will Hamby, Joe Wilson, and June Snider, on the night before the homicide, met and stayed all night in the house of a man by the name of Hodges, a short distance from a saw-mill where it was anticipated that Clarence and Boone Potter would bring saw logs to the mill; that on the early morning of the next day, the 5th of November, Clarence and Boone arrived with a load of logs on a wagon drawn by four mules, whereupon Turnmire, who testified that he had summoned Hamby to assist him in the arrest of Clarence, while the deceased and the others (Wilson and Snider) were to arrest Boone, walked up to Clarence and told him that he had a warrant for him; that Hamby read the warrant to Clarence, who was standing behind the wagon, and about 15 or 20 paces from Boone, who was in front of the lead mule; that Hamby, when he read the warrant in an ordinary tone, had his back towards Boone, and that, just about the time of the conclusion of the reading of the warrant by Hamby to Clarence, Boone came around to Clarence and said, "Come on, cousin," whereupon both mounted the wagon and drove rapidly off down the road toward their home. There was no evidence that either one of the party had said a word about the arrest of Boone before the wagon was driven off. The whole posse overtook and headed off the team, after having given chase for about 300 yards, at a branch or creek that crossed the road. The witnesses for the state testified that the deceased, with a pistol in one hand, and the warrant plainly visible in the other, headed off Boone, who was driving the team, at the same time demanding his surrender and notifying him that he had a warrant for his arrest; that thereupon Clarence, who was on the other side of the team, handed his pistol across the hind mule to Boone, who thereupon shot the deceased in the arm and breast, while almost at the same time the prisoner, Clarence, struck the deceased on the forehead with a large stone. The prisoner testified that the deceased fired at Boone first. Howell died three days afterwards. Four physicians were examined, but we can get very little out of their evidence, except that either wound might have caused the death.

The case was tried with great care by his honor, and with marked ability he instructed the jury upon the many perplexing and important features of the case. In one aspect of the case, however, his honor committed an error; that error being founded on a mistaken view of the nature of certain of the evidence. His honor, in stating the contention of the state, used this language: "Upon this indictment the state first maintains that the prisoner is guilty of murder in the first degree; that he maliciously and feloniously, and with premeditation and deliberation, slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, or aided, assisted, and helped to do it, or conspired, co-operated, and acted in concert with Boone Potter in thus slaying the deceased." It is to be seen, from the contention of the state, that a conspiracy on the part of Boone and the prisoner to kill the deceased was one ground upon which the state relied to show deliberation and premeditation on the part of the prisoner, and on that point his honor instructed the jury: "You are instructed further that the burden is upon the state to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt not only that the killing was done by the prisoner, or by his assistance, aid, help, and assent, or in consequence of concert and conspiracy with another [the word "conspiracy" italicized by us], but also with deliberation and premeditation. * * * And if you find that the prisoner slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, or that he conspired with or aided and abetted Boone in doing the killing with a deadly weapon, you will examine all the evidence and circumstances, and say whether you are satisfied from them that the killing was done with premeditation and deliberation; and, if you so find, you will find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree." His honor, to make clearer his meaning in connection with that part of his charge, said: "In other words, if the state has shown beyond a reasonable doubt, and you so find, that the deceased and those associated with him had a lawful warrant from a justice of the peace to arrest Clarence Potter, the prisoner, and also a lawful warrant to arrest Boone Potter, for shooting into and breaking into a house, and, on the day the deceased was injured, the deceased and the posse with him, duly summoned for the purpose, and acting with him as such posse, read the warrant to Clarence, and notified him to consider himself under arrest, and that this was done openly, in the daytime, within about 15 paces of Boone Potter; and you further find that Clarence failed to submit to the arrest, but, under a suggestion of Boone, got on the wagon then and there hitched, and under their control, and hurriedly drove away; and you further find that the deceased and his associates, with their warrants, pursued and overtook them, and Clarence and Boone and their associate, Heck, at the branch, and that thereupon the deceased, with the warrant open in his hand, notified Boone that he had a warrant for him, in hearing distance of Boone and Clarence, and, by declarations made by the deceased or the posse, both Boone and Clarence were fixed with the knowledge that the deceased and his associates were clothed with a warrant to arrest Boone; and you find that Boone hastily descended from the wagon on one side, and Clarence on the other, and, by preconcert and understanding and agreement between themselves, the prisoner handed Boone a pistol over the mules, in consequence of words or motions between themselves, and thereupon Boone deliberately and premeditatedly shot at the deceased twice in rapid succession, with the deliberate intention to take his life; and you find that the death of the deceased ensued from the wound inflicted—Boone Potter would be guilty of murder in the first degree. And if, in addition to the foregoing facts, you find that Clarence understood that the officers had a warrant for himself, and had read it to him, and that he was there engaged in escaping from the officers, and that Boone understood this, and that they were acting in concert in flight; and you find that Boone and Clarence, from their acts and conduct, were acting in concert throughout, and both had predetermined and agreed to resist arrest to the extent to take the life of any one of the officers authorized to execute the warrant, and with premeditated and deliberate purpose to resist the arrest of Boone by the deceased or his associates, or the arrest of himself, the object of the officers being known, and with a premeditated purpose to kill to effect their purpose, and in pursuance of this purpose he handed Boone the pistol to kill the deceased, and Boone shot the deceased with the pistol, and thereby inflicted injuries from which the deceased died—the prisoner is guilty of murder in the first degree, and you will so find." It is clearly to be seen, from his honor's instruction, that he not only regarded what occurred at the sawmill at the time the officers attempted to arrest Clarence as evidence tending to show a part of a conspiracy between Boone and Clarence to resist the officers, even if it became necessary to kill one or all of them, but he carefully recited to the jury all the incidents connected with the attempted arrest. We cannot agree with his honor that the facts connected with the attempted arrest at the sawmill furnished any evidence whatsoever of a conspiracy to kill one or all of the officers, or any one of the posse. Boone, by all of the evidence, did not know, at the sawmill, and at the time of the attempted arrest of Clarence, that any warrant had been issued for him. It seems that the jury believed that Boone heard the warrant read to Clarence, although he was 15 or 20 paces off, with a wagon and four mules between him and Hamby, who read the warrant, and Hamby speaking in an ordinary tone, and with his back towards Boone; but that evidence having been believed by the jury, though it might have been sufficient to justify them in finding that there was an agreement between Boone and the prisoner, entered into at the very time of the arrest of Clarence, to effect the escape of Clarence, it certainly, in our judgment, was not evidence of a conspiracy to kill the deceased or any member of the posse. In fact, the witnesses for the state showed that neither Boone nor Clarence had made any preparations to use Clarence's pistol on the occasion before the arrival of the party at the branch, where the team was headed off. Neither Boone nor the prisoner had heard anything of the warrants, or the preparations to arrest either Boone or Clarence, before their arrival at the sawmill; and at the branch, Clarence's pistol was between his overalls and his trousers, and his suspender had to be unbuttoned before he could get the pistol out. All of which goes to show that not until the parties left the sawmill was there any preparation made to use the pistol.

As we have said, this case was conducted by his honor with marked ability, and, so far as his connection with the making up of the case on appeal is concerned, all is correct; but the remainder of the record comes before us in poor shape. In many parts of the evidence bearing on vital points of the case, we are at a loss to understand what the witnesses said. Then there are hyphens and blank spaces and inconsistent words, confusing to the understanding. This is especially so in respect to the two warrants said to have been issued for the prisoner and Boone. Those papers are referred to as Exhibits A and B, but they are nowhere to be seen in the record. They are not alleged to have been lost, and no proof of their contents is offered.

For the one error pointed out, there must be a new trial.

CONNOR, J. (concurring). I would be content to concur in the opinion written by Mr. Justice MONTGOMERY, without saying more, but for the fact that my understanding of the testimony is so entirely different from that of the Chief Justice, as set out in his dissenting opinion, that I feel constrained to give my reasons for concurring in the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the court. If I understood the facts as does the Chief Justice, I should not hesitate to concur in his conclusions as to the law. It is a source of regret to me that it is sought to place the majority of the court in the position, from the viewpoint of the Chief Justice, of giving encouragement to the commissions of murders in this state. As I gather the transactions from the state's witnesses, Turnmire had a warrant for the arrest of the defendant for a misdemeanor, and the deceased, Howell, had a warrant for the arrest of Boone Potter. There was much controversy as to the regularity of the warrant and the deputation to Howell, and, although these warrants were used upon the trial, and are referred to in the testimony as Exhibits A and B, they are not attached to the record in the case, and we are unable to pass upon their regularity. Defendant is a young man of 19 years, uneducated. Boone Potter, it seems, was older. They are cousins. They were engaged in hauling logs to a sawmill. On the night prior to the homicide, Turnmire and Howell collected a posse, composed of one Joseph Wilson, who said that he had served a term of eight years in the penitentiary, Hamby, and Snider, at the house of one Hodges. On the morning of the homicide they went to the mill, and in a short time the defendant and Boone Potter drove up with their wagon. Turnmire and Hamby called the defendant out to one side, four or five steps from the wagon, and told him that they had a warrant for him. Hamby's account of the transaction at this point was as follows: "Defendant said, 'All right.' Turnmire handed warrant to me, and told me to read it, and I read it. Defendant two feet from me. I read it in common tone. Boone was then fifteen steps off. Had my back to Boone. Defendant said: 'I cannot have my trial to-day. I have got to help Boone haul logs.' Defendant asked Turnmire to file bond. Turnmire said: 'Yes; we will do what is right.' Defendant asked if he would take his father on bond. He said: 'Yes; anybody most.'" The defendant's testimony upon this point is as follows: "On night prior to the homicide, was at Boone Potter's. Lived there. Worked for him. He was logging. Took log to mill on that morning. Turnmire told me they had warrant for me. I asked him to let me change some clothes. He gave me leave. I asked him if he'd take father on my bond, and he said, 'Yes.' It was raining, I wanted dry clothes. He said, 'All right.' I got on the wagon. I thought [he] was coming on. We got on wagon and started towards home. Sorter rainy. Boone trotted off. When he is not loaded, drives fast." Hamby says: "I heard Boone talking, and we come to where Wilson, Howell, and Snider were. Could not hear what Boone said until after I turned round. He said, 'Go down with me, cousin.' Bounced upon wagon, and told Clarence to come on. Defendant slipped on wagon as Boone started off in a trot. Boone began whipping mules. Am kin to Boone and Clarence by marriage. I said to Howell: 'Now, what are you going to do? We will run on down and arrest them.' We ran on down to where they crossed the creek, Howell in front." There was no evidence that a word was said to Boone about the warrant for him, or that he knew that there was such a warrant, or a warrant for defendant; nor is there any evidence that the defendant knew that deceased had a warrant for Boone. There seems to be no substantial difference in the testimony in regard to what occurred at the time of the homicide. After the wagon drove off, some of the witnesses used the term, "The mules loped down the hill." The deceased and his posse ran after them. The mules at the foot of the hill came to a stop, when the homicide occurred in the manner set forth in the opinion of the court. The portion of his honor's charge to which defendant excepted, and which exception, I think, should be sustained, is as follows: After saying to the jury that if they found certain conditions, etc., his honor said: "And if, in addition to the foregoing facts, you find that Clarence understood that the officers had a warrant for himself, and had read it to him, and that he was then engaged in escaping from the officers, and that Boone understood this, and that they were acting in concert in flight; and you find that Boone and Clarence were acting in concert throughout, and that both had predetermined and agreed to resist arrest to the extent of taking the life of any one of the officers authorized to execute the warrant, and, with premeditation and deliberation, purposed to resist the arrest of Boone by the deceased or his associates, or an arrest of himself, the object of the officers being known, and with the premeditated purpose to kill to effect their purpose, and in pursuance of this purpose he handed Boone the pistol to kill the deceased, and that Boone shot the deceased with the pistol, and thereby inflicted injuries from which deceased died—the prisoner is guilty of murder in the first degree, and you will so find.” There can be no question that the law as laid down by his honor is correct, but I cannot find in the testimony any evidence to support the theory submitted to the jury, that Boone and the defendant had formed and preconceived a purpose to resist arrest to the extent of taking the life of the officers or their associates. I can find no testimony tending to show that Boone had any knowledge that the deceased had a warrant for him, or that Clarence had any such knowledge; nor can I see any evidence that Clarence was attempting to escape arrest. Taking the testimony of the state's witnesses and of the defendant, which in no material respect contradicts them, I can see nothing in the conduct of Clarence at the time the warrant was read to him indicating a purpose to resist the arrest. His suggestion to the officer to give his father as security, followed by the officer's acceptance of the suggestion, excludes, to my mind, any possible theory of a purpose on his part to resist an arrest. No witness says that Boone heard, or could have heard, the conversation between Turnmire, Hamby, and Clarence. His conduct appears to me to be entirely consistent with that of a man in his station in life, making his daily bread by his labor. He had unloaded his wagon, and I can see nothing in his conduct inconsistent with what might have been expected of a man of his occupation. It is not denied that it was a rainy day. As he drove off, he went down hill. The fact that he hit his mules with his whip, and that they loped off, does not impress my mind with any purpose to escape the posse or officers, in the absence of any evidence that he knew or suspected that they had any warrant for him. If I am correct in my conclusion that there was no evidence to sustain the theory of a preconceived purpose between the defendant and Boone Potter to escape arrest, to the extent of taking the life of the officers, then such theory should not have been submitted to the jury. This is elementary. I do not undertake to say that at the time of the homicide there was no evidence of premeditation. The doctrine of instantaneous premeditation seems to be well established by this court, and, in deference to the opinions of the eminent judges who have preceded me, I have given it my approval in the disposition of appeals which have come before us. In the light of these decisions, it was not error in his honor to leave the question to the jury whether the homicide was the result of premeditation. I do not think that the defendant should have been required to carry with him to the jury the theory of a preconceived purpose, in combination with Boone, to resist arrest to the extent of taking the life of the officer or his associates. Upon his own showing, this uneducated young mountaineer, before reaching his majority, is guilty of murder in the second degree. It is more than probable that at the best he will forfeit to the state more than a score of years of his freedom. I make no comment on the unfortunate man who lost his life. Whether he was a “brave officer” or not, I do not know; and I forbear saying more, upon the record before us, than that it is fortunate for the administration of our criminal law that it is not the custom to proceed as these men did in the arrest of persons charged with violating the law. I cannot think, from his own testimony, that the majesty of the law was promoted, or respect for it increased, by the services of the witness Wilson. But these are not questions before us. I cannot but regret that it so frequently occurs that such widely divergent views exist in this court in regard to the plainest principles of the criminal law. I am sure that each member of this court is prompted by no other motive or purpose than to declare the law as he believes it to be, and as befits a judge. Certainly the state has made ample provision for the protection of her officers in the discharge of their duties, and I am sure that the judges of the superior court and of this court do all in their power to enforce the law in this respect. This defendant is, upon his own testimony, guilty of murder. A jury may upon another trial find him guilty of the capital felony. This will be for the jury. I express no opinion in respect to their duty. I simply give expression to my conviction that there was no evidence that the homicide was the result of a preconceived purpose between the two men engaged in the affair to resist arrest to the extent of taking the life of the officer.

WALKER, J. (concurring). I concur in the opinion of the court as delivered by Justice MONTGOMERY, and also in the opinion of Justice CONNOR, as his views in regard to one aspect of this case, which are therein fully and clearly expressed, coincide with mine, and I shall add but a few words to what he has so well said. The learned and able judge who presided at the trial of this case charged the jury correctly as to the law of “premeditation and deliberation,” so far as the charge was confined to what occurred at the branch, when Boone Potter and the defendant were overtaken by the posse; but he fell into error, I think, when he added: "If, in addition to the foregoing facts, you find that Clarence understood that the officers had a warrant for himself, and had read it to him, and that he was then engaged in escaping from the officers, and that Boone understood this, and that they were acting in concert in flight; and you find that Boone and Clarence, from their acts and conduct, were acting in concert throughout, and both had predetermined and agreed to resist arrest to the extent of taking the life of any one of the officers, being known, and with a premeditated purpose to kill to effect their purpose, and in pursuance of this purpose he handed Boone the pistol to kill the deceased, and Boone shot the deceased with the pistol, and thereby inflicted injuries from which the deceased died—the prisoner is guilty of murder in the first degree, and you will so find." There was no evidence whatever as to any preconceived design to resist arrest prior to the time the officers overtook and stopped them at the branch. Indeed, the evidence as to the transactions up to that time tended to prove directly the contrary. I do not think it can be successfully contended that the two men had conceived the purpose to resist arrest when they were driving away from the officers, and in the direction of their home, with all possible speed. Ever if Clarence had not supposed that his offer to give his father as bail was satisfactory (and there is evidence to show that he did think it had been accepted), and even if Boone Potter was aware of what had taken place between Clarence and the officers, and thought that they had attempted to arrest him, and if the two were not merely returning to their home, as they supposed they had a right to do, but were attempting to escape from the officers, I yet do not think that the instruction which I have quoted from the charge of the court was correct. There is a vast difference, in law, between trying to escape arrest, and forming a conspiracy or preconceived design to resist it. The rights of the parties in the two cases given are essentially different, and this difference we stated fully at the last term in Sossamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757. There is no proof in the case of anything said or done by the Potters when they were driving towards the branch that has the slightest tendency to show a preconceived design to resist arrest, and, this being so, it only remains to be considered whether the instruction was calculated to prejudice the defendant. It is hardly necessary to argue this question, as the harm to the defendant is perfectly apparent on the face of the instruction. Nothing can be more prejudicial than a charge to the jury to convict, based upon a theory not supported by the evidence. State v. Smith, 125 N. C. 615, 34 S. E. 235

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The prisoner is not indicted for or convicted of conspiracy, but of murder. His honor told the jury that "the burden is upon the state to satisfy the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, not only that the killing was done by the prisoner, or by his assistance, aid, help, and assent, or in consequence of concert and conspiracy with another, but also with deliberation and premeditation; * * * and if you find that the prisoner slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, or that he conspired with or aided and abetted Boone in doing the killing with a deadly weapon, you will examine all the evidence and circumstances, and say whether you are satisfied from them that the killing was done with premeditation and deliberation, and, if you so find, you will find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree." It would be difficult to make the charge more absolutely in accordance with the precedents. The learned and accurate judge was not charging upon an indictment for conspiracy, nor telling the jury what would amount to a conspiracy. He recited the evidence, as it was his duty to do, but impartially and fairly. It was in evidence that, when the summons was served upon the prisoner, Boone, who was near by, called to the prisoner to jump on the wagon, and immediately the horses were put into a lope down the hill, and this by men both of whom had been evading arrest; that the deceased officer and his posse started after them and headed them off, and, with his warrant in one hand, and pistol in the other, the deceased, who, as an officer, had a right to carry the pistol, ordered Boone to stop. Then Boone Potter said to prisoner, "Shoot, or give me the pistol," and motioned to the prisoner to hand him the pistol, and he did so, whereupon Boone fired at the officer. This was sufficient aiding and abetting, combining and conspiring, to make the prisoner guilty, whether (as is doubtful) the prisoner or Boone killed the deceased. Though the judge recited the evidence, as it was his duty to do, he did not, as the opinion assumes, tell the jury that the action in putting the horses into a lope was a conspiracy or combination, nor could the court tell them it was, nor that it was not. The remark, "Shoot, or give me the pistol," is certainly some evidence, taken with the other circumstances, of a combination or conspiracy—the pursuit of a common design. That was for the jury to consider, for the jury also alone could say whether Boone knew the warrant had been served on Clarence, as he had the opportunity to do (State v. Bowman, 80 N. C. 432; State v. Perkins, 10 N. C. 377), and was acting in concert in the flight. The motion for the pistol, the accompanying remark, and the handing it over under the circumstances, the immediate use of it by Boone, and the prisoner joining in the attack with a rock, certainly constituted some evidence (and very strong evidence) of aiding, abetting, combining, and conspiring; and, if there was any evidence, it was properly left to the jury. The court told the jury that they should examine the evidence, and if, "upon all the evidence and circumstances, the jury was satisfied of premeditation and deliberation," etc. Upon all the authorities, unless they are to be overruled, a moment of premeditation, no matter how brief, is sufficient, if the jury find that there was premeditation and deliberation. State v. Dowden, 118 N. C. 1145, 24 S. E. 722, and numerous cases since.

The deceased was an officer bravely and faithfully trying to obey the process which his state had put into his hands to be served. The prisoner and Boone were defendants in that warrant, resisting the power of the state. When halted, and the process shown him, Boone motions to the prisoner to hand him his pistol. He evidently knew the prisoner had it. The latter hands it over, and for use on the deceased, as the jury had a right to infer. Boone fires upon the officer because he was trying to serve the warrant, and the prisoner joins in the assault upon the officer with a stone. Which caused the death is immaterial. There was a joint action—a combination and conspiracy in the doing the unlawful act. There was no self-defense or manslaughter, as the jury found the facts to be; and the jury having found, as the judge instructed them was necessary, first, that there was joint action, by aiding, abetting, or combining and conspiring, and then, further, that the killing was done with premeditation and deliberation, there could be no other verdict than murder in the first degree. If there is no liability to capital punishment for taking the life of an officer under the circumstances of this case, then the only safe method of serving process on those defying the state's authority will be service by mail or with a shotgun; and the Legislature should so provide, authorizing the officer to fire first. The life of the officer is worth at least as much to the state and to his family and friends as that of the defiant lawbreaker, and the life of the latter is not the only one that should be regarded with tenderness in the administration of the law. The Legislature, in its wisdom, can abolish capital punishment except when the killing has been done by lying in wait or poisoning (and, indeed, in all cases), but it has not seen fit to do so. No case could be presented more strongly demanding the capital sentence of the law than this, where two men, who had been defying the law and the service of its precepts, are halted by an officer with the state's process in his hand, and one of them motions to the prisoner for his pistol, which is passed over to him by the prisoner, and both unite with pistol and rock in taking the officer's life, for no other cause than he was there honestly, faithfully endeavoring to obey the trust the state had confided in him. Is the state not strong enough, is it not just enough, to vindicate its majesty, and execute the law against the willful murderer of its own officer when its process is thus defied, and its officer slain, without provocation or excuse, for no fault save that he was endeavoring to do his sworn duty? Shall the condition of him who defies the law be so far better than that of him who shall attempt to execute it that the officer may lose his life, but the lawbreaker cannot? That state certainly cannot have faithful service which is more tender of the life of him who resists and slays an officer in the discharge of duty than careful to throw the terror of its power as a shield around the officer who would execute its orders.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—REVERSAL—ERROR OF RECORD—MISPRISON—CERTIORARI—REHEARING—SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION.

1. Where, on appeal from a conviction of rape, the judgment was reversed on the ground that the indictment, as shown in the record, failed to contain an allegation that the crime was committed against the will of the prosecutrix, and it thereafter appeared that such allegation was in fact contained in the indictment, but was omitted from the record by the misprision of the clerk, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction, after the term at which the judgment was reversed, to grant a writ of certiorari for the correction of the record, and reset the case for hearing on the exceptions taken at the trial.

Douglas and Walker, JJ., dissenting.

John Marsh was convicted of rape, and he appealed. On motion by the state for writ of certiorari, after reversal, to correct the record, and for rehearing. Motion granted.

See 43 S. E. 828.

Armfield & Williams and Redwine & Stack, for appellant. The Attorney General and Adams & Jerome, for the State.

OLARK, C. J. This case was before us at last term. 132 N. C. 1000, 43 S. E. 828. There were numerous exceptions, none of which were considered, because a motion in arrest of judgment was made and allowed for the absence from the indictment (for rape), as sent up in the record, of the words "against her will." This objection was not taken below. It now appears, by the inspection of the indictment by the judge below, and his finding of fact thereon, that those words were in fact in the indictment as found by the grand jury, and upon which the prisoner was tried, and were omitted by the clerk in making up the record. This case has therefore not been before us, and the state asks for the correction of the indictment by a certiorari to insert the words omitted by the clerk, and that the case may be argued upon the record, and the exceptions taken at the trial.

If this were an application to rehear a criminal cause, the court would not entertain it. State v. Council, 129 N. C. 511, 39 S. E. 814, and cases there cited. A rehearing is based on an allegation that the court committed an error of law in the previous opinion, and asks the reconsideration of that opinion. It is an appeal from the court to itself, on the ground of error in its rulings of law, just as an appeal is taken from the superior court. Here there was no error of law. The decision at last term is correct, as the record stood. This is a motion to correct the record to speak the truth, and to place the true record before us for the first time, and to consider the exceptions taken, they not having been passed on. The same point, after similar action upon an untrue record caused by the false certificate of the clerk of the lower court, has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of Florida, and the motion to restore the cause to the docket allowed (Lovett v. State, 29 Fla. 384, 11 South. 176), in an able and well-considered opinion by Chief Justice Rainey. In that case a new trial had been granted on the ground that the record in a trial for murder did not show that the prisoner was personally present at the trial. Subsequently, it being made to appear to the court that the record did show such fact, but that such paragraph had been omitted in the transcript by the clerk, the court ordered a certiorari to correct the omission, and restored the cause to the docket for argument upon the exceptions taken at the trial, and it was so heard upon the true record. 30 Fla. 142, 11 South. 550, 17 L. R. A. 705. The same power is vested in this court by article 4, § 8, of the Constitution, which gives it power to issue any remedial writ necessary for a general supervision and control of the lower courts. Instances of supervision to insure justice are Biggs, Ex parte, 64 N. C. 202, and State v. Jefferson, 66 N. C. 311. In Lovett v. State, 29 Fla. 384, 11 South. 176, above cited, the court said (pages 404, 405, 407, 29 Fla., and pages 180, 181, 11 South.): "No advantage can be gained from any action of this tribunal upon an untruthful representation of that record, however ignorant the convict or the counsel may be of the real status of the record, or the incorrectness of the transcript, and however free from blame the clerk may have been in the mistake characterizing his transcript and certificate. * * * The fact still remains that a false record has been brought here on behalf of the convict, and a reversal has been obtained in his behalf upon it, such reversal being based solely upon its false feature; and this fact is not changed, nor its result modified, by the innocence of the prisoner, his counsel, and the Attorney General, but the extent of the imposition and of the mistake is only made the greater. * * * We have been misled into reversing a judgment on a false record; into acting in a cause when that cause, as it really is and only can be acted on by us, has not been before us. * * * The state is not prohibited by any principle of law known to us from arresting the reversal which has been made of her judgment upon such false representation. She is entitled to require the party seeking relief from such judgment to bring to the appellate court the record of the cause in which it was obtained, for, without this, that cause is not before the appellate tribunal for consideration. Any other doctrine than this must result in the frequent consummation of fraud upon the courts, and its constant encouragement." And at page 895, 29 Fla., and page 178, 11 South., the chief justice says that, when the judgment has been granted "upon a false suggestion or under a mistake as to the facts, the court will afford relief after adjournment of the term, and, if necessary, recall the remittitur and stay proceedings in the court below."

Mistakes of this court or of its clerk, not mistakes of law, but of fact, have been often corrected after the mandate has gone down, and even at subsequent terms. Scott v. Queen, 95 N. C. 340; Cook v. Moore, 100 N. C. 294, 6 S. E. 795, 6 Am. St. Rep. 587; Summerlin v. Cowles, 107 N. C. 459, 12 S. E. 234; Scroggs v. Stevenson, 108 N. C. 260, 12 S. E. 1081; Bernhardt v. Brown, 118 N. C., at page 710, 24 S. E. 527, 715, 36 L. R. A. 402. For as strong a reason, this court can order a correction of a record below when, by reason of the false or erroneous certificate of the clerk, the record, as it was, has never been before us. This is not new practice. "Upon a judgment of the King's Bench, if there be error in the process or through defaults of the clerks, it may be reversed in the same court, for error in fact is not error of the judges, and reversing it is not reversing their own judgment." 2 Tidd's Prac. 1187. Also Insurance Co. v. McCormick, 20 Wis., at page 284, where it is said that "the errors are not errors in the judgment itself. The court, in rendering judgment, never passed upon them." In this case the court, through error for which the appellant is responsible (for it was his duty to bring up a true record), has taken action on a bill of indictment on which the prisoner was not tried, and on nothing whatever that took place at that trial. We are not asked to reverse our judgment, but to correct an error of fact. The prisoner brought up the record. He presented us, as an alleged error, a statement of a matter which was false. The record he presented stated that the indictment on which he was tried omitted the words "against her will." He relied upon that omission, and asked an arrest of judgment on that account. We allowed it solely on that account. He has no ground to ask to benefit by that untrue statement in the record he presented to us, and it is immaterial that it does not appear how the omission came to be made. The case has never been before us.

In civil cases, counsel on both sides have opportunity to scan the whole record carefully, and, if there is omission or other error, ordinarily a certiorari can and should be applied for before the cause is called for argument. But in criminal actions the rotating solicitor has no opportunity to see the record proper, nor any part of the transcript, except "the case on appeal" served on him, and does not see even that after the clerk copies the case "as settled." When, as here, there was no point made below on the bill of indictment, the indictment made no part even of the "case on appeal" served on the solicitor. There is no provision of law, nor any practice, requiring solicitors to go back to the county seats, nor to have full transcripts of the record sent them before coming up to this court. The Attorney General is bound to rely upon the correctness of the record laid before him. He was not at the trial below. If, therefore, a clerk can omit material parts of the indictment, and the defendant, notwithstanding the duty is on him to bring up a true record, can profit by this error of fact (whether intentional or unintentional could rarely, if ever, be shown), new trials will depend, not upon the correct rulings of the judge below, but upon the greater or less carefulness of the clerk, or of the copyist often furnished him by the appellant. It is not sufficient to say that the appellant can be again put on trial. There is the expense to the public of another trial, and witnesses may have moved away or died. The state is entitled, in the interest of justice, to have the cause presented here on the record as the matter was presented below, and it is the duty of the appellant to bring up such true record. When there is a fatal misstatement of fact therein, appellants must understand that their negligence in presenting a false record (to put it in the mildest form) cannot avail them any more than if they had made the omission fraudulently, which can never be shown. In State v. Daniel, 121 N. C. 575, 28 S. E. 255, the court said that the defendant "was derelict in not sending up a proper transcript, and the court would not permit him a continuance of the cause for his own neglect, but would send down, ex mero motu, an instant certiorari to cure the defect in the transcript." If the court will not allow an appellant a continuance even for omissions or error in the record, it will certainly not permit him to enjoy a new trial by reason of such default by him.

In England a defendant in criminal cases is allowed no appeal. We allow an appeal, but the burden is on the appellant to assign his errors and bring up a true record. When he fails to do either, he cannot take profit from his omission of duty.

The judge below having, from inspection of the record, found that the indictment on which the appellant was tried in fact contains the words "against her will," and that being already certified to this court, the record here can be amended to include them, as upon certiorari, and the cause will be restored to the docket, to be heard in its order upon the exceptions taken below, when the district to which it belongs is called, unless, for cause shown, it is placed at the end of the district, or at the end of the docket for this term. It does not appear that the words were omitted by the fraud of the appellant, or of any one for him. If it did, the appeal should properly be dismissed.

The motion to restore the cause to the docket is allowed. Motion allowed.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). The defendant was indicted in the court below for the crime of rape, and, having been convicted, appealed to this court. At the last term we arrested the judgment upon the ground that there was no allegation in the indictment that the offense had been committed "against the will of the prosecutrix." 132 N. C. 1000, 43 S. E. 828. The opinion of this court was filed on the 31st day of March, 1903, and the certificate was sent to the superior court on the 1st day of May, 1903, so that the case was retained in this court, under the rule, for the purpose of correction, a full month before it was returned to the lower court. This court adjourned for the term on the 11th day of June, 1903; and it appears, therefore, that the state had ample opportunity, after the filing of the opinion, and before the adjournment at the last term, to have called the alleged error or defect in the transcript to our attention. But it failed to do so. The state is not entitled to any more consideration or indulgence in this court in respect to the trial of cases in which it is concerned, than other litigants, except that the causes in which it is a party may be advanced sometimes, when they affect the public interest, and a speedy hearing is desired. It is bound, however, by the same rules of practice and procedure, and must give the same attention to its cases and exercise the same degree of diligence, as other parties. State v. Price, 110 N. C. 599, 15 S. E. 116. In State v. Cameron, 121 N. C. 572, 28 S. E. 139, we held that "the law which regulates the matter of appeals is the same in both civil and criminal cases," and that "in criminal appeals the respondent is the state, represented by the solicitor of the district in which the case is tried," and that he is as much the representative of the state in all matters pertaining to the preparation of cases, in all respects, for transmission to this court, as is an attorney of record the representative of his client in a civil case. There is no duty imposed upon an attorney in a civil suit with respect to the settlement of the case on appeal, and the transmission of a transcript of the record to this court, that does not equally rest upon the solicitor in an appeal taken in a criminal case. The only difference between the two classes of cases is one which does not materially affect the question we are now discussing, and that difference is that in a civil case the appellant must pay the fees of the clerk for making out the transcript in advance, if he demands it, while the state is not required to do so when it appeals; but the appellant in a civil case is no more bound to see that the record is correctly copied and transmitted to this court than is the state in a criminal case. The duty of copying and transmitting the record is one which, as this court has frequently decided, appertains to the office of the clerk. It is his official duty to send up a perfect transcript, and not in any sense the duty of the appellant, except as hereinafter stated, in any kind of case. This is made perfectly clear in State v. Butts, 91 N. C. 524, 526. In that case it is said by the court that while "it would be well for counsel to see that transcripts are properly made up before they come to this court," in order to protect the interests of their client, yet it is the official duty of the clerk to see that a true and perfect transcript is sent to this court. It may be conceded that, if the record is defective, the appellant in a civil case will not be allowed a continuance in order to have it perfected, or indulged in any other way with respect to it; and, if the defect is one that will injure his client if not corrected, he must abide the consequences of his neglect or omission in not having the record made perfect. He must apply for the necessary process for that purpose in apt time. While this is the rule in civil cases, it also obtains in criminal cases, as to both parties to the record—the state and the defendant. When it is said to be the duty of the appellant to see that the record is correctly certified to this court, nothing more is or can be meant than that, if the record is not here at the proper time, his appeal will be dismissed, or, if the record is defective, and he does not move in apt time to have it corrected, the case must be heard just as if the record was perfect in form, and the party in default must take the consequences of his neglect. Surely the appellee cannot avail himself of a defect which defeated him in the case, and then apply for and obtain a writ of certiorari after the adjournment of the term, upon the ground that the appellant failed himself to apply for the writ. That would be to permit the appellee to take advantage of the laches of his adversary, where he unreasonably relied upon him to look after and care for his interests in this court. If in a civil case a plaintiff (appellee) should permit his case to be argued and decided in this court without having called our attention to a defect in the record, for example, the careless or inadvertent insertion of a material allegation in his complaint, so that it would appear he has no cause of action, and, by reason thereof the judgment is arrested or the action dismissed, would he be heard at the next term to allege the defect and be granted a writ of certiorari, so that the case could be reheard? The mere statement of the proposition carries with it its own sufficient refutation. How, then, can the state, who occupies substantially the same position in this court as the plaintiff (appellee) in a civil case, and is subject to the same rules, be allowed to do so, when the indictment, as certified to this court, is defective? If it is allowed in the latter case, there is no sound reason why it should not be in the former, unless there is something in the mere sovereignty of the state, or her peculiar prerogative, which gives her rights and privileges in this court not enjoyed by a citizen; and no such claim was made by our learned and able Attorney General, who lets no point escape him, and it is not even suggested in the opinion of the court. The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that the government, when it comes into the federal courts to litigate with one of its citizens, must submit to the rules of practice and procedure of its courts, and its rights and privileges at every stage in the trial of the cause are substantially in every respect the same as those of the citizen, and it cannot have any superior advantages. Fink v. O'Neill, 106 U. S. 272, 27 L. Ed. 196; U. S. v. R. Co., 105 U. S. 263, 26 L. Ed. 1021; U. S. v. Thompson, 93 U. S. 586, 23 L. Ed. 982; Carr v. U. S., 98 U. S. 438, 26 L. Ed. 209; Sibbald v. U. S., 12 Pet. 489, 9 L. Ed. 1167.

When it is conceded, as it must needs be, that the state and its citizens stand before this court on terms of perfect equality, and that right and justice under the law must be administered in the same way to each of them, the fallacy of the reasoning by which the conclusion of the court is reached, and its insufficiency to justify that conclusion, is clearly seen, unless we propose to overrule many cases heretofore decided in this court in which it has been held that parties must be diligent in applying for remedial writs for the purpose of perfecting the transcript, and that an application for a certiorari, upon the suggestion of a diminution of the record, cannot be made after the term to which the appeal is taken, and at which the case is decided, and not even at that term unless it is made before the argument commences. A complete reversal of this wise and safe rule is the logical result of the decision in this case, but a consequence more dangerous in its tendency may follow, for no limit of time is set by the ruling of the court for such an application to be made. If it can be made at the first term after the one at which the case is decided, why not at the second term, and so on without limit? It will not answer the argument to say that in the court below the state is represented by one officer, the solicitor, and in this court by another, the Attorney General, for the duty of looking after the interest of the state in the lower court, where the transcript is prepared, and from which it is transmitted, devolves solely upon the solicitor, as we have seen, unless he is assisted by private counsel, as in this case, or unless he specially appoints some other member of the bar to represent him, which appointment must be made in the manner pointed out by this court. State v. Cameron, supra; State v. Clenny, 133 N. C. 662, 45 S. E. 525. In the case last cited, Montgomery, J., for the court, says: "The solicitor, as we have said in State v. Cameron, represents the state in criminal prosecutions, and the statement of the case on appeal in such cases should be submitted to him for acceptance or objection." It appears, therefore, that he is as fully invested with plenary power and authority in all matters affecting the state's interests, with the corresponding duty of taking care of those interests, as the attorney of a party in a civil case. If there is a duty resting upon the latter to examine the transcript of the record before it leaves the hands of the clerk, the same duty rests upon the solicitor, and the consequence to the state must be the same, if this duty has not been performed in a criminal case, as it would be to a party in a civil case if the duty is neglected by him. There is no greater obligation imposed upon an appellant to examine a transcript than there is upon an appellee, in so far as the party in default may be injuriously affected in this court. The same diligence is required of the appellee as of the appellant in discovering defects and having the record perfected. If there is an omission of matter material to his case, and the appellee fails at the proper time to seek the remedy for supplying it, he must suffer the consequences, just in the same way and in the same degree as the appellant. I must deny the correctness of the proposition impliedly asserted in the opinion of the court that any positive legal duty is devolved upon an appellant or an appellee to see that a true and perfect transcript is sent to this court, and that his failure to do so will be imputed to him as a fraudulent or even a false representation to this court, if the transcript is defective or is other than a perfect copy of the record below. He makes no representation to this court, but simply relies, as he has a perfect right to do, upon the clerk, whose duty it is to certify the transcript. The appellant's duty is fully performed when he has caused the case on appeal to be settled and filed with the clerk, and paid the latter his fee for sending up the transcript to this court. There his duty ends, and that of the clerk begins, with this possible qualification, if it is a qualification: That, if the record, as certified by the clerk, happens to be defective, and the appellant fails to have it corrected in due time, so that he loses in this court, he must bear the loss, just as the appellee must do if the defect causes him to be cast in the suit, and he has not taken the proper means to have it remedied. It follows from what I have already said that neither the defendant's counsel nor the solicitor was in the least derelict in his duty, as both had the right, if they chose to do so, to rely upon the clerk, who is the custodian of the record, and the officer appointed by the law for the purpose of preparing and transmitting a perfect transcript of it to this court; and it is not infrequently the case that counsel and the solicitor thus rely, as they each have a perfect right to do, upon the clerk to perform his duty in the premises. But if the clerk fails, by mere inadvertence or oversight, to make a true copy, the defect may be cured by applying to this court for the proper writ in apt time—that is, at the term to which the appeal is taken—and the consequence of the failure to make this application will fall upon him who is prejudiced by it, and who fails to take the necessary steps to protect his interests. This must be so in all cases. I am not denying or questioning the power of this court to correct its own records in order to make them speak the truth. That power is fully conceded, but it is not the one which is being exercised in this case. This court may not only amend its own records at any time, but it may supply any defects in the transcript sent to it from the lower courts, by issuing the proper remedial writ, provided it is done upon seasonable application of a party, or of its own motion within the time allotted by law. It has been uniformly decided by the court that an application for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of correcting a record must be made, except in rare cases, before the cause is submitted for argument (McDaniel v. Pollock, 87 N. C. 503), and in no case can the writ issue after the expiration of the first term; and especially is this so when the case has been decided, and not merely continued, at that term (State v. Blackburn, 80 N. C. 477; State v. Harris, 114 N. C. 830, 19 S. E. 154; State v. Rhodes, 112 N. C. 857, 17 S. E. 164). In the cases cited it is held that, if a party has good ground for a certiorari, he must move for it at least before the argument upon the merits; and, if he fails to do so, he must abide the consequences of his own neglect, although he may be able afterwards to show by proof ever so conclusive, that there is a material defect in the record, and one, too, which would reverse the decision of the court. There must be an end to litigation somewhere. No man should be permitted to prolong it by his own neglect, and thus to profit by his own wrong. But I think the precise question has been decided by the court in Wilson v. Lineberger, 84 N. C. 836. In that case the plaintiff's counsel moved to correct the record at the term next after the case was heard and decided, with the intention of asking for a rehearing. Smith, C. J., for the court, said: "The motion is a novel one, and without precedent in the practice of the courts. If the evidence shall change the aspect of the case, and make it materially different from what it was when heard, we should be required, not to rehear and correct an error of law, but to try a new case. If there is an error in the former decision, it must be discovered in the case then presented, without modification of facts." And again: "It was the duty of counsel to suggest the diminution before the cause was heard, and then ask for this remedial process, not to wait till the decision, and then demand it. It would be productive of much mischief to relax the salutary rule which requires counsel to see that their cause is properly before the court in the record, and to abide the consequences if it is not." The court did not confine its decision in that case to the particular character of the amendment required, but simply applied the general principle that no amendment of any kind can be made at a subsequent term so as to present a question different from that appearing in the original record. The court well said that it would introduce a novelty into the practice and procedure of the court, which would be productive of untold mischief and incalculable harm.

When this court has decided a case, and the opinion and judgment have been certified to the court below, its jurisdiction with respect to the case is at an end, at least when the court has adjourned for the term at which the decision was made. The terms of this court are fixed by law (Const. art. 4, § 7; Code, c. 24, § 953; Acts 1887, p. 100, c. 49; Acts 1901, p. 897, c. 660) in the same manner as are the terms of the superior court; and when, under the statute, this court has finished the business of any one term, and adjourned, its jurisdiction of a case decided at that term ceases, and it cannot again acquire jurisdiction of it, except by petition to rehear under the established rule of the court, or by a new appeal. In discussing this question, the court, in White v. Butcher, 97 N. C. 7, 2 S. E. 59, says: "The remand arrested further action here at this point. * * * The practical result to be secured was the conveyance of the title to the property, as would have been the case here, had the jurisdiction over the cause been retained. But it was no longer in this court for any further order, unless, perhaps, the transmission of the papers and transcript; but the neglect to transmit them did not retain the cause itself after the order, nor impair the efficiency of the order." In Ruffin v. Harrison, 91 N. C. 398, the court, after stating the general proposition that a rehearing will not be granted upon a summary motion to modify a final judgment of this court, proceeds: "The court has no power to amend or modify the final decree, entered at the last term, upon an application like this. After final judgment, the court cannot disturb it, unless upon an application to rehear, or for fraud, accident, or mistake alleged in an independent action, or, perhaps, in some cases, a party might be relieved against a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvert-tence, surprise, or excusable neglect,' within a year after the entry of the same. * * * This, of course, does not imply that the court has not power to correct the entry of its orders, judgments, and decrees so as to make them conform to the truth, or what the court did in granting them, or to set aside an irregular judgment in a proper case. The practical effect of granting the prayer of the petitioners would be to give them the benefit of a rehearing upon a summary application to change the final decree at a term of the court subsequent to that at which it was granted. We are not aware of any rule of procedure or practice that warrants such action. The application must be denied, and the petition in this respect dismissed." In regard to this subject, the court, in Cook v. Moore, 100 N. C. 294, 6 S. E. 795, 6 Am. St. Rep. 587, says in this emphatic language: "It is not contended that this court can reverse, set aside, or modify in any material respect a regular final judgment at a term thereof subsequent to that at which it was entered. It is clear and well settled that it has no such authority, except upon an application to rehear, or because of 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect,' as may be allowed by statute." It will not, of course, be contended in the case at bar that this court has the power to correct the judgment at the last term because of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." In Moore v. Hinnant, 90 N. C. 163, it is said: "But the court has not the power at a subsequent term to revoke, set aside, alter, or amend a final judgment entered at a former term, except upon application to rehear, or because of 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect,' as allowed by law. The exercise of such a power is forbidden by principle and the overwhelming weight of authority, if, indeed, there can be any well-considered case that sustains it. * * * It is a fundamental principle of the common law, as the authorities ancient and modern show, that the court cannot change and modify its final judgments at a term subsequent to the term at which they were entered. During the term the record, including the judgment, is in fieri, and may be amended or set aside as to the court may seem proper, but after the term the power to interfere with it no longer exists. This court has seldom had occasion to refer to the subject of the power of a court of record to change its judgments after the term at which they were entered, but it has repeatedly incidentally recognized the doctrine that such power does not exist." It is also stated in Moore v. Hinnant, supra, that a judgment regularly entered, if not erroneous, can in no case be altered at a subsequent term, otherwise than by a petition to rehear, except for the purpose of making the record express the intention of the court at that time, upon the record as then before it, so that it may speak the truth as to that record. In that case, from which I have made only a few brief extracts, Merrimon, J., for the court, goes fully into the question we have under consideration, and denies the existence of the power or jurisdiction now about to be exercised in this case, and concludes that it would give rise to "universal distrust, endless strife and confusion, and would violate the cardinal maxim that it is to the interest of the state that there should be an end to litigation." He quotes freely from Coke and Blackstone, and supports the doctrine by the citation of numerous and weighty authorities. His quotation from Coke is an apt one: "During the terme wherein any judicial act is done, the record remaineth in the breast of the judges of the court and in their remembrance, and therefore the roll is alterable during that terme, as the judges shall direct; but when the terme is past, then the record is in the roll and admitteth no alteration, averment or proof to the contrarie." Other and numerous authorities in support of the position will be found collected in Moore v. Hinnant and Cook v. Moore, supra.

The case of Rice v. Railroad, 21 How. 82, 16 L. Ed. 31, it seems to me, is directly in point. In that case the record upon which the appeal was heard and decided failed to show that there had been a final judgment in the court below, which was required as a basis of a writ of error to the lower court. It was sought, at the term next after the decision, by writ of certiorari, to bring up and file a new record, showing that there had been a final judgment, and to have the former judgment annulled and a rehearing granted. Taney, C. J., for the court, says: "We think the motion to annul the judgment of the last term and reinstate the case cannot be granted. The suit is a common-law action for a trespass on real property, and the judgment of the court below can be brought here for revision by writ of error only. That writ was issued by the plaintiff in error, returnable to the last term of this court, and it brought the transcript before us at that term. It was judicially acted on, and decided by this court, and, when the term closed, that decision was final, so far as concerned the authority and jurisdiction of this court under that writ. The writ was functus officio, and, if the parties desire to bring the record of the case again before this court, it must be done by another writ of error." He then refers to the case of The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 531, which was cited in support of the petition to rehear, and says that it is not in point, as the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in admiralty cases is quite different from that in cases at common law; it being allowable in admiralty cases to amend the pleadings and take new evidence in the Supreme Court, "so as, in effect, to make it a different case from that decided by the court below." In Sibbald v. U. S., 12 Pet. 492, 9 L. Ed. 1167, the court says: "No principle is better settled, or of more universal application, than that no court can reverse or annul its own final decrees or judgments, for errors of fact or law, after the term in which they have been rendered, unless for clerical mistakes [in the appellate court], or to reinstate a cause dismissed by mistake, from which it follows that no change or modification can be made which may substantially vary or affect it in any material thing." The doctrine is very strongly stated by the court in Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 415, 26 L. Ed. 799, thus: "But it is a rule equally well established that, after the term has ended, all final judgments and decrees of the court pass beyond its control, unless steps be taken during that term, by motion or otherwise, to set aside, modify, or correct them; and, if errors exist, they can only be corrected by such proceeding by a writ of error or appeal as may be allowed in a court which by law can review the decision. So strongly has this principle been upheld by this court, that, while realizing that there is no court which can review its decisions, it has invariably refused all applications for rehearing made after the adjournment of the court for the term at which the judgment was rendered. And this is placed upon the ground that the case has passed beyond the control of the court." In Bank v. Moss, 6 How. 38, 12 L. Ed. 334, the court said: "The action was not regularly on the docket at the new term following the one at which the judgment had been rendered, when the court undertook to set the judgment aside. The power of the court over the original action itself, or its merits, under the proceedings then existing, had been exhausted—ended. This means the power to decide on it, or to change opinions once given, or to make new decisions and alterations on material points. A mere error in law, of any kind, supposed to have been rendered in a judgment of a court at a previous term, is never a sufficient justification for revising and annulling it at a subsequent term, in this summary way, on motion. We would not be understood by this to deprive a court at a subsequent term of power to set right mere forms in its judgments, or of power to correct mistakes of its clerks. The right to correct any mere clerical errors, so as to conform the record to the truth, always remains."

A case directly in point is that of State v. Dickson, 97 Ind. 125, where it appeared from the record as sent to the appellate court that the indictment had not been returned into open court by the grand jury, and the judgment was arrested. A motion was made for leave to amend the record by showing that the indictment had been returned into open court, and then for a rehearing of the case upon the record as thus amended. This is like our case in all respects. The court said: "Counsel for the state accompany their petition for rehearing with a motion to have the clerk of the court below certify to this court certain portions of the record alleged to be omitted in the transcript. No objection, so far as the record before us is concerned, is made to our decision. The settled practice of this court forbids the correction of the record after a case has been decided." So in Garner v. State, 36 Tex. 693, after the judgment was arrested for lack of an essential averment in the bill, a motion similar to the one in this case was made and refused because the court had lost its jurisdiction. In each of the following cases, a motion was made at a term subsequent to that at which the judgment of the appellate court was entered to amend the record and rehear the case: In Cruiser v. State, 18 N. J. Law, 209, the court says: "These, it is true, are mere mistakes in form; they are clerical errors only; but I have searched in vain for any authority in this court to amend, or order amendment below, after a writ of error in a criminal case. I cannot find a single case in which it has been done." It was said in State v. Daugherty, 59 Mo. 104: "If the record was incomplete or defective when the case was here on a former occasion, diminution should have been suggested, and a rule obtained for sending up a perfect transcript. But the party submitted his case upon the record filed in the court, and the judgment rendered thereon is final, and whilst it remains unreversed it conclusively bars any further proceedings. If parties were permitted, after a final judgment in this court, to go back to the circuit court, and there get an amended transcript, and bring the case again here, at their mere will and pleasure, there would be no final disposition of cases." So, in Fielden v. People, 128 Ill. 599, 21 N. E. 585, it was said by the court, "Amendments not in affirmance, but in derogation, of the judgment, are not allowed at a term subsequent to that at which final judgment is rendered." And again it is said: "This motion, not having been made at the same term at which final judgment was rendered—not until the case had passed beyond the power of this court to stay by its order the execution of the judgment—clearly comes too late." A strong case, and one also directly in point, is Cory v. State, 55 Ga. 239, in which the court uses this language: "It is said that the clerk, in copying the bill of indictment, made a mistake and wrote 'with' when he should have written 'without the consent of the owner.' This may or may not be true. It has not been verified to us in the only way it can legally be done, by a suggestion of a diminution of the record on or before the calling of the case. Code, § 4282, rule 9. Our only recourse is to adhere to the law and to rule on principle. It may sometimes work seeming injustice. A departure from it would open the floodgates of speculation, and unsettle the entire practice of the court. In this case any wrong can be but temporary. The party can be tried again, and, if found guilty on the second count, properly framed, he can be punished according to law." See, also, U. S. v. Adams, 9 Wall. 557, 19 L. Ed. 584; Christopher v. Searcy, 12 Bush, 171; 3 Cyc. Law & Pro. p. 214, and note 16, where many cases are collected.

The court, in its opinion, relies very much on the case of Lovett v. State, 29 Fla. 384, 11 South. 176, 16 L. R. A. 313; but the case is not, in my opinion, an authority for its decision. In the first place, the motion in that case for a certiorari for the purpose of correcting the record so that there could be a rehearing of the case upon the amended transcript was made at the same term at which the case was first heard and decided. This is sufficient to distinguish it from the case at bar. The court merely recalled its remittitur while the case was, as it said, in its possession and within its control, under its rules of practice; but, even in doing that, it went beyond what this court had repeatedly decided to be the law in such cases under its rules. If the facts of that case were like those of the case we are considering, and the same point had been presented, the authorities cited in support of the decision would not, I think, sustain it. They are, in the main, cases in which the courts asserted the right to amend their own records so that they could be made to speak the truth. The case of The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 531, on which that court relied, was, as we have already said, a case in admiralty, and the court gave its decision in it under the rules of the admiralty courts in such cases. But those rules do not apply to cases at common law. The court, in Lovett v. State, concedes the general doctrine that, after the appellate court has sent down its certificate or remittitur and adjourned for the term, it has lost its jurisdiction of the case, but not so if the motion for a certiorari is submitted during the term at which the decision is made. "Where a case has been heard," the court says, "upon its merits in an appellate court, according to its rules of practice, and the judgment of the court has been correctly entered, and the time, if any, allowed by the statute or its rules for a rehearing having passed, and, no application for a rehearing having been made, the remittitur issues and is lodged in the lower court, it may well be said that the appellate court has lost its jurisdiction of the cause, and has not power to recall or reconsider it. Under these circumstances, it has fairly and duly exercised its appellate functions and exhausted its powers as to the cause. There must be an end of litigation; public policy, as well as the interest of individual litigants, demands it; and the rule just announced is indispensable to such a consummation." The court also says: "It is apparent that the state's motion is made during the term of court at which the judgment which it is sought to have revoked was pronounced and entered, and it is a general rule of the common law that courts have power either to modify or vacate their judgments and decrees during the term at which they were rendered, or while they are in fieri." Even in that case the court relied largely upon decisions in civil cases in which the error or mistake occurred in the appellate court. The case of The Palmyra, which was also cited by the court, and much relied on in support of its decision, has been fully explained, and shown not to be an authority in support of the court's ruling.

No suggestion of fraud upon the court has been made in this case. Indeed, the Attorney General admitted there was no fraud, but a mere inadvertence of the clerk in copying the indictment.

My conclusion is that, on principle and authority, the court is without jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for by the state. The decision of the court, in my opinion, is in conflict with those cases in which it is held that a petition to rehear will not be entertained in a criminal case, and further establishes a new doctrine—that a criminal case cannot only be reheard in this court, but that the record may be amended for the purpose of a rehearing. The remedy of the state is to send another bill. To a new indictment the plea of former conviction cannot avail the defendant, though some doubt as to this seems to have been entertained in the court below. In order to sustain the plea of former acquittal or former conviction, it must appear that the former judgment "still remains in full force and effect, and not in the least reversed or made void." State v. Williams, 94 N. C. 891.

It is said in the opinion that by article 4, § 8, of the Constitution, this court may issue remedial writs necessary for a general supervision and control of the inferior courts. This is admitted, but it does not follow by any means that they may be issued contrary to the well-established course and practice of the court. In the two cases cited by the court as illustrations of the proper exercise of this power, namely, Biggs, Ex parte, 64 N. C. 202, and State v. Jefferson, 66 N. C. 311, the writs were applied for in apt time, and issued regularly and in strict accordance with the well settled rules of procedure in this court. Again, the court says "that mistakes of this court or of its clerk, not mistakes of law, but of fact, have been often corrected after the mandate had gone down, and even at a subsequent term," and numerous cases are cited to sustain the proposition. Citations are not necessary for that purpose. The proposition is also admitted, but the deduction made from it by the court I do not think is either logical or warranted. The citation from Tidd's Practice is, I think, a complete refutation of it. The correction, as Mr. Tidd said, must be made in the same court where the mistake occurred. All the authorities cited by the court in this connection simply refer to the familiar principle that a court may correct its own records so as to make them speak the truth. I venture to assert, with all deference, that there is not a single authority cited by the court which, when properly considered and restricted to its peculiar facts, sustains its conclusion, or which conflicts with the numerous cases decided by this court, and which I have already cited in support of the view I have taken of this case. My deliberate conviction is that the ruling of the court introduces a new and dangerous precedent into its practice and procedure, and unsettles those decisions in which the right to rehear in criminal cases is said not to exist.

The motion of the state, in my opinion, should be denied.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I fully concur in the able dissenting opinion of Justice WALKER which leaves but little for me to say, but there are some parts of the opinion of the court on which I will briefly comment.

The court says: "We are not asked to reverse our judgment, but to correct an error of fact." I do not so understand it. In the first place, we have no power at any time to correct a fact found in the court below, and, even if we give the clerk of the court below any opportunity to correct the record sent up by him, it would do the state no good, as long as our judgment remains, arresting the judgment in the court below, which in this case would be equivalent to granting the defendant a new trial, as a new bill of indictment could have been sent against him. The motion of the Attorney General to correct the "error of fact" is simply preliminary to his further motion to rehear the case on the record as so amended. If the Attorney General had simply asked to have the error of fact corrected in the record, without disturbing our judgment, I would not have dissented so strenuously. But when he asks us, after the expiration of the term at which the defendant has been granted an arrest of judgment, to take him back, reverse our judgment, and hang him under an old sentence legally set aside at a former term, I must emphatically dissent. It is true, upon the rehearing of the case this court granted the defendant another new trial upon a different ground, but that does not cure the invalidity in the rehearing itself. Suppose that the prisoner had been again tried and acquitted upon a new bill pending the rehearing, and upon the rehearing this court had found no other ground of error; would it have been our duty to have affirmed the judgment and sentence of death? This would have been a greater violation of the letter of the law than the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh, who was executed 15 years after sentence, upon a judgment which had, however, never been formally reversed. The opinion does not call it a rehearing, but what else is it? Taking the facts as they are, what other name can we apply to it? The case is taken back and reconsidered, and a new judgment rendered. I do not mean to say that this case could properly be reheard. On the contrary, not a single requisite exists for a rehearing, even if this court had not decided in State v. Council, 129 N. C. 511, 39 S. E. 814, that petitions to rehear are not allowable in criminal actions. It may be asked why, having dissented in Council's Case, I should also dissent in the case at bar, which practically overrules every principle underlying the decision in Council's Case. I do so for the sufficient reason that, even admitting that the state is entitled to a rehearing, it has complied with none of the requisites prescribed by the rules of this court. Moreover, the opinion of the court cites Council's Case with approval, and it is impossible for both decisions to be right under the same system of jurisprudence. If we cannot rehear a case to do justice to the prisoner by correcting our own error, we surely cannot rehear it simply to hang him.

BRYAN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Instructions without foundation in the evidence should not be given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Catawba County; Long, Judge.

Action by W. B. Bryan against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. J. Ervin and A. B. Andrews, Jr., for appellant. Thos. M. Hufham and Self & Whitener, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. The plaintiff, an employé of the defendant company at the time when he was hurt, was engaged with a squad of hands, under a boss, in loading a box car with heavy timber. In his complaint, as it was first drawn, the negligence alleged was that the defendant was engaged in the work with an insufficient force of hands. The complaint was amended, after the answer was put in, as follows: "That the defendant company was negligent in that said Whitley, foreman and boss of defendant's force of laborers as aforesaid, negligently ordered said Sigman to hold said stringer or piece of timber on said car in an unsafe manner, with a stick slanting downward from the car to his [said Sigman's] shoulder, which was dangerous to plaintiff, and done without notice to him."

The defendant excepted to one of his honor's instructions to the jury, which was as follows: "If the jury should find that Whitley and one of the hands, without notice to plaintiff, quit the work at a critical juncture in the lifting and placing, and thus prevented the completion of the lifting, and left the plaintiff and his associates at the work in a perilous position, from which plaintiff could not, by reasonable care, extricate himself, and you find that this negligence of Whitley was the proximate cause of the injury, you will answer the first issue [as to the defendant's negligence] 'Yea.'" There was no evidence to support such an instruction.

The exception to the rule as to the measure of damages, laid down by his honor, must also be sustained. His honor instructed the jury: "If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, he is entitled to have a reasonable satisfaction for the loss of both bodily and mental powers." The exception was upon the ground that there was no evidence of any loss of mental power. Upon a careful inspection of the evidence, we find that there is none to that effect. Smith v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 712, 38 S. E. 170; Wilkie v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 113, 38 S. E. 280.

STATE v. MUNN.

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. On a prosecution for murder, any error in the charge as to mitigation below murder in the second degree was harmless, where the jury found that defendant killed deceased willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation, and that he was guilty of murder in the first degree, after they had been fully instructed as to the difference between murder in the first and second degrees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Bryan, Judge.

William R. Munn was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Sutton, for appellant. The Attorney General and N. A. Sinclair, for the State.

OLARK, C. J. In this case, if the evidence of the state is to be believed—and the jury by their verdict have found it to be true—a most aggravated and inhuman murder was committed by the prisoner. It is our province to consider only the alleged errors of law committed by the trial judge, and which his counsel has seen fit to point out and assign by exceptions thereto taken in apt time and duly entered in the record. Rule 27 of this court (39 S. E. vii) provides: "No other exceptions than those set out or filed and made part of the case shall be considered by this court, other than exceptions to the jurisdiction, or because the complaint does not state a cause of action, or motions in arrest for the insufficiency of an indictment." This rule formulates the decisions of this court.

¶ 1. See Homicide, vol. 26, Cent. Dig. § 732.

See cases cited in Clark's Code (3d Ed.) pp. 512, 514. The errors alleged have been ably and exhaustively argued by the prisoner's counsel, and the court has carefully and diligently examined each and every exception with proper regard to the importance of the case. We find no error therein. In a case of this nature, whenever there is reason to believe that injustice has been done, and a meritorious exception has by some inadvertence not been taken, the Attorney General has always consented cheerfully to an exception being entered here nunc pro tunc. The point counsel wished to present, though not excepted to, that there was error in the charge as to mitigation from murder in the second degree, would not be before us even if it had been excepted to, for the reason that the jury found, upon the very full and careful charge of the court as to the difference between murder in the first and second degrees, that beyond all reasonable doubt the prisoner slew the deceased willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation, and was guilty of murder in the first degree. The state has thus satisfied them of facts raising the crime above murder in the second degree, which only was presumed from the killing with a deadly weapon. If there were error in the charge as to mitigation below murder in the second degree, it was therefore immaterial error. There is no exception which presents any new point nor any new or unusual application of an old principle. As often stated heretofore by us (Douglas, J., in Parker v. R. B., 133 N. C. 337, 45 S. E. 658; Osborn v. Leach, 133 N. C. 428, 45 S. E. 783; State v. Council, 129 N. C., at page 516, 39 S. E. 814), the decision is all that concerns the parties to any appeal. An opinion giving at length the reasons for any decision is useful solely as a guide to the trial court and to this court in future cases presenting the same or similar points.

Finding no error on any of the grounds presented by the exceptions, and there being no new propositions of law or application of any principles which have not been already passed upon and announced by the court in former cases, and fully satisfied that justice has been done, and a fair trial has been had by the prisoner, it does not seem to us necessary to do more than to say that, after full and most careful investigation in this case, we find no error.

STATE v. BLACKMAN.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—UNLAWFULLY KEEPING FOR SALE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An instruction, on a prosecution for unlawfully keeping liquor for sale, that if defendant had whisky in his possession he would be guilty of keeping it unlawfully, was erroneous, it being for the jury to determine from all the evidence whether he was guilty as charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; Justice, Judge.

Robert Blackman was convicted of illegally keeping liquor for sale, and he appeals. Reversed.

Redwine & Stack, for appellant. Adams, Jerome & Armfield and the Attorney General, for the State.

PER CURIAM. His honor said to the jury that the first question to decide was "whether the man had the whisky in his possession; if he did, that would make him guilty of keeping it unlawfully." The defendant excepted. In any point of view, the instruction was erroneous. The jury should have been permitted upon the whole of the evidence to say whether or not the defendant was guilty as charged. For this error, without passing upon the other exceptions, there must be a new trial.

Ex parte SMITH et al.

LIMITATIONS—ACTION—WHAT IS—PARTITION—DECREE FOR OWELTY—EXECUTION.

1. The statute of presumptions (Rev. Code, c. 65, § 18) raised a presumption of payment of all judgments or decrees within 10 years after their rendition. The statute of limitations (Code, § 136) excepted from its operations actions commenced prior to August 24, 1868, but this section was repealed by Laws 1891, p. 102, c. 113, which, however, excepted from the repeal actions instituted prior to January 1, 1893. Code, § 152, subsec. 1, bars actions on a judgment or decree 10 years after the date of the rendition of the judgment or decree, and section 153 bars actions for relief not otherwise provided for in 10 years. Held, that where a decree of commissioners in partition, which charged owelty against one purpart, was confirmed in 1862, a proceeding for leave to issue execution to recover the owelty, instituted in 1903, was barred.

2. A proceeding for leave to issue execution on a judgment charging lands with owelty in partition is an "action," within the meaning of limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Peebles, Judge.

Partition proceedings ex parte John Smith and others. Motion by John S. Hamilton for leave to issue execution on a judgment for owelty; Asher Edwards, respondent. From a judgment denying the motion, Hamilton appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Stevens, for appellant. F. A. Daniels and W. C. Munroe, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a motion in a partition proceeding formerly pending in the court of pleas and quarter sessions to docket the same, and for leave to issue execution upon a judgment therein rendered which charged one of the tracts of land with a sum of money to be paid to another tract for the purpose of effecting equality of partition. At the November term, 1861, partition was decreed, and lot No. 6 was assigned by the commissioners to Amelia Smith, subject, however, to a charge of $150.66 in favor of lot No. 1, which was assigned to John S. Hamilton, who now makes this motion. In the allotment, the commissioners, in awarding the sum to be paid by lot No. 6 to lot No. 1, used this language: "We do assess the boot before named to be paid or due whenever said dower right of Martha Hamilton shall cease upon the said land." The report of the commissioners was confirmed by decree of the court at February term, 1862. Martha Hamilton died in 1878. Asher Edwards, who is the respondent in this proceeding, has acquired the title to lot No. 1 by mesne conveyances from Amelia Smith, and is now in possession of it. He has answered the petition of Hamilton by pleading, among other things not necessary to be stated, that the charge upon the land has been paid, and that the right to enforce the same is barred by the statute of limitations. So far as it appears, he does not allege actual payment, but simply pleads payment, and relies upon the lapse of time to sustain the plea; that is, he relies both upon the statute of presumptions and the statute of limitations. The pleas are in proper form, and the question is again presented whether the judgment or decree of a court charging one lot with a sum of money to be paid to the owner of another lot in order to equalize the division of land, or for "owelty of partition," can be affected either by the statute of presumptions or the statute of limitations. The judgment in this case was rendered in 1862, and, but for the provision inserted by the commissioners in their report, which we have quoted, and which, of course, was made a part of the decree when the report was in all respects confirmed (Bull v. Pyle, 41 Md. 421), the right of action to enforce payment of the charge would have been deemed to have accrued prior to August, 1868, if section 136 of the Code had not been repealed by Acts 1891, p. 102, c. 113, as to actions begun after January 1, 1893. This proceeding was begun in 1903. If the right of action had accrued prior to August, 1868, and section 136 of the Code had not been repealed, we think the statute of presumptions would have applied to any proceeding instituted to enforce payment of such a charge upon the land by issuing execution on the judgment. In Ruffin v. Cox, 71 N. C. 253, it is said that certain authorities, which are cited in the opinion, hold that there is no bar, either by the statute of presumptions or the statute of limitations, in such cases; but this is not correct, as a reference to the cases cited will show, and it was not necessary to the decision of that case to pass upon the point. None of the cases cited in Ruffin v. Cox refer to the question in regard to the statute of limitations or statute of presumptions, except the case of Sutton v. Edwards, 40 N. C. 425, which case has been erroneously cited several times, since it was referred to in Ruffin v. Cox, for the proposition that the statute of limitations is not a good plea in such cases. In Dobbin v. Rex, 106 N. C. 444, 11 S. E. 280, the statute did not apply, because the land had already been sold under an execution, and the plea was not available to the party who relied on it, because it came too late. The question was not presented in Wilson v. Lumber Co., 131 N. C. 163, 42 S. E. 565, as is stated by Clark, J., on page 167, 131 N. C., 42 S. E. 565; nor did it become necessary to decide it in the case of In re Ausborn, 122 N. C. 42, 29 S. E. 56, because in that case, as was said by Montgomery, J., for the court, there had been no decree of confirmation, and the statute could not bar, as the right to issue execution, or, in other words, to enforce the payment of the charge, had not accrued, and the statute, therefore, had not commenced to run. Those cases were rightly decided, and we approve them.

It has been supposed by some that, because it was said in one or two of the older cases, decided before 1868, that "there is no statutory limitation as a bar, by which proceedings of the kind are governed," it followed that lapse of time could not affect the right to issue execution upon such a judgment. This expression was used by Nash, J., in the leading case of Sutton v. Edwards, 40 N. C. 425, at page 428; but immediately afterwards he explains what is meant, namely, that there was no statute of limitations applicable to judgments at that time, as they were subject only to the statute of presumptions, under and by virtue of which there was a presumption of payment or satisfaction of all judgments and decrees within 10 years after the right to enforce them accrued. Rev. Code, c. 65, § 18. He discusses the case with reference to the statute of presumptions, and strongly intimates that it would have defeated the plaintiff's suit, but for the fact that the charge rested upon the lot of an infant, and, by the provision of the statute, the sum charged was not due and payable until he attained his majority.

We must infer from the language of the court in Sutton v. Edwards that, if the sum charged upon the lot of greater value had been due at the time the judgment was rendered, the plea of payment or satisfaction would have been sustained, under the statute of presumptions in force at that time. The failure to distinguish clearly between the old law, and the new in this respect, or between the statute of presumptions and the statute of limitations, has caused some apparent confusion in the cases upon this important subject; but we think they can all be easily explained and reconciled, when this distinction is kept steadily in view, and when each decision is restricted to the particular facts upon which it was based. In the case of In re Walker, 107 N. C. 340, 12 S. E. 136, the question was discussed by Merrimon, C. J., who wrote the opinion of the court; and, while the court held that prior to 1868 there was no statute of limitations that could operate as a bar in such cases, it strongly intimated that the statute of presumptions applied, though in that case it was found as a fact that the charge upon the land had not been paid or satisfied, and the point, therefore, was only incidentally presented. But in Herman v. Watts, 107 N. C. 646, 12 S. E. 437, the question under discussion was directly involved; and the court held that, as the partition had been made and the charge imposed upon the land prior to 1868, the decree was subject to the statute of presumptions, and that, as the plaintiff in the case had failed to rebut the presumption raised by the law, the court should have instructed the jury to find in favor of the party who pleaded the payment. It was also held that the proper remedy for enforcing such charges is by execution, and formerly by venditioni exponas, to be granted upon motion or petition in the original proceedings. Waring v. Wadsworth, 80 N. C. 345; Turpin v. Kelly, 85 N. C. 399; Halso v. Cole, 82 N. C. 161. It was intimated in Rice v. Rice, 115 N. C. 43, 20 S. E. 185, and decided in Allen v. Allen, 121 N. C. 328, 28 S. E. 513, that the statute of limitations will bar an action or proceeding to enforce payment of a charge by will upon land devised, if sufficient time has elapsed for the purpose. It having been decided in Herman v. Watts that the statute of presumptions applied when the decree was made prior to 1868, it necessarily follows that the statute of limitations, which is but a substitute for the statute of presumptions, must now be a valid plea; and, if the time fixed by the statute has elapsed, it will be a good and effectual bar to the motion for execution. The two statutes are couched in substantially the same language; the only difference being that one raises a presumption, merely, of payment or satisfaction, while the other furnishes a complete bar.

We have already seen that the right to move for execution in this case accrued in 1878, according to the terms of the report and decree, as the sum charged upon the land was not due until the death of Mrs. Martha Hamilton. Terrell v. Cunningham, 70 Ala. 100. And, even if this provision had not been inserted in the report, the result would not have been different, as the act of 1891, p. 102, c. 113, repealed section 136 of the Code, so that, while the statute of presumptions formerly applied, the statute of limitations now takes its place (Nunnery v. Averitt, 111 N. C. 394, 16 S. E. 683), provided the action or proceeding was commenced since January 1, 1893, which is the fact in this case. If either statute, therefore, applies, it must be the statute of limitations. We cannot see why the statute should not apply. It is true, the charge rests upon the land alone, and it has been said that the land is the debtor, and that there is no personal liability of its owner. But how can this affect the question one way or another? The statute, whether of presumptions or limitations, operates against the actor or the party who must seek to apply the remedy, and it affects only the remedy. If, therefore, he who has the right to enforce the charge against the land delays in doing so for the time limited by the statute, the bar operates, without regard to the particular nature of the charge or lien which is to be enforced, or even to the form of the remedy. It is a familiar principle that the statute of limitations affects, not the right, but the remedy. Besides, so far as the nature of the lien or charge is concerned, if we consider the matter with reference to that alone, and without regard to the remedy, the case comes not only within the spirit, but within the letter, of the statute, which provides that an action on a judgment or decree shall be barred if it is not brought within 10 years from the date of the rendition of the same, and this is a motion that an execution be issued upon a judgment or decree. The words of the statute are broad enough to include judgments or decrees in rem, as well as those in personam. The charge or lien is created by the judgment, and, when the judgment is barred or satisfied in fact or by presumption from lapse of time, it is gone, and the charge for owelty, which is merely an incident of it, ceases also to exist.

One question remains to be considered. Does the word "action," which is used in the statute, include a proceeding of this kind, which is a motion for leave to issue execution upon a judgment charging land with the payment of money for equality of partition? We think it does, and it has been so decided. In McDonald v. Dickson, 85 N. C. 248, the question was directly presented, and the court held that the motion for leave to issue execution was a substitute for the ancient writ of scire facias, and that, while the latter, in the main, was regarded as a continuation of the old suit, it was for some purposes a new action. The defendant is bound by the judgment, of course, as to all matters determined thereby, and as to which he is finally concluded; but to the motion for an execution upon it he can set up any defense which has arisen since the judgment was rendered, and among the defenses so available is the statute of limitations, if a sufficient time has elapsed since the rendition of the judgment to create a bar. In Lilly v. West, 97 N. C. 279, 1 S. E. 834, the court says: "But not less fatal is the objection founded on the limitation put upon the remedy. The bar is as effectual when it can be interposed by plea or answer to a motion to revive a dormant judgment, that execution may issue, as to an independent action upon the judgment itself." This principle has been repeatedly recognized and enforced by this court. Berry v. Corpening, 90 N. C. 395; Williams v. Mullis, 87 N. C. 159; Johnston v. Jones, 87 N. C. 393; McLeod v. Williams, 122 N. C. 451, 30 S. E. 129; Bank v. Swink, 129 N. C. 255, 39 S. E. 962. It can make no difference whether section 152, subsec. 1, or section 158, of the Code, applies. The result will be the same in either case. The provisions of section 158 are very broad and comprehensive, and embrace any and all actions for relief not otherwise provided for in the Code.

The views we have expressed are sustained by decisions in other states upon statutes similar to ours. B. & O. Railroad v. Trimble, 51 Md. 99; McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 152; Leibert's Appeal, 119 Pa. 517, 13 Atl. 461; Terrell v. Cunningham, 70 Ala. 100. The case of Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726, is, in its facts, very much like the one under review; and the court, in discussing the question involved, reached the same conclusion that we have in this case, and correctly, as we think, differentiated the cases heretofore decided in this court, and which were cited in the opinion delivered in that case.

RODMAN et al. v. ROBINSON.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACTS TO CONVEY LAND—RIGHTS OF WIFE—AGREEMENT ON SUNDAY—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION—REMEDIES.

1. Where a wife is not a party to an action for the specific performance of a contract to convey land executed by the husband, and his solvency and ownership of other land sufficient for the allotment of homestead is admitted, he cannot avoid a decree for the conveyance by asserting that his wife was entitled to dower and homestead in the land, and the decree did not sufficiently guard her interest, as she was not affected by the decree.

2. Code, § 3782, forbidding labor, work, or business of one's ordinary calling on Sunday, does not invalidate a contract entered into on Sunday for the conveyance of land, which was not an act done as a part of a usual business.

3. A promise to pay a certain sum as purchase money is a sufficient consideration for a contract to convey land.

4. Where a contract for the conveyance of land is accepted, an attempted repudiation by the vendor without the consent of the purchaser is of no effect.

5. A contract for the conveyance of land entered into on Sunday is not invalid as against public policy.

6. A purchaser of land, on breach of the contract of sale, may sue for specific performance, and is not bound to bring an action at law for damages.

7. Where no fraud or mistake is averred, an allegation that the vendor made a bad trade does not exempt him from specific performance of a contract to convey land.

8. In a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land, describing the land by metes and bounds is sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pender County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. F. Rodman and others against J. W. S. Robinson for specific performance of a contract to convey land. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Kerr, F. R. Cooper, and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. Connor & Connor and E. K. Bryan, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. On Sunday, September 14, 1902, the defendant, who then was and still is the owner in fee and possession of the land described in the complaint, contracted in writing dated September 13, 1902, with plaintiff Rodman to sell him said land, possession to be given the 1st of January, 1903, and deed to be delivered the 1st of April, 1903, at which time the purchase money was to be paid. In December, 1902, defendant informed Rodman that he would not deliver possession nor accept the purchase money, and repudiated the contract. Nevertheless Rodman did tender the $4,200, the agreed price, in money, on 1st of April, 1903, or as soon thereafter as defendant could be found, and demanded the deed, but defendant refused to accept the money or deliver the deed. The contract is admitted in the answer, and judgment for specific performance was rendered upon the pleadings, and defendant appealed.

The first assignment of error is: "Because it appears from the answer that defendant was at the time of signing said alleged contract to convey a married man, and his wife is still living, and entitled to dower and homestead right in said land, and the judgment does not sufficiently guard and protect such right." The wife has an inchoate right of dower, but she has no present right to the property, nor to its possession, nor any dominion over it. She has only a right therein contingent upon surviving her husband, which may not happen. Gatewood v. Tomlinson, 113 N. C. 312, 18 S. E. 318. The Code, § 2103, expressly provides that upon the death of the husband the widow shall be entitled to dower. Besides, this is an objection which the plaintiff alone could make. The wife is not a party to this action, and the decree in no wise affects her contingent interest. Having taken the contract without the wife's signature, the plaintiff could not obtain a decree compelling her to join in the deed. Farthing v. Rochelle, 131 N. C. 563, 43 S. E. 1; Fortune v. Watkins, 94 N. C. 304. The Code, § 2106, recognizes the right of the husband to alien without the joinder of the wife, the conveyance having no effect upon the wife's contingent right of dower. Fleming v. Graham, 110 N. C. 374, 14 S. E.

¶ 3. See Specific Performance, vol. 44, Cent. Dig. § 363.

922; Scott v. Lane, 109 N. C. 154, 13 S. E. 772; Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 236, 9 S. E. 437; Mayho v. Cotton, 69 N. C. 289. As to the homestead right, it was not necessary for the wife to join in the contract, because the answer admits that no homestead had been allotted in this land. Mayho v. Cotton, supra, approved in Joyner v. Sugg, 132 N. C., at page 569, 44 S. E. 122. Besides, the answer further admits the solvency of the defendant, that there is no judgment docketed against him, and that he owns other lands more than sufficient in value for the allotment of the homestead. Hughes v. Hodges, supra. The conveyance or contract is valid, subject to the contingent right of dower. Gatewood v. Tomlinson and Scott v. Lane, supra. The wife is not a party to this action, and not estopped by the judgment if the above admissions should prove untrue. The wife not being a party, the exception that her "rights are not protected by the decree" has no place here.

The second assignment of error is: "Because the contract to convey was entered into and signed upon Sunday, and, no consideration being passed, and the defendant having repudiated the contract the week following, said contract is not enforceable, and the judgment should have declared said contract to be void." The promise to pay $4,200 purchase money was a sufficient consideration. Puffer v. Lucas, 101 N. C., at page 284, 7 S. E. 734; Worthy v. Brady, 91 N. C. 265; a. c. 108 N. C. 440, 12 S. E. 1034; Clark on Contracts, pp. 149, 169; 9 Cyc. 323. The contract having been accepted by plaintiff, the attempted repudiation thereof by the defendant without the consent of the plaintiff has no effect. Paddock v. Davenport, 107 N. C. 710, 12 S. E. 464; Ryan v. U. S., 136 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 913, 34 L. Ed. 447. So this exception hinges upon the question whether the contract is invalid because entered into and signed on Sunday. This point has been settled in this state by repeated decisions. A contract entered into on Sunday is not invalid at common law. Clark on Cont. p. 393; Drury v. De Fontaine, 1 Taunton, 131 (in which it was held that a vendor could recover the price of a horse sold on Sunday); Benjamin on Sales, § 552. Our statute—Code, § 3782—is copied almost verbatim from the first part of the statute 29 Car. II, c. 7 (1678). The other part forbidding service of process on Sunday is omitted from our statute, which merely provides that "on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, no tradesman, artificer, planter, laborer or other person shall * * * do or exercise any labor, business or work of his ordinary calling * * * upon pain that every person so offending * * * shall forfeit and pay one dollar." This part was construed by Lord Mansfield in Drury v. De Fontaine, supra, not to invalidate a sale of a horse on Sunday, where the sale was not a part of the vendor's ordinary calling. This statute is the foundation of nearly all the Sunday legislation in this country. It is not alleged in the answer that this contract was made and entered into by either the plaintiff Rodman or the defendant, Robinson, in pursuance by either of his ordinary calling. In Melvin v. Easley, 52 N. C. 350, the court said: "The statute in its operation is confined to manual, visible, or noisy labor, such as is calculated to disturb other people; for example, keeping open shop or working at a blacksmith's anvil. The Legislature has power to prohibit labor of this kind on Sunday on the ground of public decency. * * * But when it goes further, and * * * prohibits labor which is done in private, the power is exceeded, and the statute is void." In that case it was held that selling a horse on Sunday was not forbidden by the statute, as dealing in horses was not Melvin's "ordinary calling." Again, it is said in State v. Ricketts, 74 N. C. 192: "In this state every act may lawfully be done on Sunday which may lawfully be done on any other day, unless there is some statute forbidding it to be done on that day." This has been cited and approved in White v. Morris, 107 N. C., at page 99, 12 S. E. 80 (in which Davis, J., calls attention to the fact that prior to the Code civil process could not legally be served on Sunday, but now the restriction applies only to forbid arrests in civil actions on that day), approved also in State v. Penley, 107 N. C. 810, 12 S. E. 455; Ashe, J., in State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 90, and State v. Howard, 82 N. C., at page 626; Merrimon, C. J., in State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 749, 10 S. E. 183; Taylor v. Ervin, 119 N. C. 276, 25 S. E. 875—all these last holding that it was not illegal to hold court on Sunday if the judge deemed it necessary, though out of considerations of propriety it ought not to be done unless necessary. In State v. Brooksbank, 28 N. C. 73, Ruffin, C. J., held that it was not indictable to sell goods in open shop on Sunday, and in State v. Williams, 20 N. C. 400, the court, through the same judge, held it not indictable to work on Sunday, it not being indictable either at common law (citing Rex v. Brotherton, 1 Str. 702; Rex v. Cox, Bur. 785) or by our statute, adding (page 400): "It is clear that the making of bargains on Sunday was not a crime against the state, for contracts made on that day are binding. It has often been so ruled in this state, and after elaborate argument and time to advise." Covington v. Threadgill, 88 N. C. 189, is obiter merely, and Waters v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 349, 12 S. E. 950, is a construction of section 1632, Gen. St. S. C. 1862, which is a part of the statute 29 Car. II, which has been omitted in our statute.

Counsel for defendant contend that Christianity is a part of the law of the land, and hence, independent of any statute, the contract is invalid. If the observance of Sunday were commanded by statute as an act of religion or worship, such statute would be absolutely forbidden. The founder of the Christian religion said that his "kingdom was not of this world," and under our Constitutions, both state and federal, no act can be required or forbidden by statute because such act may be in accordance with or against the religious views of any one. The first amendment to the federal Constitution provides, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" and the Constitution of this state (article 1, § 26) reads: "All men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences, and no human authority should in any case whatever control or interfere with the right of conscience." If, therefore, the cessation of labor or the prohibition or performance of any act were provided by statute for religious reasons, the statute could not be maintained. The Seventh Day Baptists, and some others, as well as the Hebrews, keep Saturday, and the Mahomedans observe Friday. To compel them or any one else to observe Sunday for religious reasons would be contrary to our fundamental law. The only ground upon which "Sunday laws" can be sustained is that, in pursuance of the police power, the state can and ought to require a cessation of labor upon specified days to protect the masses from being worn out by incessant and unremitting toil. If such days happen to be those upon which the larger part of the people observe a cessation of toil for religious reasons, it is not an objection, but a convenience. Yet such statute cannot be construed beyond its terms so as to make the signing of a contract on Sunday invalid when the words prohibit only "labor, business, or work of one's ordinary calling." It is incorrect to say that Christianity is a part of the common law of the land, however it may be in England, where there is union of church and state, which is forbidden here. The beautiful and divine precepts of the Nazarene do influence the conduct of our people and individuals, and are felt in legislation and in every department of activity. They profoundly impress and shape our civilization. But it is by this influence that it acts, and not because it is a part of the organic law, which expressly denies religion any place in the supervision or control of secular affairs. As a cotemporary construction of the federal Constitution, it may be well to recall that one of the first treaties of peace made by the United States—that with Tripoli—which was sent to the Senate with the signature of George Washington, who had been president of the convention which adopted the United States Constitution, began with these words, "As the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." This treaty was ratified by the Senate. If it was presumption in Uzza to put forth his hand to stay the tottering ark of God at the threshing floor of Chidon, it is equally forbidden under our severance of church and state for the civil power to enforce cessation of work upon the Lord's Day in maintenance of any religious views in regard to its proper observance. That must be left to the consciences of men as they are severally influenced by their religious instruction. Churches differ widely, as is well known, on this subject; the views of Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, for instance, being divergent, and the views of other churches differing from both. Even if Christianity could be deemed the basis of our government, its own organic law must be found in the New Testament, and there we shall look in vain for any requirement to observe Sunday, or, indeed, any day. The Master's references to the Sabbath were not in support, but in derogation, of the extreme observance of the Mosaic day of rest indulged in by the Pharisees. The Old Testament commanded the observance of the Sabbath, but that was an injunction laid upon the Hebrews, and it designated Saturday, not Sunday, as the day of rest, prescribing a thoroughness of abstention from labor which few observe, even of the people to whom the command was given. Sunday was first adopted by Christians in lieu of Saturday long years after Christ, in commemoration of the Resurrection. The first "Sunday law" was enacted in the year 321 after Christ, soon after the Emperor Constantine had abjured paganism, and apparently for a different reason than the Christian observance of the day. It is as follows: "Let all judges and city people and all tradesmen rest upon the venerable day of the Sun. But let those dwelling in the country freely and with full liberty attend to the culture of their fields, since it frequently happens that no other day is so fit for the sowing of grain or the planting of vines; hence the favorable time should not be allowed to pass, lest the provisions of heaven be lost." Codex Just. lib. 3, tit. 12, lex 2. Evidently Constantine was still something of a heathen. As late as the year 409 two rescripts of the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius indicate that Christians then still generally observed the Sabbath (Saturday, not Sunday). The curious may find these set out in full in Codex Just. lib. 1, tit. 8, lex 13. Not till near the end of the ninth century was Sunday substituted by law for Saturday as the day of rest by a decree of the Emperor Leo (Leo, Cons. 54). The subsequent development of Sunday laws will be found in Lewis' "Sunday Legislation." This legislation has differed in different Christian countries, and still differs, and the divergence is very great, even in the legislation of the states of this Union. The Saxon laws, under Ine (about A. D. 700), forbade working on Sunday, but under Alfred (A. D. 900) and Athelstane (A. D. 924) the prohibition was merely against marketing on Sunday, and there seems to have been no statute against working on Sunday (whatever the church may have enjoined) until the above-cited statute 29 Car. II, c. 7 (1678), the first part of which is almost verbatim our statute (Code, § 3782). See 4 Blk. Com. 63. Indeed, it appears from the records of Merton College, Oxford, that at its manor of Ibstone, in the latter part of the thirteenth century, contracts with laborers provided for cessation from work on Saturdays and holidays, but it was stipulated that work should be done in regular course on Sunday. Thorold Rogers, "Work and Wages," c. 1. Indeed, it seems that this was usual in England till the time of the Commonwealth and the rise of the Puritans to power, but the change was not enacted into law till the above-cited statute of Charles II in 1678. The first Sunday law in this country was enacted in Virginia in 1617 (three years before the landing at Plymouth), and punished a failure to attend church on Sunday, with a fine payable in tobacco. This was re-enacted in 1623. Henning's Statutes at Large Va. 1619-1660, vol. 1, p. 123. Plymouth Colony (Records, vol. 11, p. 214) made it punishable by imprisonment in the stocks to go to sleep in church; and on June 10, 1650, the same colony made it punishable by whipping to do "any servile work or any such like abuse" on the Lord's Day. "So any sin committed with an high hand, as the gathering of sticks on the Sabbath Day, may be punished with death, when a lesser punishment might serve for gathering sticks privily and in need." Records of Massachusetts Bay, vol. 2, p. 93. Publicity did not then have the virtue attributed to it as now, but the reverse. Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts, vol. 1, p. 390, says: "Divers other offences were made capital, viz., profaning the Lord's Day in a careless or scornful neglect or contempt thereof (Numbers 15, 30-36)." The New Haven Colony Records, 1653-1655, p. 605, contain a similar provision that profaning the Lord's Day by "sinful servile work or unlawful sport, recreation or otherwise, whether willfully or in a careless neglect, shall be duly punished by fine, imprisonment, or corporally, according to the nature and measure of such sin and offense"; providing further that, if "the sin was proudly, presumptuously and with a high hand committed," such person "shall be put to death." On May 19, 1668, after the union of New Haven and Connecticut in one colony, unnecessary travel or playing on Sunday, or keeping out of the meeting house, was made punishable by imprisonment in the stocks; adding, "The constables in the several plantations are hereby required to make search for all offenders against this law and make return thereof." Colonial Records of Connecticut, 1665-1667, p. 88. Similar laws, but of less severity, were enacted in some other provinces. While the statutes of the several states still differ on the subject of Sunday legislation, all of these enactments are now based upon the police power, that some rest may be guaranteed to the workers, and to avoid offense by the noise and tumult of traffic and labor to the great majority who desire a day of quiet and peace for their devotional services. Bishop on Contracts, § 536, says: "It is abundantly settled that a Sunday contract is good when it does not come in conflict with any statute." We do not deny the constitutionality of a Sunday law based on the police power, which is well settled. Judfine v. State, 22 L. R. A. 721, and notes. We hold that our statute does not make void the contract here sued on. In the language of Caldwell, J., in Swann v. Swann (C. C.) 21 Fed., at page 305: "It would be downright hypocrisy for a court to affect to believe that the moral sense of the community would be shocked by compelling a man to pay a note given for an honest debt because it was executed on the Lord's Day." And the same is true of the enforcement of any contract which is not forbidden by statute to be made on Sunday.

Among the authorities elsewhere which hold in accordance with our decisions that a note or contract made on Sunday is valid are Barrett v. Applington, Fed. Cas. No. 1,045; More v. Clymer, 12 Mo. App. 11; Glover v. Cheatham, 19 Mo. App. 656; Sanders v. Johnson, 29 Ga. 526; Dorough v. Mort Co. (Ga. 1903) 45 S. E. 22; Ray v. Catlett, 51 Ky. 532; Hazard v. Day, 14 Allen, 487, 92 Am. Dec. 790; Geer v. Putnam, 10 Mass. 312; Kaufman v. Hamm, 30 Mo. 388 (which held valid a promissory note made on Sunday); Foster v. Wooten, 67 Miss. 540, 7 South. 501; Horacek v. Keebler, 5 Neb. 355; Fitzgerald v. Andrews, 15 Neb. 52, 17 N. W. 370; Swisher's Lessee v. Williams' Heirs, Wright, 754; Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387; Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110, 40 Am. Rep. 684 (which holds a mortgage executed on Sunday to be valid); Mills v. Williams, 16 S. C. 598; Lucas v. Larkin, 85 Tenn. 355, 8 S. W. 647 (privy examination on Sunday valid); Gibbs v. Brucker, 111 U. S. 597, 4 Sup. Ct. 572, 28 L. Ed. 534; Allen v. Gardner, 7 R. I. 22; Moore v. Murdock, 26 Cal. 514; Johnson v. Brown, 13 Kan. 529; Birks v. French, 21 Kan. 238; Boynnton v. Page, 13 Wend. 425; Miller v. Roessler, 4 E. D. Smith, 234; Batsford v. Elvery, 44 Barb. 618; Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 515, 86 Am. Dec. 292; Eberle v. Mehrbach, 55 N. Y. 682; Amis v. Kyle, 2 Yerg. 31, 24 Am. Dec. 463; Beham v. Ghio, 75 Tex. 87, 12 S. W. 969; Schneider v. Sansom, 62 Tex. 201, 50 Am. Rep. 521; Richmond v. Moore, 107 Ill. 429, 47 Am. Rep. 445; Main v. Johnson, 7 Wash. 321, 35 Pac. 67; Raines v. Watson, 2 W. Va. 371; Clark, Contracts, 395; and there are others to same purport. There are decisions to the contrary, but they will be found almost entirely in states where the statute, unlike ours, is not restricted to "labor, business, or work done in one's ordinary calling," but is extended in its terms so as to embrace the prohibition of contracts of all kinds on Sunday. In such cases, as is said in Swann v. Swann (C. C.) 21 Fed. 299: "Contracts made on the Lord's Day are not void on religious or moral grounds, but upon the familiar and established doctrine that when a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act—no matter what that act may be—a court of justice will not enforce a contract made in violation of such statute." The execution of a will on Sunday seems to be held valid everywhere. The Pennsylvania court in 1850 was evenly divided on the question whether "a marriage contract executed on Sunday was such worldly employment or business as was forbidden on that day" (In re Gangwere's Estate, 14 Pa. 417, 53 Am. Dec. 554); but better advised later, in 1882 they held that a contract of marriage entered into on Sunday was valid (Markley v. Kessering, 2 Penny. 187).

To sum up the whole matter, the validity, in the courts, of any act done on Sunday, depends not upon religious views, but upon the statute of each particular state, and our statute only forbidding "labor, work, or business of one's ordinary calling" does not invalidate a contract, as here, which was not an act done as a part of the plaintiff's usual business or calling. Bishop, Contracts, § 538, and cases cited. As was said in State v. Ricketts, supra: "What religion and morality permit or forbid to be done on Sunday is not within our province to decide."

The third exception is that the agreement to convey was void because without consideration and against public policy. Both these points have been disposed of. See, also, Dowdy v. White, 128 N. C. 17, 38 S. E. 129, as to mutual promises being sufficient consideration, and on public policy see note at end of opinion in Swann v. Swann (C. C.) 21 Fed. 308.

The fourth and last exception is that the decree is "for specific performance, while the plaintiff at most is entitled only to damages for breach of contract." In Bryson v. Peak, 43 N. C. 310, it is held: "In case of breach of contract of sale, the injured party is entitled at his election to a bill for specific performance, and is not bound to bring an action at law for damages." To same purport, Springs v. Sanders, 62 N. C. 67; Young v. Griffith, 84 N. C. 715; Hargrove v. Adcock, 111 N. C. 166, 16 S. E. 16; Stamper v. Stamper, 121 N. C. 251, 28 S. E. 20; Whit- ted v. Fuquay, 127 N. C. 68, 37 S. E. 141; Hennessey v. Woolworth, 123 U. S. 438, 9 Sup. Ct. 109, 32 L. Ed. 500.

The allegation that the defendant made a bad trade, there being no fraud or mistake alleged, does not exempt him from specific performance. Stamper v. Stamper and Whit- ted v. Fuquay, supra; Moore v. Reed, 37 N. C. 580. If, as the defendant admits, he is liable to damages for the difference between the contract price and the value of the land, then he is not hurt, because he would have to pay the difference, and there would be no reason for a refusal to decree specific performance. There is no fraud or mistake as alleged. The land is described by metes and bounds, and that is sufficient. Laws 1891, p. 524, c. 465; Carson v. Ray, 52 N. C. 609, 78 Am. Dec. 267; Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, 10 S. E. 910; Farthing v. Rochella, 131 N. C. 563, 43 S. E. 1. The decree should have directed the defendant to make reasonable effort to get his wife to sign the deed. Swepson v. Johnson, 84 N. C. 449; Welborn v. Sechrist, 88 N. C., at page 292. But that was error against the plaintiffs, who are not appealing.

No error.

TRIAL—ISSUES—RESPONSES OF JURY—VERDICT.

1. A complaint alleged that defendant sold plaintiff an interest in a certain machine, representing that the whole machine, including a certain crank connected therewith, was patented; that the crank was in fact not included in the patent; and that he was unable to sell the machine on account of threats by the owner of a superior patent, including the crank. Defendant denied the alleged representations, and denied that there was any superior patent. Issues were submitted to the jury as to any fraud, whether the patent covered the crank, and whether the patent was worthless without the crank, on all of which the jury found for plaintiff; but the jury answered that they could not say as to whether the machine, in all its parts, was covered by an older patent, or as to whether plaintiff was prevented from selling the machine by reason of a patent covering the crank. There was no evidence as to the existence of any other patent. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff on the responses was error, since they covered immaterial matters, but failed to cover the material issues under the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Bryan, Judge.

Action by L. J. Tew against E. F. Young and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. T. Oates, W. A. Stewart, and J. C. Clifford, for appellants. T. H. Sutton and N. A. Sinclair, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. The theory upon which this case appears from the record to have been tried was inconsistent with the cause of action set out in the complaint; and the jury, failing to respond to the particular issues raised by the pleadings, answered certain others which seem to us immaterial. The allegations in the complaint upon which the plaintiff founds his action are that the defendants sold to him an interest in a certain machine or cabinet for the preservation of fruit, which the defendants represented to him at the time of the sale was protected by a patent; that, connected with the model of the patented machine exhibited to the plaintiff, there was represented, as included in the patent, a crank or handle to be used in connection with a cylinder attached to the cabinet; and that this crank was not in fact included in the patent. No damage was alleged by the plaintiff to have been sustained by him because of the alleged fraudulent statement that the crank was covered and protected by the patent, but the plaintiff alleges that his damages grew out of his inability to sell the machine within the territory in which he was allowed to operate by virtue of his purchase, on account of a threat made of legal prosecutions by the owner of an older and superior patent of a like machine, including the crank, and that, believing that there was an older and superior patent, he abandoned the sale of his machine after spending a good deal of time and money in preparation for its sale. The defendants deny that there were any fraudulent representations made by them to the plaintiff at the time of the sale of the patent to the plaintiff, and denied that there was any older and superior patent of the machine. His honor submitted several issues to the jury—one upon the question of fraud in the sale of the patent, one as to whether the patent covered the crank or not, one as to whether the patented device was worthless without the crank or handle—all of which the jury answered in favor of the plaintiff. But the two material issues, to wit, "Was the fruit preserver, cabinet, or casket, as exhibited, in its essential parts, covered by older or superior letters patent?" and "Was the plaintiff prevented from selling the fruit preserver, cabinet, or casket by reason of an older and superior patent right covering the crank or cylinder?" were both answered, "Cannot answer." Upon the trial not one word of an older or superior patent was said in the evidence. There was no attempt to show that there was an older or superior patent, or that any person had claimed such patent, or had interfered with the plaintiff in his attempt to make sales of his property. The defendants' exception, then, to the judgment pronounced on the verdict, was well taken.

New trial.

WEEKS v. WILKINS et al.

STATE GRANTS — REGISTRATION — INFANTS — DEEDS — DISAFFIRMANCE — REASONABLE TIME.

1. The registration of a grant from the state, which described the land by metes and bounds, and stated that the grant was in the same form as another named registered grant, was not defective because of the failure to copy the entire grant.

2. By analogy to the statute giving an infant three years after majority to bring action against a disseisor, three years after majority should be regarded as a reasonable time within which an infant may disaffirm his deed; and this is so even though the deed passes only a remainder, and the life tenant is still living when the infant attains majority, and continues to live for more than three years thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by S. M. Weeks against J. T. Wilkins and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. D. Kerr and J. L. Stewart, for appellants. F. R. Cooper, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff against the defendants for the recovery of the land described in the complaint. The defendants, in their answer, denied the plaintiff's title. The plaintiff introduced the original entry book of Sampson county, containing the following entries: "May 12, 1791. No. 256. Arch Carraway enters 200 acres of land on Rye Branch, joining Elizabeth Bass' line." Grant from the state to Arch Carraway, Grant Book B, p. 27, reading as follows: "No. 417. Arch Carraway 200 acres. This grant to Arch Carraway for 200 acres of land are in same form as the aforesaid registered grant in this book, page 1 and 2, only the persons' names and the various courses of the same, to-wit. [Then follows a description of the land by metes and bounds.] At Newberne, the 1st day of January, in the seventeenth year of our independence, and in the Year of Our Lord one Thousand, seven hundred and ninety three. [Then follows the signature of the Governor and Secretary of State.] This grant is registered March 10, 1798." Defendants objected upon the ground that the registration was imperfect; that the registrar should have copied the entire grant, instead of a part of it, and referring to the registry of other grants for the evidence. Plaintiff then offered in evidence the grant referred to in the Carraway grant, which is the first grant in said book, and registered in full. The others are registered, like the Carraway grant, by reference to said first grant. Said first grant was admitted to be correct in form and correctly registered. The objection was overruled, and the defendants excepted. We think the objection was properly overruled, and that the registration was sufficient.

The plaintiffs then introduced deeds showing a chain of title from Carraway to Richard Warren, and the will of Richard Warren, devising the land to Hester Weeks and her children. It was in evidence that Hester Weeks and her children resided on the land in controversy until the execution of the deed to Brittain A. Edwards, June 1, 1863.

The plaintiff, by way of estoppel, and for the purpose of attacking the same, offered in evidence a deed from Hester Weeks and her children to Brittain A. Edwards, dated June 1, 1863. This deed is signed by Hester Weeks and all of her children except Betsy Ann Raynor. At the time of executing said deed, Susan Catherine Williford, Phoebe Williford, and Mary J. Jones were married women. They were not privily examined touching their execution of the deed. Minta Tew was a widow, and more than 21 years of age. The jury found upon the issues submitted to them that Martha Weeks and Hester O. Weeks were also minors at the time of executing said deed. It was admitted that the plaintiff, Sampson Weeks, was a minor at the time he signed said deed. This deed was probated and registered upon the oath and examination of the subscribing witnesses thereto. There was evidence tending to show that the defendants claimed portions of said land under Brittain A. Edwards. The complaint does not set out what portions of said land were claimed by the several defendants, nor does their answer throw any light upon this question. Much confusion grows out of the indefinite allegations in the pleadings. The complaint should have set out in full the tracts of land of which the several defendants were in possession.

We are not sure that in the confused condition in which this record is sent to us we have been able to fully understand and pass upon the large number of exceptions. As the case must be sent back for a new trial, we think, upon the pleadings being properly amended, many of the exceptions now in the record will not again be presented. For the purpose of deciding such questions as are fairly presented, we understand the condition of the title to be as follows: The land in controversy belonged to Hester Weeks for life, with remainder to her eight children, by virtue of the will of Richard Warren, as construed by the court in partition proceedings. On June 1, 1863, Hester Weeks and seven of her eight children executed a deed for said land to Brittain A. Edwards; one daughter—Betsy Ann Raynor—not joining therein. At the time of the execution of this deed three of her daughters were married women, and as to them, no privy examination being taken, the deed is void. Two of the daughters were minors; one daughter—Minta Tew—a widow, more than 21 years of age. Her interest, therefore, passed under the deed, and need not be considered. The plaintiff, Sampson Weeks, was a minor. The three undivided shares of the married women are eliminated, the deed being as to them void.

It appears from the record that Hester O. Weeks has since the date of the deed intermarried with Asher McCullen. Her age at the time of her marriage does not appear. Martha Weeks is still a feme sole. Upon these facts Brittain A. Edwards took the life estate of Hester Weeks and the one-eighth undivided interest of Minta M. Tew. As to the married women, the deed was void. In respect to the shares of Sampson Weeks, Martha Weeks, and Hester O. McCullen, the deed was voidable upon their arriving at full age. Hester Weeks, the life tenant, died July 10, 1896. On the 1st day of June, 1899, all of the living children, together with the heirs of Susan Williford, deceased, executed a deed conveying the land to plaintiff, Sampson Weeks. We find in said deed the following language: "And the parties of the first part do hereby disaffirm and repudiate a certain paper writing purporting to be a conveyance of a portion of the land described in said will to one Brittain Edwards, dated June 1, 1863, and registered in Book 35, p. 898, in the registry of Sampson county." The plaintiff testified that he was 35 years old at the date of the deed made to the defendant J. T. Wilkins, October 1, 1891. He was asked if he knew about that and other trades in regard to the land, and whether he ever objected or warned purchasers. These questions were asked with a view to showing that plaintiff's disaffirmance of the deed of 1863 to Edwards was not in a reasonable time, and with a due regard to the rights of purchasers. The court intimated that it would hold that mere silence on the part of those in remainder during the continuance of the life estate did not amount to an affirmance. The plaintiff was asked if he knew of any acts done on the land in the nature of waste. He replied that he thought McPhail cut some sawmill logs, and that he hauled some of these logs by team, and that Daughtry cleared some of the land, but that clearing up the land improved it; that he never objected to such acts. The defendants contended that the deed from the children of Hester Weeks to the plaintiff was void as to two of them upon the ground of fraud in the factum. His honor ruled that upon all of the testimony there was no evidence, competent to be considered by the jury, to sustain this allegation, and we concur with him therein. The only question which we are enabled to decide from this record is presented by his honor's instruction, as follows: "As to the share of Sampson M. Weeks, the plaintiff, it being admitted that he was not twenty-one years old at the time he signed said deed, the plaintiff's right to recover that share depends upon his affirmance of said deed after becoming of full age. If the plaintiff, by acts, conduct, or words, affirmed or ratified said deed after becoming of full age, then, of course, he cannot recover; but mere silence on the part of a remainderman, unaccompanied by acts or words tending to show affirmance during the continuance of a life estate, will not of itself amount to an affirmance; and failure to bring suit against parties in possession during the continuance of a life estate is not an affirmance; and the court charges you that a delay of less than three years, as in this case, after the termination of the life estate, unaccompanied by acts, conduct, or words, is not an affirmation. * * * An act of disaffirmance must be clear, positive, and unequivocal, and must indicate clearly their intention to disaffirm and repudiate said deed. The commencement of an action to recover the land, as in this case, is such an act of disaffirmance, and the subsequent conveyance of the land described in the original deed with knowledge of its purpose and effect is likewise such an act of disaffirmance." We take it to be well settled in this state that the deed of an infant, operating as it does, under our registration laws, by transmutation of possession, is voidable, and not void. Hogan v. Strayhorn, 65 N. C. 279; McCormic v. Leggett, 53 N. C. 425; Ward v. Anderson, 111 N. C. 115, 15 S. E. 933; Cox v. McGowan, 116 N. C. 131, 21 S. E. 108; Kent, Com. 236; 1 Devlin on Deeds, 86. We do not find in the record any evidence of acts on the part of Sampson Weeks amounting to an affirmation, and his honor would have been justified in so saying to the jury. The institution of this action is a clear disaffirmance, as his honor told the jury. The defendants, however, asked the court to instruct the jury that such disaffirmance must be within a reasonable time after the plaintiff reached his majority. He was of the opinion, and so instructed the jury, that, in view of the existence of the outstanding life estate of Hester Weeks, the action brought within three years after her death was within the time prescribed by law. The defendants excepted, and this exception presents the question which must be decided by us.

This court has not, so far as the brief and argument of counsel and our own investigation show, decided the question as to when an infant, after arriving at his majority, must disaffirm his deed. The only case approaching it is Dewey v. Burbank, 77 N. C. 260, in which it is said that after his reaching his majority he may avoid or confirm it, and that continuing to reside on the land and paying a part of the purchase money (he being in that case the purchaser) amounts to an election to ratify. The author of Devlin on Deeds, vol. 1, § 91, after discussing the authorities, says: "The most reasonable rule seems to be that the right of disaffirmance should be exercised within a reasonable time after the infant attains his majority, or else his neglect to avail himself of this privilege should be deemed an acquiescence and affirmation on his part of his conveyance. The law considers his contract a voidable one on account of its tender solicitude for his rights and the fear that he may be imposed upon in his bargain. But he is certainly afforded ample protection by allowing him a reasonable time, after he reaches his majority, to determine whether he will abide by his conveyance, executed while he was a minor, or will disaffirm it.

And it is no more than just and reasonable that, if he silently acquiesces in his deed, and makes no effort to express his dissatisfaction with his act, he should, after the lapse of a reasonable time, dependent upon circumstances, be considered as fully ratifying it." We think this is a just and reasonable rule. It is sustained by a large number of well-considered cases. Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494, in which Hosmer, C. J., says: "A ratification of the contract has often been inferred from the silence of the infant after his arrival at full age, coupled with his retaining possession of the consideration, or availing himself in any manner of his conveyance. * * * The omission to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time has been held sufficient evidence of a ratification." Bigelow v. Kinney, 3 Vt. 353, 21 Am. Dec. 589; Searcy v. Hunter, 81 Tex. 644, 17 S. W. 272, 26 Am. Rep. 837. In Blankenship v. Stout, 25 Ill. 132, it is held that a conveyance of real estate by an infant must be disaffirmed within three years after his arrival of full age; Caton, C. J., saying: "It is of the greatest importance that the common assurances of the country be rendered as certain as possible. Purchasers should be able to know, after ascertaining the facts, whether they can purchase a good title or not. * * * This end is essentially promoted by fixing a definite limit within which a conveyance made by an infant shall be repudiated after he attains his majority. Although the tenth section of the statute * * * does not in terms apply to such cases, yet we are disposed to adopt the limitation there prescribed for the bringing of an action by an infant after he attains his majority as a reasonable time within which he should repudiate a conveyance of real estate executed by him while an infant." Tyler on Infancy, 70. In Bigelow v. Kinney, supra, it was held that disaffirmance 11 years after majority was not within a reasonable time. Drake's Lessee v. Ramsay, 5 Ohio, 252. While we have no statute fixing the time within which an infant is required to disaffirm his conveyance, we think that, upon the reason of the thing, and in consonance with the policy of the law, which seeks to quiet titles and encourage improvement of real estate, the infant should exercise his election within a reasonable time. The statute gives him three years after arrival at majority within which to bring his action against a disseisor. It seems to us that the same time, by analogy, should be fixed as the period within which he should determine whether he will disaffirm his deed.

But it is said that Mrs. Hester Weeks owned the life estate, and that pending such estate he had no right of action to sue for the possession of the land. We do not think this material. His right to disaffirm his deed was entirely independent of his right to the possession of the land. He could easily have disaffirmed by returning the purchase money, or by some other unequivocal act which would have put innocent purchasers on notice. He could have brought his action to remove a cloud from his title under Acts 1893, p. 37, c. 6. He was, according to his testimony, 34 years of age in 1894, and therefore reached his majority in 1881. At the time of the institution of this action he was 39 years of age. He should, we think, have disaffirmed his deed within three years after he arrived at his majority.

The record before us illustrates the injustice which may be done by permitting an infant to remain quiescent for an unlimited time before doing some act which puts innocent purchasers on notice of a defect in their title. This land has been divided into five parcels, and as many persons have purchased, paid for, and it seems some of them, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, have cleared and improved it. Eighteen years after his majority, the plaintiff, for a nominal consideration, buys the interests of his brothers and sisters, and brings this action; thus disturbing the rights of innocent purchasers, and recovering, not only the land, but the rents and profits in excess of the amount paid by him for it. A stronger illustration of the wisdom of the law, which seeks to quiet titles, can hardly be found. His honor should have charged the jury that the plaintiff, Sampson Weeks, could not recover in respect to his one-eighth undivided interest.

There is no evidence in the record in regard to the age of Martha Weeks. Her conveyance to Sampson is a clear disaffirmance. Whether it was made within the three years after reaching her majority we are unable to see. It does not appear when Hester Weeks was born, or when she married. Whether her disaffirmance is in time will depend upon these facts. If she became covert before reaching majority, she is not barred of her right.

The record contains a number of admissions which should be incorporated in the judgment. As a new trial must be had, we think that the complaint should be reformed so as to contain "a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting the cause of action," and the defendants be permitted to answer. It would seem that, in view of the number of parties and interests involved, and the complicated questions of fact to be settled, a reference would expedite the final determination of the controversy.

We have not noted and decided many of the exceptions, because upon a new trial they may not and should not arise. There seems to be no doubt that the title vested in Mrs. Weeks for life remainder to her children, and that all of the defendants claim under them through Brittain Edwards. It seems equally clear that the defendants own the share of Minta M. Tew, and, under our decision, of Sampson Weeks, and that the plaintiff owns the shares of Betsy Raynor and the married sisters who signed the Edwards deed, but of whom no privy examination was had. This leaves the shares of Martha Weeks and Hester McCullen open for adjustment upon the facts as they may be shown, according to the principles we have attempted to lay down. We think that the judgment against the defendants for rents and profits should be reversed. The facts are not found upon which the amount of their liability depends. The case, it would seem, should go to a referee to settle these questions. When the rights of the parties are ascertained, a decree should be so drawn that it will quiet the title. Weeks v. McPhail, 128 N. C. 180, 38 S. E. 472. Let this be certified to the superior court of Sampson.

EVIDENCE — HEARSAY — WITNESSES — TRANSACTION WITH DECEDENT — PARTIES CLAIMING UNDER DECEDENT — SURETIES.

1. In an action to foreclose a trust deed, testimony that the deceased grantor had told witness that the debt secured was not paid was incompetent, as hearsay.

2. Code, § 590, provides that no person interested in the event of an action shall testify against one deriving his title or interest from a deceased person as to any personal transaction with the decedent. Held that, in a suit to foreclose a trust deed given by a decedent, testimony of plaintiff that the debt was not paid was within the statute, as relating to a transaction with deceased.

3. A married woman who joins in a trust deed of her land to secure the husband's debt is a mere surety.

4. In a suit to foreclose a trust deed given by a man and wife on the wife's property to secure the husband's debt, the wife was a party defendant, but the representative of the deceased husband was not. Held, that plaintiff might not, under Code, § 950, testify that the debt had not been paid, since the wife, as a surety, was within the protection of the statute.

5. A surety on a prosecution bond could not, under Code, § 950, as an interested party, testify against defendants as to a personal transaction with deceased, under whom they claimed.

6. The representative of a deceased trustor, who joined with his wife in giving a trust deed on the wife's separate property, is a necessary party to a suit against the widow and trustee for foreclosure of the trust deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Moore, Judge.

Suit by E. L. McGowan against J. R. Davenport and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Skinner & Whedbee, for appellants.

WALKER, J. This action was brought for the purpose of recovering a debt of $156 alleged to be due by G. A. McGowan to the plaintiff by open account, and of foreclosing a deed of trust given by G. A. McGowan and his wife, the defendant L. A. McGowan, to secure the payment of the same; the defendant J. R. Davenport being named in the deed as trustee. The deed of trust had been canceled on the margin of the registry by the trustee, in accordance with the statute. The plaintiff demanded judgment against Mrs. L. A. McGowan for the amount of the debt; that the cancellation of the deed of trust be set aside; that a foreclosure of the trust be ordered, and the property sold for the payment of the debt. The defendants pleaded that the debt had been fully paid and satisfied, and that therefore the cancellation had been properly entered, and they introduced evidence to establish their plea. The jury, under the evidence and instructions of the court, found (1) that the debt was contracted by G. A. McGowan, and not by L. A. McGowan; (2) that it had not been paid; (3) that L. A. McGowan at the time of the execution of the deed was the wife of G. A. McGowan; and (4) that the land conveyed by the deed was her separate property. The defendants moved for a new trial, upon exceptions stated. The motion was overruled, and the defendants excepted. Upon the verdict, the court adjudged that G. A. McGowan owed the debt, and that the cancellation of the deed was wrongfully made, and is not valid as against the plaintiff, and that the land be sold by a commissioner of the court for the purpose of paying the debt. The court further adjudged that the costs of the action be taxed against the defendants. To this judgment the defendants excepted and appealed.

In order to prove that the debt had not been paid, the plaintiff introduced as a witness John C. McGowan, who was permitted, over the defendants' objection, to testify that G. A. McGowan, who was then dead, had told him that he had not paid the debt. The testimony of the witness, to which exception was duly taken, was hearsay, and nothing else, and its admission was error. Lawrence v. Hyman, 79 N. C. 209; Gidney v. Moore, 86 N. C. 491; Henry v. Willard, 73 N. C. 35. This entitles the defendant to a new trial, but, as the case goes back, and as the other questions discussed before us upon the exceptions may again be presented, we will consider and pass upon them.

The plaintiff was permitted to testify that the debt had not been paid. It must be conceded that this testimony necessarily related to a personal transaction with the deceased, who was principal in the note, as it involved the idea that the deceased had not paid the debt to the plaintiff. Simpson v. Simpson, 107 N. C. 552, 12 S. E. 447. But it is said that the representative of G. A. McGowan, who was the principal, is not a party to the action, and the other defendants do not derive any title or interest from, through, or under him. While G. A. McGowan had no title to the land, the defendant Davenport, who is the trustee in the deed, could not have acquired any right, title, or interest unless G. A. McGowan had executed the deed with his wife.

His execution of the deed, in other words, was required in order to convey the title to Davenport. The latter, therefore, within the spirit and meaning, if not within the letter, of section 590 of the Code, derived his interest from, through, or under him. But this court has decided that testimony like this is incompetent for another reason, closely allied to the one we have just stated. The defendant L. A. McGowan, wife of G. A. McGowan, was but a surety for her husband. Shinn v. Smith, 79 N. C. 810. And, if a recovery is had against her, she will have her action over against her husband's estate for exoneration. Lewis v. Fort, 75 N. C. 251. Any testimony, therefore, which makes against her, will, in a material respect and in the same degree, though indirectly, affect her husband's estate. The plaintiff, being a party and directly interested in the result, was incompetent to give this testimony. This has been expressly decided. In Bryant v. Morris, 69 N. C. 444, the plaintiff sued the surety of a deceased constable on his official bond, and proposed himself to testify as to communications and transactions between himself and the constable, whose representative was not a party to the action, for the purpose of charging the defendant, the surety. He was held to be incompetent, under section 343, Code Civ. Proc. (now section 590 of the Code), on account of the relation of the parties. The court said: "If the plaintiff had sued the administrator of the dead constable, he could not have testified as to any transaction between him and the deceased, so as to affect his estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 343. But the defendant is not sued as administrator, but as surety to the dead constable, and the question is whether the plaintiff can testify as to transactions between himself and the deceased which affect the defendant as his surety. It is said that he ought not to be allowed to do this, because, whatever he recovers of the defendant as surety, the defendant can recover of the estate of the deceased constable. This would seem to be so, and therefore to allow the evidence against the surety is to allow it indirectly against the principal, which is the evil meant to be guarded against by the exception in the statute. So that, while the objection to the evidence is not within the letter, it is within the spirit, of the statute." No two cases could be more alike in their essential features than the one we have cited and the case at bar. The principle underlying the decision in Bryant v. Morris, supra, was recognized and applied in Lewis v. Fort, supra, where it is held that a judgment against the surety is at least evidence against the principal for the surety. The rule to be deduced from these authorities is that the surety, who comes not within the letter, but within the intentment, of the law, stands in the same position, and is entitled to the same protection, under section 590 of the Code, as the representative of his deceased principal, when sued. Hawkins v. Carpenter, 85 N. C. 484. The case of Bryant v. Morris had careful consideration by a court of exceptional ability, one of the justices having been a member of the commission which prepared and framed the Code of Civil Procedure. It was decided some time after section 343 (now 590) became a law, and at a time when that section had frequently been under consideration by this court, and when it was, as we are inclined to think, quite as well understood as it is now. The case has never been overruled or questioned as a precedent, but, on the contrary, has been cited with approval, as we will presently show. The principle it lays down being a just and reasonable one, we do not see why the case should not continue to be accepted as an authority.

It is well settled, we are told, that a party to an action is a competent witness, under section 590 of the Code, as to a transaction or communication with a deceased person, when the personal representative of the deceased, or any person who derives a title or an interest through or under him, is not a party to the action. This is true in some cases, but not in a case like the one at bar, and the authorities cited do not sustain the proposition as to such a case. In Shields v. Smith, 79 N. C. 517, which is much relied on, Hyman, the deceased, was not the principal of any of the defendants, and his estate was not liable over to them, or any of them. There was no such privity or connection between them and Hyman as would affect his estate by the judgment in the action. Besides, Mr. Justice Reade wrote the opinion of the court in Shields v. Smith and also in Bryant v. Morris, and we can hardly presume that he was inadvertent to the decision in the latter case, and intended to overrule it without even referring to it in Shields v. Smith. In Hawkins v. Carpenter, 85 N. C. 482 (decided some time after Shields v. Smith), the court expressly recognizes the decision in Bryant v. Morris as authority, upon the facts therein disclosed, and distinguishes it from the case then under consideration by the fact that the transaction was not with the person since deceased, but with an heir at law. Besides, the case of Hawkins v. Carpenter is clearly not in point for the purpose of sustaining the proposition, because the defendants had opened the door by proving a transaction with Durham, and the plaintiff was merely permitted to reply in regard to the same transaction. This came within the exception in the statute. The case is really an authority for the view we have taken of the testimony of the plaintiff, McGowan, and has already been cited in this opinion as sustaining it. In Gidney v. Moore, 86 N. C. 484, the defendants proved a transaction, not with the person since deceased, but with his agent; and in Morgan v. Bunting, Id. 66, the defendant proved a transaction, not with the intestate of the plaintiff, but with her father, who was in no way connected with the action, and had no interest, near or remote, therein. In Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043, the witness by whom it was proposed to prove the transaction with the person since deceased was not a party to the suit, nor interested in the event of it, nor did she ever have any such interest. The facts of Ledbetter v. Graham, 122 N. C. 753, 29 S. E. 1035, are substantially like those in this suit; but that case was disposed of by a per curiam order, without a written opinion, upon the authority of Shields v. Smith and Bunn v. Todd, neither of which, as we have seen, sustains the ruling, as the facts in the last two cases were materially different from those in Ledbetter v. Graham. We have never regarded a decision by per curiam order as a binding precedent. It merely declares the law of the particular case, and surely it should not have the effect of overruling a previous decision based on a well considered opinion, and especially when the latter was not commented on or even cited by the court.

We are of the opinion that the witness John C. McGowan was disqualified, under section 590, to testify that the principal in the debt, G. A. McGowan, then deceased, had admitted to him that the same had not been paid. The witness was a surety on the prosecution bond in this case, and was, by every authority upon the subject, interested in the event of the action. One who is a surety for the prosecution has a certain legal interest, which might be affected by the event or result of the action, being liable for costs if the plaintiff fails to recover; and this interest renders him incompetent to testify as to any transaction or communication with the party deceased, the same as if he were himself a party to the action. This principle was settled in Mason v. McCormick, 75 N. C. 263, which has repeatedly been affirmed. Peebles v. Stanley, 77 N. C. 243; Mason v. McCormick, 80 N. C. 244. In Peebles v. Stanley the witness was a co-obligor, and testified against his own interest. It is suggested that the witness was not incompetent, because, as surety on the prosecution bond, he could in no event be liable to the estate of the deceased for the costs of the action. This is a misconception of the true reason for the disqualification of the witness. The question is not whether he is liable to the representative of the deceased, who is not a party, or to any particular person, but whether the suit may so eventuate as to make him liable for the costs to anybody who is a party, and against whose interest he testifies. If the plaintiff fails, the witness will be liable as surety to the defendant for the costs, and is for that reason interested, and he testifies against the defendant, and consequently in favor of his own interest. It is further suggested that the defendant L. A. McGowan was permitted to testify as to the payment, and it would be unfair not to let the plaintiff do likewise. But the question must be decided according to the law, and without regard to any principle of fairness; and in the statute it is plainly and explicitly provided that, when one party testifies to a transaction or communication with the deceased, the other party may also testify, but only concerning the same transaction or communication. To permit the witness to go beyond this would be a distinct violation of the statute. Kesler v. Mauney, 89 N. C. 369; Sumner v. Candler, 92 N. C. 634; Burnett v. Savage, Id. 10; Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 590, p. 850, and cases cited.

It may be well to refer to the other question mentioned in the case, namely, whether the representative of a deceased mortgagor or trustor is a necessary party to a suit for foreclosure. It would seem, on reason and principle, if not on authority, that he is. In Averett v. Ward, 45 N. C. 192, it was held that he was a proper, but not a necessary, party. A case precisely like this in its facts is Mebane v. Mebane, 80 N. C. 34, in which it appeared that the wife had joined with her husband in conveying her land in trust to pay his debt. The husband died, and a suit to foreclose the mortgage was brought by the creditor against the widow. The court referred to and criticised the case of Averett v. Ward, and practically overruled it, by holding that the representative of the deceased husband was a necessary party. In the later case of Fraser v. Bean, 96 N. C. 327, 2 S. E. 159, it is said that the administrator of the mortgagor is not a necessary party, but the court simply refers to Averett v. Ward, without noticing the case of Mebane v. Mebane. In the face of the decision in Fraser v. Bean, the case of Mebane v. Mebane may yet be sustained upon its peculiar facts, namely, that the wife, as in our case, was but a surety for the husband, and, if her property should be taken to pay his debt, she would be entitled to recover over against his estate, and to have his property first subjected to its payment; and, upon these facts, the court laid much stress in Mebane v. Mebane, though it also stated broadly, and as a general principle, that the representative of the mortgagor is a necessary party. The facts in Averett v. Ward and Fraser v. Bean were not the same as in Mebane v. Mebane and the case at bar.

There was error in the rulings of the court as herein stated, for which there must be another trial. New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring in result). G. A. McGowan and wife, L. A. McGowan, 6th October, 1897, executed a deed in trust to J. R. Davenport upon the land in question, the property of L. A. McGowan, to secure certain indebtedness therein recited to be owing by G. A. McGowan and L. A. McGowan—among them, this indebtedness to the plaintiff by open account for $156.60 for borrowed money, as stated in said deed in trust. G. A. McGowan has died, and all the other indebtedness secured in the trust deed has been paid. This is an action alleging nonpayment of this debt; that the trustee has refused to foreclose the said trust, but has canceled the deed in trust on the margin of the registration thereof; and asks for a judgment against L. A. McGowan, and to set aside the attempted cancellation, and for foreclosure, and payment of the debt out of the proceeds. The jury having found that the indebtedness was owing by G. A. McGowan, and that it had not been paid, the court gave no personal judgment against L. A. McGowan, but ordered a foreclosure of the trust deed, and payment of the sum therein secured to the plaintiff out of the proceeds of sale.

It is well said in the opinion of Mr. Justice WALKER, "The question must be decided according to the law, and without regard to any principle of fairness," or, as Judge Daniel said long ago, "We cannot be wiser than the law." The law is explicit. It provides (Code, § 589), "No person offered as a witness, shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action." Section 590 excludes a party, etc., to the action, in his own behalf, etc., only when testifying as to a personal transaction with a person deceased, and then only "against the personal representative of the deceased person," or against the person succeeding to the title of the deceased. Here the personal representative of the deceased is not a party to the action, nor does the defendant succeed to his title. Q. E. D. The deceased never had any title to be conveyed. Had he survived his wife, he might have been tenant by the curtesy if she had not devised the property away. It was barely a possibility, certainly not a vested interest. The deceased was expressly inhibited by the Constitution from having, ex jure mariti, any interest in the property of his wife, which "shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female * * * as if she were unmarried." The joinder of the husband was not to convey his title and estate, for he had none, but was merely the "written assent" required to authorize the wife's conveyance. In Bryant v. Morris it is stated that the court read into the statute what was not there, for it says that it was "not within the letter" of the law. Accordingly that opinion has been distinguished, and never cited and affirmed as a precedent, and the law for the last 26 years has been uniformly held in accordance with the plain letter of the statute. Shields v. Smith (1878) 79 N. C. 517, affirmed since in Ledbetter v. Graham, 122 N. C. 754, 29 S. E. 1035, which is "on all fours" with this case, and Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043, which last analyzes the statute, and points out that no person is disqualified unless he is a party to the action, and then only as to a personal transaction with the deceased, and in such cases only when the other party is a personal representative of the deceased or holds his title, neither of which is the case here. Shields v. Smith, 79 N. C. 517, is also cited with approval on this point in Morgan v. Bunting, 86 N. C., at page 69, citing several cases; Gidney v. Moore, 86 N. C., at page 491, also citing numerous cases; Hawkins v. Carpenter, 85 N. C. 484. No point in section 590 has been better settled. Morris v. Bryant was a decision made when the Code was new, and which stated therein that it was contrary "to the letter of the law." As above stated, it has not been directly affirmed since in any case, but has been disregarded and effectually overruled by above decisions.

If, however, the express provision of the law is not to govern us, but our own conceptions of fairness, we must remember that the defendant L. A. McGowan testified at length as to the whole matter, and there is no provision of law disqualifying her. The burden was upon her to prove payment, and it would be manifestly unfair, were she to be competent, and the plaintiff incompetent against her, the real defendant, and against Davenport, her codefendant, when the plaintiff is seeking no relief against the estate of the deceased, and the estate is not a party to the action.

What effect the judgment may have against the estate of the deceased in any future action against it by the defendant is not before us. The plaintiff has no interest in that matter which can be served by his testimony here, and it is his interest only in this action which can disqualify him, and then only in the cases prescribed by the statute. The execution of the deed in trust and its registration are admitted in the answer, and, besides, those acts were not a "personal transaction" between the plaintiff and the deceased. McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 598, 8 S. E. 225; Thompson v. Onley (N. C.) 1 S. E. 620.

John C. McGowan, surety on the prosecution bond, was a competent witness for the same reasons above given as to the plaintiff. There was error, however, in permitting him to prove the declarations of G. A. McGowan, for the very reason that, his personal representative not being a party, such declarations were mere hearsay. For this reason, there should be a new trial.

There was no offer to make the personal representative of G. A. McGowan a party, and no exception that he was not a necessary party to this action, and that point is not before us. In Fraser v. Bean, 96 N. C. 327, 2 S. E. 159, it was held that the administrator is not a necessary party, even when the land on which the mortgage is to be foreclosed belonged to the intestate; affirming Averett v. Ward, 45 N. C. 192. Here the intestate had never had any interest in it, but merely gave his marital assent to the mortgage by his wife, as above stated. It would seem, however, that, as a surety may be sued without joining the principal, the property put up as security may be subjected without such joinder, especially when, as here, the surety does not ask that the principal be made a party.

VOORHEES, MILLER & CO. v. PORTER et al.

ACTIONS—RELIEF—APPEAL—CONTRACTS—AGREEMENT TO PAY ANOTHER'S DEBT—ACTION BY CREDITOR—GUARANTY.

1. On appeal a case is heard on the facts alleged in the pleadings, and where the plaintiffs have set forth such facts as entitled them to relief they will not be restricted to that demanded in their prayer for judgment, but may have any additional relief not inconsistent with the pleadings and the facts proved.

2. Where the purchaser of a stock of goods agreed, in consideration for the transfer, to pay the debts of the seller, and subsequently the purchaser made an assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, a creditor of the seller was entitled to have the assignee account with him, and entitled to recover from the assignee if he had sufficient assets under the assignment for that purpose.

3. Where the purchaser of goods agreed, in consideration of the transfer, to pay the debts of the seller, and a third person covenanted that the purchaser should faithfully perform the contract, such person was an absolute guarantor of payment, and a creditor of the seller might sue him without first proceeding against the principal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Voorhees, Miller & Co. against J. A. Porter, as trustee, and others. From a judgment as of nonsuit in favor of defendant Porter, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Action to recover a debt due to the plaintiffs by O. D. Blanton, and, for that purpose (1) to set aside an assignment by him to J. D. Brevard alleged to be fraudulent, (2) to enforce a trust as to certain funds in the possession of Brevard under a contract with Blanton that he would pay the same to Blanton's creditors, and (3) to recover against J. A. Porter and J. B. Bostic the amount of plaintiffs' debt upon their covenant given to Blanton by which they guaranteed a performance of said contract by Brevard and the payment of the money by him to the creditors. In November, 1892, Blanton was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $3,445.50 for goods sold and delivered, and for which Blanton gave the plaintiffs his two several promissory notes, with Cobb, Bostic, and W. M. Blanton as sureties. Plaintiffs obtained judgment on these notes in the federal court, but were unable to collect any part of the amount due upon the judgment, because of the insolvency of the defendants. On December 30, 1903, Blanton executed to J. D. Brevard an instrument in writing, by which he sold and conveyed to him his stock of goods, wares, and merchandise at their cost, less 12½ per cent., and, in consideration thereof, Brevard agreed that, after retaining $3,000 to pay a debt due to him from Blanton, he would hold the purchase money, and apply the same to the payment of (1) all debts due by Blanton on which Brevard is surety or indorser, and (2) all the other debts owing by Blanton upon which Bostic or Cobb is surety. It was then provided that the surplus, if any, should be paid to Blanton. On the same day Bostic and Porter executed their guaranty, by which they agreed that Brevard should "faithfully keep and perform all the covenants and agreements to be by him kept, done and performed according to the terms of the foregoing contract, dated this day, between him and Blanton," and "that he will pay faithfully the price of the goods sold to him by said contract according to the terms thereof and as therein stated," and they did "jointly and severally guaranty such performance and payment." There was a provision in the contract between Blanton and Brevard that the goods sold and conveyed to Brevard should be inventoried so as to describe and identify the goods more definitely, and so as to ascertain the exact amount of the purchase price to be held by Brevard for the creditors and to be paid to them. An inventory was accordingly made, and the net amount of the purchase money ascertained to be $18,158.47. On March 3, 1904, J. D. Brevard made a general assignment to J. A. Porter of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. There was evidence tending to show the execution of the several instruments above mentioned, and also to show that Cobb, Bostic, C. D. Blanton, and W. N. Blanton are insolvent. The plaintiffs allege that Porter had received the property assigned to him by Brevard, and sold it, and had failed to execute his trust by paying the proceeds of the sale or the price of the goods to the creditors of Brevard as required to do by the assignment, and "that neither the said Brevard, the said Bostic, nor the said Porter has ever paid anything to the plaintiffs, although the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid by virtue of the terms of said contract, and although they have repeatedly demanded payment," and that, while the assets received by Porter under the assignment amounted to $30,000, he has not paid out exceeding $5,000 to the creditors of Brevard, nor has he accounted for the proceeds of sale received by him, as it was his duty as assignee to do. The defendants in this suit are Bostic, Cobb, and Brevard, and J. R. Porter, individually and as assignee of J. D. Brevard. The prayer of the complaint is as follows: "(1) That the deed of assignment from the defendant J. D. Brevard to the defendant J. A. Porter be declared to be fraudulent and void, and that the said Brevard and Porter account for the said assets and proceeds thereof. (2) For judgment against the said Porter and the defendant J.

B. Bostic upon the contract mentioned in paragraph 7 of the complaint. (3) For such other and further relief," etc. At the close of the plaintiffs' evidence, the defendant Porter, individually and as assignee of Brevard, moved to dismiss the complaint, and for judgment as in case of nonsuit. Motion granted, and plaintiffs excepted and appealed from the judgment.

Merrimon & Merrimon, for appellants. F. A. Sondley and Tucker & Murphy, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). It appears in the record that the court below was of the opinion the plaintiffs could not recover because they were not in privity with the parties to the contract of December 30, 1902, by which Blanton conveyed his stock of goods to Brevard, and the plaintiffs therefore could not sue upon the contract, but were excluded from doing so by the rule laid down in Morehead v. Wriston, 73 N. C. 398, and Peacock v. Williams, 98 N. C. 324, 4 S. E. 550, and much of the argument in this court was addressed to this feature of the case. It is also stated in the record that in the argument of the motion to nonsuit in the lower court the plaintiffs' counsel admitted that there was no cause of action for subrogation, nor was any such equity claimed by the plaintiffs under the contract between Blanton and Brevard of December 30th, and that counsel further argued that while said contract was a bill of sale it constituted Brevard a trustee of the purchase price for the purpose of paying it to the creditors of Blanton, and that the plaintiffs had a primary equity to have it so applied, and that to enforce that equity they could sue Brevard and Porter directly, and also sue Porter on his guaranty hereinafter mentioned. It was argued by the defendants' counsel in this court that "there is no allegation in the complaint of any contract between Blanton and Brevard to any extent for the benefit of the plaintiffs," and that the plaintiffs in their pleading simply assert the right to follow the goods in the hands of Brevard as trustee, and do not aver that Brevard is individually the creditor of the plaintiffs.

We simply mention these matters for the purpose of stating that we are not bound here by any argument that counsel made below. We hear the case upon the facts alleged in the pleadings, and if the plaintiffs have set forth in their complaint such facts as entitle them to relief they will not be restricted to the relief demanded in their prayer for judgment, but may have any additional and different relief which is not inconsistent with the facts so alleged in their complaint, it being the pleadings and the facts proved which determine the measure of relief to be administered. Knight v. Houghtalling, 85 N. C. 17. In this case, it makes no difference, if such is the fact, that the plaintiff does not distinctly claim that the contract between Blanton and Brevard was for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and that he does claim only that Brevard held the goods in trust, and makes no claim against Brevard individually. He simply sets forth the facts of the case according to his version of them, which is the proper way to do, and upon those facts he prays for an accounting from Brevard and Porter "for the said assets and the proceeds thereof," meaning the assets received under the contract and assignment, and for judgment against Porter and Bostic as guarantors of the performance by Brevard of the contract, and for such other and further relief as they may be entitled to have in the premises. We cannot, therefore, agree with the learned counsel for the defendants that the plaintiffs are not entitled to call for a showing from Brevard and Porter as to the administration of their several and respective trusts under the contract and assignment, if the facts justify such relief, even though the plaintiffs may not have made any special or particular claim for that relief; but it is our opinion that the facts are sufficiently set forth in the complaint to entitle them to such relief, and, if Brevard and Porter have committed a breach of their trusts, they are further entitled to judgment against them respectively for any damages they have sustained by reason thereof.

The case, in one aspect of it, turns upon the question whether the plaintiffs can sue Brevard for failing to pay over to them their share of the price he agreed to pay for the property sold to him by Blanton, and we are unable to see why he cannot do so. The case is not like Morehead v. Wriston, supra. In that case the substance of the agreement was that Wriston, the incoming partner, would indemnify the old firm against the payment of its debts, and this view of the case is fully explained and made clear by Smith, C. J., in Peacock v. Williams, 98 N. C. 324, 4 S. E. 550, in which he says: "The agreement is in substance one for the indemnity of the owner of the property against its being subjected to the asserted lien, and is solely between the parties to it, with whom the plaintiff is not in privity. Here there is no promise to pay the plaintiff, and the defendant has no funds with which to make the payment." It will be observed that the distinction between the cases arises out of the particular nature of the contract, whether it be one strictly of indemnity, or one in which there is a direct and express promise to pay to the creditor the amount of his claim out of the funds placed in the hands of the party who is sought to be charged, or which are held by him for that specific purpose. This doctrine, that the creditor may himself sue directly the party so holding the funds which have been dedicated by the debtor to the payment of the claims of his creditors, is recognized in Woodcock v. Bostic, 118 N. C. 822, 24 S. E. 362, as is also the creditor's right to proceed in equity to have the fund applied, according to the intention of the debtor and the agreement of the party who holds it, to the uses for which it was created, whether the right can be enforced at law or not. It is true the court held in that case that the action was in form ex contractu, and that, as the guaranty of Ray to Settle and Bostic was not assignable, even to the plaintiff, Mrs. Woodcock, the plaintiff could not recover; but there is a strong intimation that she could have recovered if she had properly pleaded her equity, or set forth facts upon which equitable relief could be based. When the court said in that case, "she cannot have equitable relief, because she has prayed for none," it simply meant that there was no sufficient allegation of an equity upon which a prayer for such relief could be predicated, for we find it to be well settled by the decisions of this court that, if the plaintiff in his complaint states facts sufficient to entitle him to any relief, this court will grant it, though there may be no formal prayer corresponding with the allegation, and even though relief of another kind may be demanded. Knight v. Houghtalling, supra; Gillam v. Insurance Co., 121 N. C. 369, 28 S. E. 470. In the case last cited. Clark, J., for the court, says: "Under the Code the demand for relief is immaterial, and the court will give any judgment justified by the pleadings and proof,"—citing numerous cases. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 584, and notes to section 425.

In the case at bar, all the facts which in our opinion are necessary to constitute a good cause of action, even in equity, are set forth, and, besides the prayer for special relief, there is a prayer for general relief, or, to be more accurate, for other and further relief than that specially demanded. If the plaintiffs by their pleadings and proof are entitled to recover against the defendants Brevard and Porter, even by way of subrogation, we would direct that relief to be administered, notwithstanding that in the argument below the particular equity was not claimed but disclaimed, because we act, in the adjudication of rights, not upon arguments, but upon the pleadings and evidence, when there has been an involuntary nonsuit as in this case, or upon the pleadings and findings of the jury when there has been a verdict, the arguments of counsel being only intended to aid us in understanding the case, and not being in any sense an estoppel upon counsel or the party whom he may represent. Parties are bound by admission of facts, but not by arguments or admissions as to the law. Arguments of counsel are exceedingly valuable in enabling us to ascertain the true principles of law upon which the decision of the cause in its last analysis must rest, and especially so when they are as searching, able, and exhaustive as they were in the case at bar, and exhibit such a complete mastery by counsel of the facts and law of the case, but parties must not be concluded or prejudiced by any mistaken view of the law presented during the course of the argument in the lower court or in this court. A contrary course would result in our deciding the case not according to the law but according to the argument. We do not intend to imply, for we do not think, that any admission has been made in this case in arguendo calculated to prejudice the plaintiffs, whose counsel may have chosen wisely and well among the several grounds of action open to him, and who may have selected the strongest one upon which to base his claim for relief.

It is not necessary that the plaintiffs should show in this case any right to equitable relief by way of subrogation. They contend that their equity, or, more properly speaking, their cause of action, whether legal or equitable, is a primary and not a secondary one; that Brevard, as the consideration for the purchase of the goods, promised and agreed, not merely to indemnify Blanton against any and all claims of his creditors, but to pay directly and immediately to his creditors who are named in the contract, and in the order and according to the classification therein stated, all of the said claims. This, the plaintiffs' counsel argued, impresses a trust upon the purchase price of the goods in the hands of Brevard. Conceding this to be so, we do not see how the condition of the plaintiffs is improved by reason of it. If Blanton had placed in the hands of Brevard a fund for the payment of his debts, or if Brevard, when he purchased the goods, had set apart a certain fund in payment of the purchase price of the goods and for the purpose of paying Blanton's creditors, and if either of the funds, being capable of identification, had gone into the hands of Porter as assignee, the plaintiffs, or any other creditor of Blanton mentioned in the contract with Brevard could follow the fund in the hands of Porter and subject it to the payment of his claim. But such is not the case here. The purchase price of the goods consisted merely in the promise of Brevard to pay the claims of creditors, which he failed to do, and, while he is liable to Blanton or to his creditors for this breach of his contract, he did not assign to Porter any part of his property which can be said to represent a trust fund, and which can be applied to the claims of Blanton's creditors in preference to the claims of other creditors secured by Brevard's assignment. In other words, the law will not compel the assignee to set aside, for the benefit of Blanton or his creditors, an amount equal to the inventoried value of the goods received by Brevard under the contract in payment of the purchase price of the goods.

But the plaintiffs are entitled to relief in another aspect of the case. In the first place, they are creditors of Blanton, and are entitled to receive payment of their claims from Brevard under the provisions of the contract by which the latter purchased the goods and agreed to pay Blanton's debts, and being thus secured, and Brevard having failed to pay them the share to which they are entitled under the contract, they have the right to call on Brevard for an account of the debts and liabilities of Blanton secured by the contract, and of the amount of the purchase price applicable thereto, so as to ascertain the amount due from Brevard to them, and this amount they can recover from the assignee of Brevard if he has received any assets which should be applied to the payment of this debt. They acquired no priority by reason of the peculiar nature of Brevard's liability to them, but they occupied the same position that they would have held if they had been general creditors of Brevard at the time of the assignment. They are entitled, though, to have the assignee of Brevard account with them, so that it can be ascertained whether there are any assets in his hands which should be devoted to the payment of their claims against Brevard.

The plaintiffs are also entitled to recover from Porter, as guarantor, the amount due them from Brevard under the contract with Blanton, and Porter may absolve himself from this liability if he has sufficient assets for that purpose, or reduce the amount thereof, if he sees fit to do so, by voluntarily paying the plaintiffs whatever is due them under the assignment; and, if the plaintiffs cannot make the full amount due them under the Brevard contract out of Porter, they can recover the balance out of any assets in the hands of Porter, as assignee, which are applicable to the payment of their claims; and, conversely, if the assets in the hands of the assignee are not sufficient to pay their claims, then Porter, as guarantor, will be liable for the balance. But the plaintiffs may proceed against Porter in the first instance for the recovery of the entire amount, or against the assignee for an account and settlement of his trust and the payment of the amount due to them, or they may proceed against both, as they may be advised. See Brown v. Bank, 79 N. C. 244, as explained and distinguished in Bank v. Alexander, 85 N. C. 852. As Porter covenanted that Brevard should faithfully perform the stipulations of his contract with Blanton, and "faithfully pay the price of the goods sold to him by said contract according to the terms thereof," he is an absolute guarantor of payment as distinguished from a guarantor of collection, and the plaintiffs have the right to sue him immediately upon his default, without first proceeding against and exhausting the principal. Jones v. Ashford, 79 N. C. 172; Jenkins v. Wilkinson, 107 N. C. 707, 12 S. E. 630, 22 Am. St. Rep. 911; Hutchins v. Bank, 130 N. C. 285, 41 S. E. 487; Cowan v. Roberts (at this term) 46 S. E. 979.

We have stated the general principles which we think are applicable to this case, and which, as we will now proceed to show, are sustained by recent decisions of this court.

In Shoaf v. Insurance Co., 127 N. C. 308, 37 S. E. 451, 80 Am. St. Rep. 804, it appeared that the plaintiff had received a policy of fire insurance from the Merchants' Insurance Company, and while the policy was in force the defendant, the Palatine Insurance Company, reinsured all the outstanding risks of the Merchants' Company. By the contract of reinsurance it was provided that no holder of a policy in the Merchants' Company should be entitled to enforce the contract against the Palatine Company, but that they should sue the Merchants' Company alone, and the Palatine Company agreed to pay all claims legally arising and duly proved against the Merchants' Company, and all costs and expenses of litigation. In that case the court held that the plaintiff, whose property had been destroyed by fire, and who had complied with the terms and conditions of his policy, was entitled to recover against the Palatine Company. The court thus states the reason for its decision: "The plaintiffs were neither a party to nor in privity with said contract. The question is, have they an interest in or arising out of the contract? The defendant is bound to indemnify the reinsured for all risks and loss, and the reinsured at the same time is bound to indemnify the plaintiffs for risks and loss. Does the defendant's liability inure to the benefit of the plaintiffs, and, if so, can the plaintiffs directly enforce their claim for loss against the defendant? The unearned premium at the date of the contract was a part of the consideration passing to the defendant for its risk and liability assumed. In this unearned premium the plaintiffs had an interest at the time of the reinsurance. The principle sanctioned by several respectable authorities is this: If A., on receipt of a good and sufficient consideration, agrees with B. to assume and pay a debt of the latter to C., then C. may maintain an action directly on such contract against A., although C. is not privy to the consideration received by A. The case before us seems to come within the same principle. Our Code (section 177) provides that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. In all the cases close attention is given to the language of the agreement. In the present case the defendant expressly assumes the liability in case of loss, but agrees to pay to the Merchants' Company only after claims have been duly proved in an action against the Merchants' Company. We can see no reason why the plaintiffs may not do directly that which it must be admitted they can do indirectly, nor do we see how the defendant is prejudiced thereby. The defendant suggests no such danger, but relies solely upon the ground that it has no contract with the plaintiffs."

Our case is stronger than the one just cited, for Brevard expressly promised to pay to the creditors of Blanton, and his promise was based upon a good and sufficient consideration.

In Gorrell v. Water Co., 124 N. C. 328, 32 S. E. 720, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598, the plaintiff sued the defendant, the water supply company, for damages to property alleged to have been caused by the negligent failure of the defendant to furnish water and a sufficient pressure at its hydrants for the purpose of extinguishing a fire which destroyed her property, the defendant having previously entered into a contract with the city of Greensboro, where the property was situated, to supply said city with water for extinguishing fires and for other purposes. In passing upon a demurrer to the complaint, this court, through the present Chief Justice, said: "One not a party or privy to a contract, but who is a beneficiary thereof, is entitled to maintain an action for its breach. This has been sustained by many decisions elsewhere"—citing numerous cases from other states. 124 N. C., at page 333, 32 S. E. 720, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598.

But still more to the point is the case of Gastonia v. Engineering Co., 181 N. C. 863, 42 S. E. 858, in which it appeared that one of the defendants, the engineering company, undertook to construct for the plaintiff the town of Gastonia "a waterworks, sewerage, and lighting system," and the other defendant, the American Surety Company, by a bond given for the purpose, guaranteed the performance of the contract by its codefendant. The plaintiffs, other than the town of Gastonia, sued the defendants for work and labor performed for and materials furnished to the engineering company in the construction of the works under their contract. The court held that the contract of the engineering company was made for the benefit of the persons who performed the labor and furnished the material, and, as there was an express provision for the payment of their claims, they were the beneficiaries of the contract, and that they either singly or collectively could sue the engineering company and its surety, and recover the amounts due to them respectively. The court distinguishes the case of Morehead v. Wriston from the case then under review, by the fact that in the former case there was no indication of any intent of the parties that the creditors of the old firm should have any benefit under the contract, the contract in that case being one strictly of indemnity. In Lacy v. Webb, 180 N. C. 545, 41 S. E. 549, it is said: "If the state had been nothing more than the beneficiary of the bonds, it could maintain this action," and "it is not the case either of subrogation or substitution." The party, in other words, for whose benefit the contract is made, is the real party in interest under the Code, and sues in his own right, and not in another's right to which he is subrogated by any principle of equity; and especially is this true when the money due under the contract is made payable directly to him.

But we think the case of Mason v. Wilson, 84 N. C. 51, 37 Am. Rep. 612, is directly in point. The doctrine there stated is that if a third person promises the debtor to pay his antecedent debts in consideration of property placed in the hands of the promisor by the debtor for the purpose, which is afterwards converted into money, the creditors may recover on the promise or for money had and received, "for although," says the court, "the promise is in words to pay the debt of another, and the performance of it discharges that debt, still the consideration was not for the benefit or ease of the original debtor, but for a purpose entirely collateral, so as to create an original and distinct cause of action"; and it is immaterial, as is further said by the court, whether the liability of the original debtor is continued or not, the promise being an independent and original one, founded upon a new consideration, and binding upon the promisor. In our case, though the property was not received for the purpose of being converted into money in order to pay the debt out of the proceeds, the promise to purchase it at a fixed price, and to pay the amount of that price to the creditors of the vendor, amounts to the same thing, and brings our case within the principle of the third class mentioned in Mason v. Wilson (which authorizes the creditor to sue directly), namely "when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the original contracting parties." In such a case the creditors may sue the promisor, whether his debtor remains liable to him or not. Threadgill v. McLendon, 76 N. C. 24; Stanly v. Hendricks, 35 N. C. 86. In Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C., at page 13, Pearson, J., for the court, says that a new and distinct cause of action of the creditors against the third person, who receives money or the proceeds of property from the debtor to pay his debt, arises out of the promise, which is implied by law from the receipt of the money or the proceeds of the property to pay the debt, and that the creditor may sue directly on this promise. In our case, Brevard bought the property, and expressly promised, as the consideration of the purchase, to pay the debts of Blanton, and the two cases are therefore in principle the same. In Threadgill v. McLendon, supra, Pearson, J., for the court, says substantially that, when a party receives property for another upon a promise to pay that other's debt, the creditor can sue and recover, not on any promise implied from the receipt of the property, but on the direct and express promise to pay the amount of the debt. The promise is binding, and inures directly to the benefit of the creditor, because the promisor has received the consideration, and in justice should be made to perform his undertaking.

It was suggested on the argument by the plaintiffs' counsel that the goods bought by Brevard from Blanton were charged with a trust in the hands of Brevard in favor of Blanton's creditors, and it seems that some courts have so held the law to be. Kaiser v. Waggoner, 59 Iowa, 40, 12 N. W. 754; Hamilton v. Barricklow, 96 Ind. 398. We do not know to what extent the courts, in making those decisions, were influenced by the doctrine of the vendor's lien, which is an equity not recognized by this court.

Again, it may be that, if Brevard was insolvent when the sale to him was made, it would be void as against Blanton's creditors, and his assignee in that case would have to account for the goods to such of Blanton's creditors as are mentioned in the contract, if the goods went into his hands. But there is no evidence of Brevard's insolvency at that time. It is not necessary, though, that we should pass upon those two questions, even if they were distinctly raised in the record, as the plaintiffs may be able to recover the amount of their claims from Porter upon the principles already stated, and the other matters may not be presented if the case should come back to us again.

We are of the opinion, upon a review of the whole case, that the plaintiffs have stated in their complaint a good cause of action against Brevard and Porter, and that there was evidence to sustain it. The court erred in its ruling. The judgment of nonsuit must be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

New trial.

STATE v. CLARK.

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—MURDER IN SECOND DEGREE—DEGREE OF PROOF—REASONABLE DOUBT—FELONIOUS INTENT—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

1. In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant slew deceased with a deadly weapon, and were left in doubt as to the circumstances of mitigation or excuse offered by defendant or derived from the state's evidence, they should convict of murder in the second degree, is erroneous, as it required him to establish the facts and circumstances in mitigation or excuse, not merely to the satisfaction of the jury, but to the exclusion of any doubt.

2. In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that the jury must convict defendant of murder in the second degree, if they were left in doubt as to whether the deceased was making a felonious assault on him, and as to whether the defendant believed or had reasonable ground for believing that the deceased was making an assault on him, was erroneous, as it required defendant to prove that deceased was actually making a felonious assault, and also that defendant at the time had reasonable grounds to believe that he was making such an assault.

3. In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that, if the jury were left in doubt as to the circumstances of mitigation or excuse offered by defendant or derived from the state's evidence, they should convict of murder in the secand degree, is prejudicial to defendant, though he was convicted of murder in the second degree, as it directs the jury that they cannot acquit if the defendant has not removed every doubt as to matters in excuse.

4. In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that if the deceased advanced on defendant with a drawn knife in such manner as to cause him reasonably to apprehend, and he did actually apprehend, that he was about to be slain or to receive enormous bodily harm, the defendant had the right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of deceased, without retreating, provided the assault made on defendant was felonious or with felonious intent, was erroneous, without explanation of the meaning of "felonious" or "felonious intent," especially where the jury had been charged that, if defendant reasonably apprehended that he was about to be slain or receive great bodily harm, he had a right to kill his assailant, without retreating, provided he acted in good faith and with ordinary fairness.

5. The instruction was erroneous because it was not necessary that the assault on defendant should have been felonious or committed with a felonious intent.

6. The instruction was erroneous because the jury could not have acquitted defendant if they had found that he had a well-grounded apprehension that the deceased was about to assault him with the intent to kill him or to do him great bodily harm, unless they further found that an assault had been actually committed with a felonious intent.

7. Under Code, § 413, requiring the court to state in plain and correct manner the evidence and declare and explain the law arising thereon, the duty of the court to explain technical words used in instructions cannot be omitted because some of the jury may be able to explain them.

8. Where an instruction states that, in order to justify the use of a deadly weapon in self-defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that to save his own life or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm the shooting by defendant was absolutely necessary, the error as to the existence of the absolute necessity to kill was not cured by a subsequent instruction explaining what kind of reasonable apprehension that he was about to be killed or to receive great bodily harm would have justified defendant in acting on the facts and circumstances as they appeared to him.

9. Where deceased was attempting to kill another or to do him great bodily harm, or defendant had a well-grounded belief or apprehension that he was attempting to do so, he had the right to interfere to prevent deceased from executing his intention, and if, while engaged in the interference for such lawful purpose, deceased advanced on him in such manner as to induce defendant to reasonably apprehend, and defendant did actually apprehend, that he was about to be killed or receive great bodily harm, he was justified in killing deceased to save his own life or to prevent great bodily harm to himself.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ashe County; Long, Judge.

Garfield Clark was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

R. A. Doughton, R. Z. Linney, and Geo. L. Park, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant was indicted for the murder of Charles Stanberry. The evidence tended to show that Stanberry and Asa Miller, both being under the influence of liquor, were cursing each other in the public road, when Stanberry grabbed Miller and threw him to the ground, and held him down while he brandished his knife over him, and with an oath threatened to cut his throat or to cut his head off. Miller begged Stanberry not to cut him. The defendant interfered for the purpose of preventing Stanberry from cutting Miller, and as he did so Stanberry cursed him and asked him what he had to do with it, at the same time advancing on him with a knife drawn, and in a threatening attitude. The defendant retreated, and when he was near the fence on the side of the road, and not more than four feet from Stanberry, the latter "grabbed at the defendant with his left hand and tried to strike him with his right," and the defendant thereupon fired at him with his pistol and inflicted a wound from which Stanberry died about a month afterwards. Before the defendant fired the pistol he warned the deceased not to advance on him with the knife. While it appeared that deceased was drunk, there was evidence tending to show that "he had good use of himself." A constable who was present told the bystanders not to let the deceased hurt Miller. Without reciting any more of the testimony, it is sufficient to say that it tended to show that the deceased was in the act of cutting Miller, with the present ability to do so, when the defendant interfered to prevent it.

At the request of the state the court gave the following instructions: "(2) If the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol, and are left in doubt as to the circumstances of mitigation or excuse offered by the defendant or derived from the state's evidence, they should convict of murder in the second degree. (3) If the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol, and are left in doubt from the whole evidence as to whether the deceased at the time he was slain was making a felonious assault upon the defendant with a knife, either because he did not then have the knife, or because he was too drunk to be capable of making such assault, and are left in doubt as to whether the defendant at the time he slew the deceased believed and had reasonable ground for believing that the deceased was making such felonious assault upon him with a knife, then they should convict of murder in the second degree." Defendant excepted to each of said instructions. The defendant's counsel requested the court to give the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased was engaged in a difficulty with Asa Miller, and was attempting to cut said Miller with a knife in the presence of the defendant, it was his duty to endeavor to suppress and prevent the same; and if, in attempting to do so, the deceased left off his difficulty with Miller, and made upon the defendant with a drawn knife in such a manner as to cause the defendant to apprehend, and he did apprehend, that he was about to be slain or to receive enormous bodily harm, then the defendant had a right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of the deceased, without retreating."

The court refused to give the instruction as asked, but in response thereto charged the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased was engaged in a difficulty with Asa Miller, and was attempting to cut said Miller with his knife, in the presence of the defendant [and the deceased was then capable of executing such a purpose], it was his duty to endeavor to suppress and prevent the same; and, if in attempting to do so, the deceased left off his difficulty with Miller, and made upon the defendant with a drawn knife in such manner as to cause the defendant to [reasonably] apprehend, and he did [actually] apprehend, that he was about to be slain or to receive enormous bodily harm, then the defendant had a right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of the deceased without retreating [provided the assault made upon the defendant was felonious or with felonious intent]." Defendant excepted. The parts of the instruction in brackets indicate the modifications of the defendant's prayer made by the court.

We are of opinion that the court erred in the instructions given in response to the state's second and third prayers. Those instructions required the defendant to establish the facts and circumstances in mitigation or excuse, not merely to the satisfaction of the jury, but to the exclusion of any doubt. We have recently said in State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1005, 43 S. E. 832, that the defendant is required to satisfy the jury of the existence of the mitigating circumstances in order to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter, or of the matters in excuse in order to sustain his plea of self-defense, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor even by a preponderance of evidence. It is well said in State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 502, that: "The principle of reasonable doubt has no application to the doctrine of mitigation. The rule in regard to that is that the jury must be satisfied by the testimony that the matter offered in mitigation is true;" citing State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. 450, 86 Am. Dec. 442; State v. Willis, 68 N. C. 20; and State v. Vann, 82 N. C. 632. In Asbury v. Ry. Co., 125 N. C. 574, 34 S. E. 654, the court held that a charge substantially like the one given in this case imposed upon the party having the burden the duty of making out his case beyond any doubt.

We have seen that the doctrine of reasonable doubt does not apply to the case of a defendant indicted for murder, when he is attempting to establish the mitigating circumstances necessary to reduce the grade of the homicide; and, if he is not required to prove them beyond a reasonable doubt, how can it be said that he must remove every doubt from the minds of the jury? This would include not only a reasonable doubt, but any kind of doubt, and therefore the burden upon him would be much lighter if the simple doctrine of reasonable doubt alone applied. This court has repeatedly said that the law does not require such strict proof from the defendant, but it is sufficient to reduce the homicide from murder to manslaughter, or to make out a plea of self-defense or other affirmative defense, if the jury are merely satisfied of the existence of the facts necessary for that purpose. We are aware that expressions like that used by the learned judge in this case may occasionally be found in our Reports, and they may seem to have received the tacit approval of this court; but when the cases are examined—and they are very few—it will be seen that they are mere dicta, or were inadvertently used, and we have not been able to find a single case in which the question has been presented and it has been decided that any doubt in the minds of the jury, as to the matters in mitigation or excuse, is sufficient to turn the scales against the defendant, and to convict him of murder or manslaughter, as the case may be, when the killing with a deadly weapon is admitted or proved. We would hesitate to follow a decision to that effect, because, as we think, it would be contrary to many cases where the question has been directly involved, and in which the principle which we have already stated has been laid down as a reasonable and just one. It imposes a greater burden than the defendant should be required to carry. Surely it cannot be that the state is required to exclude only a reasonable doubt in order to convict, and the defendant must exclude every doubt in order to reduce the grade of the homicide or to acquit himself of so serious a charge.

But the court also told the jury, in response to the state's third prayer for instructions, that they must convict the defendant of murder in the second degree if they were left in doubt as to whether the deceased, at the time he was slain, was making a felonious assault upon him, and as to whether the defendant, at the time he slew the deceased, believed or had reasonable ground for believing that the deceased was making a felonious assault upon him. This charge required the defendant to prove, not only that the deceased was actually making a felonious assault, but also that the defendant at the time had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, that he was making such an assault. Whether a felonious assault was being made or not, if the defendant, from the circumstances and surroundings as they then appeared to him, reasonably apprehended that the deceased was assailing him with the intent to kill him or to do him great bodily harm, he had the right, if he was not himself already in fault, to stand his ground and defend himself, and, if necessary, to take the life of his assailant, and this would be true though it afterwards appeared that the deceased did not in fact intend to commit a felonious assault. State v. Matthews, 78 N. C. 532; State v. Barrett, supra, and cases cited. The defendant is to be judged, not by what the deceased actually intended, but by the reasonable apprehension excited in his own mind by the acts of the deceased as to what the latter intended to do, provided the defendant acted in good faith and with ordinary firmness. But while he could thus act upon appearances, he must have judged, at his peril, of the grounds of his apprehension to this extent, that on his trial for the homicide, while the jury are bound by the law to pass upon the defendant's act according to the facts and circumstances as they appeared to him at the time he committed the homicide, they must be the sole judges of the reasonableness of the grounds of his apprehension. We stated this principle fully in Barrett's Case, and sustained it by the citation of authority, not only from the decided cases, but from the great writers upon the criminal law, and, without reproducing it, we are now content to refer to what we then said as applicable to the particular instruction of the court in this case. State v. Dixon, 75 N. C. 275.

It is said, though, to be a complete answer to those exceptions that the defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and could not therefore have been prejudiced by them. This is very far from being the case. The court plainly referred in both of the instructions, not only to "matters in mitigation," but to "matters in excuse," and told the jury that if they were in doubt as to either they should convict of murder in the second degree; that is, if they were in doubt as to the matters in excuse, which tended to acquit the defendant, they should convict him of murder in the second degree. It would be difficult to conceive of a charge more prejudicial than this one. If the jury entertained any sort of doubt as to the matters in excuse, they could not, under this instruction, acquit the defendant, for they were directed not to do so. If they entertained no doubt, it was as much their duty to acquit as it was in the other case put to convict, and yet they convicted of manslaughter instead of acquitting. It is true that if there has been error the defendant must show that he has been prejudiced before he is entitled to a new trial, but, when the court tells the jury that they cannot acquit if the defendant has not removed every doubt as to the matters in excuse, the prejudice to the prisoner is perfectly manifest. One of the fallacies in supposing otherwise arises from not giving heed to the fact that both instructions referred not only to matters in mitigation but to matters in excuse, and therefore to instruct the jury that, if they had any doubt as to the matters in excuse, they should convict of murder in the second degree, was the same as telling them that in such a case they could not acquit.

It is very true that when the killing with a deadly weapon is either admitted or proved, and nothing else appears, the presumption is that the defendant is guilty of murder in the second degree, and every matter of excuse or mitigation must be shown by the defendant, but only to the satisfaction of the jury, and there the rule stops, and it is unsafe to substitute any new, untried, and unnecessary formula for this simple principle, which has been approved in all cases, and especially commended by this court as the only safe and correct one. We said in State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1012, 43 S. E. 832: "It is well not to depart from established forms and precedents which are the products of the wisdom and wide experience of the sages of the law. It is said, in the cases just cited, that the prisoner must satisfy the jury, neither beyond a reasonable doubt nor yet by a preponderance of testimony, but simply satisfy them, of the existence of facts and circumstances which mitigate the offense or which make good a plea of self-defense. We are not prepared to say whether the jury can become satisfied of the existence of a fact unless the evidence in favor of its existence is stronger [than] or preponderates over that against its existence. But what we do say is that it is best to follow settled forms in the trial of causes." In the case of State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 512, 6 S. E. 420, the expression now objected to appeared in the charge of the judge in the lower court, but there was no exception taken to it, and the language of the court in the opinion did not make the slightest reference to it. The case of State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457, 6 S. E. 657, would seem to be clearly against the state's contention in this case. The instructions as to the burden of proof in regard to insanity was there rejected because of the use in them of the very expression "if the jury are left in doubt," etc., and the court expressly recognizes the rule to be that the defendant is required only to satisfy the jury. In State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488, the objectionable words are used by Faircloth, J., inadvertently, and without the slightest reference to the facts of the case, or the exceptions, which did not present the question at all; and the same may be said of the cases of State v. Jones, 98 N. C. 651, 8 S. E. 507, and State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. 722, 18 S. E. 394. The case of State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 676, is an authority against the state, for in that case the principle which the court, by Smith, C. J., referred to as "settled and put at rest by judicial decisions," is the rule established by State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26, and a long line of cases ending with State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1005, 43 S. E. 832, namely, that the defendant is only required to show matters in mitigation or excuse to the satisfaction of the jury. It is not necessary to review each of the cases cited by the state. We have carefully examined them, and have not been able to find a single one among them, or indeed any other case—for we have diligently searched everywhere—in which such an instruction was held to be correct, when exception was taken to it, as in this case. In Pool v. State, 87 Ga. 526, 13 S. E. 556, the court held that a request to charge that, if there is any doubt, the jury should acquit, required that the jury should be satisfied beyond all doubt, and was therefore erroneous. It is conceded by the state that the defendant is not required to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt as to the mitigating circumstances, and, if so, how can he be required to satisfy them beyond all doubt by excluding "any doubt" which may be in their minds, as said in Pool v. State, supra?

When it is said that the jury cannot be "satisfied" that the plea of self-defense is true if "they are left in doubt about it," nothing more or less is meant or can be intended than that the defendant must exclude from the minds of the jury not only every reasonable doubt, but every other kind of doubt, which is directly opposed to all authority. The true principle is stated in State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 684, 28 S. E. 353, as follows: "Facts offered by the prisoner in excuse or mitigation need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but only to the satisfaction of the jury," and this is all of it. Referring to the rule (as thus stated) in State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 683, Smith, C. J., said: "If anything can be settled and put at rest by judicial decisions, this principle has been, and we cannot now permit it to be drawn in question without impairing the confidence which ought to be reposed in the integrity and stability of the judicial administration of the law."

The suggestion that, if we follow this established precedent of the law, unrestrained violence and lawlessness may ensue, is one to which we can give no heed. If we take our eyes from the law and give attention only to consequences, or if we stop to consider who is morally right or wrong, without regard to right or wrong as judicially ascertained, we will soon have a government not of law but without law, and the lawlessness which is sought to be avoided will follow as an inevitable result. We must apply the law as we find it to be, and not as we think it should be, for to do the latter would be to legislate, and not to expound.

But we think the court inadvertently fell into error when it responded to the defendant's prayer for instructions, and told the jury that, if the deceased advanced upon the defendant with a drawn knife in such manner as to cause him reasonably to apprehend, and he did actually apprehend, that he was about to be slain or to receive enormous bodily harm, the defendant had the right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of the deceased, without retreating. Thus far the charge was correct, but the court added to this instruction the following: "Provided the assault made upon the defendant was felonious or with felonious intent." As the court superadded these words to the prayer of the defendant, or, rather, to its own response to that prayer, it certainly became necessary that some explanation should be made to the jury as to the meaning of the term "felonious or with felonious intent." The word "felonious" is a technical one, and not supposed to be understood by laymen, of whom juries are composed. In State v. Gaither, 72 N. C. 458, it is said to be the duty of the judge to explain to the jury what is meant by felonious intent, and that it is error not to do so. In State v. Coy, 119 N. C. 908, 26 S. E. 120, the court says: "What is meant by felonious intent is a question for the court to explain to the jury, and whether it is present at any particular time is for the jury to say," citing several cases. It was all-important in this case, because of the connection in which the words were used, that such an explanation should have been made. The jury had already been told that, if the defendant reasonably apprehended that he was about to be slain or to receive great bodily harm, he had a right to kill his assailant, without retreating, provided he acted in good faith and with ordinary firmness. This was the true principle, and was sufficient to impart to the jury a correct idea of what was required to constitute the right of self-defense. Why, then, add the proviso that the assault must have been made by the deceased with a felonious intent? This clearly implied that more than a mere intent of the deceased to kill or to do great bodily harm was necessary to justify the defendant in taking the life of his assailant, whereas the murderous intent of the deceased in assailing the defendant was itself a felonious intent, and all-sufficient as the intent required in order that the defendant might rightfully use such force as was necessary to defend himself, even to the taking of his assailant's life.

But the addition to the defendant's prayer for instructions was in itself erroneous. It was not necessary that the assault upon the defendant should have been felonious or committed with a felonious intent. If the assault was made with the purpose of inflicting great bodily harm, or even if the defendant had a reasonably well-grounded apprehension that such was the fact, he had the right to act in defense of himself. An assault with an intent to kill is not a felonious assault. It was a felony at one time (Acts 1868-69, p. 406, c. 167), but the law making it a felony was repealed by Acts 1870-71, p. 94, c. 43, and since the date of the passage of that act it has been a misdemeanor. It is true that an assault with intent unlawfully to kill would be an assault with a felonious intent, but the court did not only say that it must have been committed with a felonious intent, but that it must have been so committed, or the assault itself must have been felonious. We have seen that neither was required in order to give to the defendant a perfect right of self-defense.

We cannot for a moment think that the right of a defendant to a correct statement of the law by the court to the jury can in any case depend upon the mere possibility, and a very remote one, of there being some member of the jury with sufficient intelligence and knowledge to explain clearly the meaning of technical words to his fellows. That, as we understand it, is the peculiar office and function of the judge. We doubt if any layman could give a correct definition of the word "felonious" as now used in the law of this state, this court itself having had at least some difficulty in stating its exact meaning. The law presumes that the jurors do not know the law, and for this very reason enjoins upon the judge to "state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon." Code, § 413. This duty is not even perfunctory, and much less can it be omitted upon the mere chance that the jury, or, at least, one of them, may know the law.

There is another objection to the proviso which was added to the instruction by the court. The court had charged the jury virtually by this instruction that an actual assault, with the intent to kill or to do great bodily harm, was not necessary, as he told the jury that, if the defendant apprehended upon reasonable grounds that the deceased was about to assault him with that intent, "he had the right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of his assailant, without retreating"; and yet by the proviso the jury, in order to give the defendant the benefit of that instruction, were required to find that there was a felonious assault or an assault with a felonious intent. Under this instruction the jury could not have acquitted the defendant if they had found that he had a well-grounded apprehension that the deceased was about to assault him with the intent to kill him or to do him great bodily harm, unless they further found that an assault had been actually committed with a felonious intent. We think that this instruction given in response to the prayer of the defendant was calculated to mislead the jury as to the true principle upon which the defendant's right of self-defense was founded, and it therefore necessarily prejudiced him. In this connection it may be well to notice an expression of the court in the general charge. The jury were instructed that, in order "to justify the use of a deadly weapon in self-defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the shooting by the defendant was absolutely necessary; and it devolves upon the prisoner to make it appear to you that the deceased was the assailant and at fault, and that he, the prisoner, was not at fault, or that he, the prisoner, had really and in good faith endeavored to decline a struggle before the shot was fired." It is true the court afterwards, in a very clear and forcible manner, explained to the jury what kind of reasonable apprehension that he was about to be killed or to receive great bodily harm would have justified the defendant in acting upon the facts and circumstances as they appeared to him; but the fact, as we pointed out in Barrett's Case, supra, that the court afterwards gave this correct instruction, did not cure the error of the charge as to the existence of the actual or "absolute" necessity to kill. In this respect the charge in Barrett's Case and the charge in this case were substantially alike. The error was not corrected by the subsequent charge, nor was it intended to be, but the two instructions conflicted, and the jury were thereby left in doubt and uncertainty as to which of the two was right. What we said in Barrett's Case, upon the same state of facts substantially, is applicable here, namely: "It is well settled that when there are conflicting instructions upon a material point a new trial must be granted, as the jury are not supposed to be able to determine when the judge states the law correctly or when incorrectly. We must assume, in passing upon the motion for a new trial, that the jury were influenced in coming to a verdict by that portion of the charge which was erroneous"—citing Edwards v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 99, 43 S. E. 585; Tillett v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 662, 20 S. E. 480; and Williams v. Haid, 118 N. C. 481, 24 S. E. 217.

While the exception to this part of the charge is not very specific, we have noticed it in order that attention may again be called to the correct principle upon which a charge in such a case should be based. It is true that an actual necessity to kill in order to save the defendant's own life would have justified the killing of his assailant, if the defendant himself was not in fault (State v. Dixon, supra), but it is not true that actual necessity is the only ground upon which the defendant can claim that he killed in self-defense; for, if there was this actual necessity, or if the defendant had a reasonably well-grounded apprehension of death or great bodily harm if he did not kill his assailant, his right of self-defense was complete. If Stanberry was attempting to kill Miller or to do him great bodily harm, or if the defendant had a well-grounded belief or apprehension that he was attempting to do so, he had the right to interfere to prevent Stanberry from executing his intention, and if, while engaged in the act of interference for that lawful and commendable purpose, Stanberry advanced upon him in such a manner as to induce the defendant reasonably to apprehend, and defendant did actually apprehend, that he was about to be killed or receive great bodily harm, he was justified in taking the life of Stanberry in order to save his own or to prevent great bodily harm to himself, for, when he interfered, he was in no fault, but was performing a legal duty, and therefore had a perfect right to stand and defend himself against the threatened attack. Clark's Criminal Law, § 65, p. 164; State v. Matthews, supra; State v. Ruth-erford, 8 N. C. 458, 9 Am. Dec. 658.

There was error in the rulings of the court in the respects we have stated, and it will be so certified to the end that there may be another trial. New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The court gave the following prayers at the request of the state: "(2) If the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol, and are left in doubt as to the circumstances of mitigation or excuse offered by the prisoner or derived from the state's evidence, they should convict of murder in the second degree. (3) If the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner slew the deceased with a deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol, and are left in doubt from the whole evidence as to whether the deceased, at the time he was slain, was making a felonious assault upon the prisoner with a knife, either because he did not then have the knife or because he was too drunk to be capable of making such assault, and are left in doubt as to whether the prisoner, at the time he slew the deceased, believed and had reasonable ground for believing that the deceased was making such felonious assault upon him with a knife, then they should convict of murder in the second degree."

It is a complete answer to these exceptions that the prisoner was acquitted of murder in the second degree, and could not have been prejudiced thereby. Besides, the charge was warranted upon all our authorities. When the killing with a deadly weapon is admitted or proved, the presumption is that the prisoner is guilty of murder in the second degree (State v. Hicks, 125 N. C. 636, 34 S. E. 247; State v. Booker, 123 N. C. 713, 31 S. E. 376; State v. Dowden, 118 N. C. 1145, 24 S. E. 722), and every matter of excuse or justification must be shown by the prisoner (State v. Johnson, 48 N. C. 266; State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. 451, 36 Am. Dec. 442; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481; State v. Rollins, 118 N. C. 722, 734, 18 S. E. 394, where several cases are cited; State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1006, 43 S. E. 832). From the foregoing cases it will appear that the doctrine is well established that the burden devolved upon the prisoner to prove all matters of excuse or mitigation, and this he must do to the satisfaction of the jury. State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 695 (Syl., point 9, p. 696), 16 S. E. 332; State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26; State

v. Locklear, 118 N. C. 1154, 24 S. E. 410; State v. Barrett, supra. It was incumbent on the prisoner to satisfy the jury as to the circumstances offered by him in evidence to rebut the presumption of malice and to reduce the crime to manslaughter or self-defense. If the evidence left the jury in doubt it fell below the required standard, and therefore the charge was not erroneous. In State v. Potts, 100 N. C., at p. 463, 6 S. E. 657, the court below refused instructions "to the effect that, if upon the evidence the minds of the jury are left in doubt as to the sanity of the prisoner or of his malicious intent in taking the life of the deceased, it should be resolved in his favor, leading in one instance to acquittal, and in the other to the reduction of the grade of the offense to manslaughter." The ruling of the court below was affirmed by this court. In State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 512, 6 S. E. 420, the following charge, at page 517, by the judge below, was affirmed by this court, Chief Justice Smith delivering the opinion: "That when the killing was proved to have been done with a deadly weapon, or admitted by the prisoner, the burden of showing the mitigating circumstances shifted to the prisoner, and this he must show, not by a preponderance of testimony or beyond a reasonable doubt, but to their satisfaction, and if the jury were left in doubt as to the mitigating circumstances it would be a case of murder." In State v. Smith, 77 N. C., at page 488, Faircloth, J., also says: "Homicide is murder unless it be attended with mitigating circumstances, which must appear to the satisfaction of the jury, and if the jury are left in doubt on this point it is still murder." This is quoted verbatim, and approved by Davis, J., in State v. Jones, 98 N. C. at p. 657, 8 S. E. 507, as well as by Smith, C. J., in State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 518, 6 S. E. 420; and it is again held in State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. p. 733, 18 S. E. 394. State v. Smith on this point is also cited as authority, but without verbatim quotation, in State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 502, State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 683, and State v. Whitson, 101 N. C. 700, and by Douglas, J., in State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 686, 28 S. E. 353. In State v. Carland, 90 N. C., at p. 674, Ashe, J., says: "A bare preponderance of proof will not do to show matters of mitigation or excuse, unless it produces satisfaction of their worth in the minds of the jury." Certainly the jury cannot be satisfied of the truth of such defense when "they are left in doubt about it."

When counsel, in zeal for their clients, have sought to change this rule, whose maintenance the court has heretofore deemed necessary for the prevention of murders, the court has always refused, and Smith, C. J., citing and approving State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488, and other cases, says, in State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 683: "If anything can be settled and put at rest by judicial decisions, this principle has been, and we cannot now permit it to be drawn in question without impairing the confidence which ought to be reposed in the integrity and stability of the judicial administration of the law." These are wise words of one of the ablest and most distinguished of our predecessors, and the principle there followed has not till now been shaken in any subsequent case. The state, always at a gross and unfair disadvantage, by reason of the disparity in the number of challenges and other causes, in any effort to enforce the law in this state against homicides, has been reduced almost to a state of impotence, except when the killing has been by lying in wait, by the late statute and the construction placed upon it in State v. Gadberry, 117 N. C. 811, 23 S. E. 477, and similar cases. In view of the vast increase in the number of murders in this state which has followed, and which now amount almost to an epidemic, and the consequent increase in the number of attempts by the people themselves outside of the law to repress crime by lynchings, I view with regret the overruling of another long and unbroken line of precedents which our learned and able predecessors thought just and necessary that murders might less abound. There has been no statute and no decision impeaching the uniform and hitherto unanimous decisions of this court to the above effect. As the burden was upon the prisoner to prove the matter in mitigation to the satisfaction of the jury, it inevitably follows that, if the jury had been left in doubt, the matter in mitigation was not proved to their satisfaction, and their verdict should have been rendered guilty of murder in the second degree. But their verdict establishes that they were so satisfied.

The prisoner requested the court to charge the jury that: "If they believed from the evidence that the deceased was engaged in a difficulty with Asa Miller, and was attempting to cut said Miller with his knife, in the presence of the prisoner, it was his duty to endeavor to suppress and prevent the same; and if, in attempting to do so, the deceased left off his difficulty with Miller, and made upon the prisoner with a drawn knife in such a manner as to cause the prisoner to apprehend, and he did apprehend, that he was about to be slain or to receive enormous bodily harm, then the prisoner had a right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of the deceased, without retreating." This prayer was certainly defective in leaving out the word "reasonably," which the judge supplied in the following instruction which he gave in lieu of that asked: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased was engaged in a difficulty with Asa Miller, and was attempting to cut said Miller with his knife, in the presence of the prisoner, and the deceased was then capable of executing such a purpose, it was his duty to endeavor to suppress and prevent the same; and if, in attempting to do so, the deceased left off his difficulty with Miller, and made upon the prisoner with a drawn knife in such a manner as to cause the prisoner to reasonably apprehend, and he did actually apprehend, that he was about to be slain or receive enormous bodily harm, then the prisoner had a right to stand his ground, and, if necessary, to take the life of the deceased, without retreating, provided the assault made upon the prisoner was felonious or with felonious intent." This was asked by the prisoner (except the additions), and was fully as favorable to the prisoner as he was entitled to under State v. Gentry, 125 N. C. 733, 34 S. E. 706; and the addition, "provided the assault made upon the prisoner was felonious or with a felonious intent," was too plain and intelligible to require a translation of the word "felonious" to the jury. Twelve men of ordinary intelligence could not be impaneled who would not have at least some man upon it who could instruct those upon the jury who were so illiterate (if any) as not to understand the meaning of the judge in that context. If, however, they could have understood the judge to mean an assault with a lesser intent than homicide, then the error was in favor of the prisoner, and he cannot complain. If the failure to explain the word "felonious" was error, it being prejudicial to the state only, it could not possibly be error against the prisoner.

The evidence was that the deceased, who was a lame man, was "perfectly drunk" and "wild drunk," and there was direct evidence that he was not trying to hurt Miller, and that they were in a drunken squabble; and there were other circumstances which would have justified the jury in drawing the inference that the deceased was not capable of harming Miller or of executing any purpose to harm the prisoner, if the latter had retreated, as he should have done, after the deceased left Miller, if he (the prisoner) could do so with safety, and thereby have avoided taking the life of a human being. "The dead are always wrong," says the proverb truly, and the deceased is not here to give his version of the slaying; but if upon this evidence the condition of the deceased was such that the prisoner could have retreated with safety, but he preferred rather to stand his ground and kill the deceased, without overpowering necessity to prevent injury to himself, then the verdict of manslaughter and the short term in the penitentiary imposed should not be complained of by him. Human life ought to retain something of its former sacredness in the eye of the law.

[Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1904.]

HOMICIDE — PREMEDITATION — MURDER IN SECOND DEGREE — INSTRUCTIONS — REBUTTING PRESUMPTION OF MALICE—MINORITY OF JUBOR—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. In a prosecution for murder, evidence considered, and held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the fact of premeditation and deliberation.

2. Where, in a prosecution for murder, defendant admitted having killed deceased with a gun, and the testimony tended to show premeditation and deliberation, and there was no evidence of provocation, nor of any fact which could be considered in mitigation, excuse, or justification of the killing, it was not error to instruct that, defendant having admitted that he killed deceased with a deadly weapon, there were not in evidence any facts or circumstances sufficient to rebut the presumption of malice from such killing with a deadly weapon, and that defendant was guilty at least of murder in the second degree.

3. Where the jury found that defendant killed deceased intentionally and willfully, and with premeditation and deliberation, the instruction, if erroneous, was not prejudicial.

4. The refusal of the court to set aside the verdict in a criminal case because a juror was under 21 years old is not reversible error, as the objection was too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; Cooke, Judge.

Archie Lipscomb was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was indicted in the superior court for the murder of Caswell Merrett, and, having been convicted of murder in the first degree, appealed.

Mary Merrett, a witness for the state, testified: "I am the wife of the deceased, Caswell Merrett, who was about forty years old. He lived on W. L. Umstead's place, in this county. Arch Lipscomb lived about one-quarter of a mile from us. On Friday night, the 10th of January, it being dark and cloudy, and about one hour after dark, Arch Lipscomb came to our house. He came in. My husband was sitting near the fireplace, near the bed, and I was plaiting my hair. My husband was sitting about 12 or 15 feet from the door. Arch came in and sat down in the corner. Arch and my husband got to arguing about the Scriptures. They did not seem to be angry, and Caswell said something Arch did not like. I do not remember what. Arch jumped up and said, if his best friend was going back on him for somebody else, that was all right. And he stepped out of the door at once and came back, and before I had turned my head he had shot. He did not have the gun in the house, but got it outside of the door. Caswell was sitting down, with his legs crossed, and his head hanging down. He had not gotten up from the chair. It was a shotgun, and the load went into my husband's throat, and he died at once, without ever speaking. I went up the lane and halloed for Mr. Umstead, and he came. My husband was still sitting in the chair, but dead. As soon as Arch shot, he left there. There was a lighted lamp on the table near Caswell, and the shot broke that to pieces. There are two rooms in our house. They had just a religious argument about the Bible, but I never heard my husband making threats. I did not have anything against the defendant, and I have not got anything against him now."

W. P. Wheeler, a witness for the state, testified: "I arrested the defendant next morning after the killing, and, without any word of inducement or threat, he told me he killed the deceased. He said the deceased had threatened him and his wife's life and they were afraid of him, and that he carried his gun over and shot him and killed him that night. I never heard that deceased and his wife were 'conjurers' until after the killing. I did not know of any ill feeling between the parties. The defendant did not try in any way to escape. He was dressed up when I got him, and said he was waiting for the officers."

The defendant, in his own behalf, testified: "I shot and killed Caswell Merrett on the night of January 10th last. I left home about one-half hour by sun to go hunting. I went down on Mr. Williams' land and Mr. Eugene's [Umstead's]; and then, when I got to the deceased's house, I set my gun down by the door and went inside the house. Caswell Merrett had before been threatening mine and my wife's life several times. He said he had given my wife three weeks in the way he was going to do, and that was to kill her—I understood it. I have seen him run up and take hold of her with both hands. I was afraid of the deceased. He and I got to talking together at his house that night, and we both seemed to get mad. I thought he was a conjurer, and I am afraid of a conjurer. It was not my intention to kill the deceased when I left home. I went hunting. I went up and halloed at his house. He halloed out and invited me in. I went in. I had been before that time so wrought up on account of the threats he had made that I could not work in my field. We first commenced talking about arithmetic, and then we got on the Scriptures. I arrived at the deceased's house about dark, and remained about an hour, and then shot him, and left immediately. I did not like the way he had been fooling around my wife. It looked like he had been trying to get between me and my wife. During Christmas my wife was at his house, and she said he caught her in his arms and hugged her. I did not kill any birds that hunt."

Mary Lipscomb, a witness for the defendant, testified: "I am the wife of the defendant. I was at home that afternoon. I was sick in bed, and had been for about a week. Arch left home before night. He did not tell me what he was going out for. The deceased sometimes visited us."

Eugene Umstead, a witness for the de-defendant, testified: "I live near the parties. My attention was first attracted when, a little before ten o'clock, my attention was directed to Caswell Merrett's house by his wife's hallooing. When I reached the house, Caswell was sitting up in the chair, dead, with his legs crossed, and his head fallen to one side, and his hand hanging down by his side."

There was evidence to the effect that the general character of the defendant is good.

"The court instructed the jury as to what constituted murder in the first and second degrees and manslaughter, and also instructed them fully as to the law of malice, explaining to them the difference between general malice and particular malice, and further instructed them that, to constitute murder in the first degree, there must exist on the part of the slayer towards the deceased express malice, and that, in order to convict the prisoner of murder in the first degree, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he slew the deceased with particular or express malice, and that he did it with premeditation and deliberation. The court also called the attention of the jury to the evidence, and gave the contentions of the parties."

First exception: There was no exception to the charge of the court, save to the following instruction: "The defendant having admitted that he killed the deceased with a deadly weapon, there was not in evidence any facts or circumstances sufficient to rebut the presumption of malice from such killing with a deadly weapon, and that the defendant was at least guilty of murder in the second degree." The jury rendered a verdict of murder in the first degree. The defendant moved for a new trial for error in the charge as above pointed out by his exception. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Second exception: "The defendant then moved to set aside the verdict, and for a venire de novo, on the ground that it had been discovered since the verdict that B. F. Blackwell, one of the jurors in the case, was under 21 years of age. The court found as a fact that the said juror would not be 21 years old until next July, and that the fact was unknown to the defendant or his attorney, or the solicitor of the state, or any other officer of the court. The court also overruled this motion of the defendant, and the defendant excepted. The court then pronounced judgment upon the verdict as contained in the record, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, and was allowed to appeal without giving security."

The Attorney General, for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). There was no exception taken to the charge so far as it related to murder in the first degree. In this respect the instructions of the court to the jury were full and explicit, and sustained by all of the authorities. State v. Gilchrist, 118 N. C. 673, 18 S. E. 819; State v. Fuller, 114 N. C. 885, 19 S. E. 797; State v. Norwood, 115 N. C. 789, 20 S. E. 712, 44 Am. St. Rep. 498; State v. McCormac, 116 N. C. 1033, 21 S. E. 698; State v. Gadberry, 117 N. C. 811, 23 S. E. 247; State v. Covington, 117 N. C. 834, 23 S. E. 337; State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1113, 24 S. E. 431; State v. Dowden, 118 N. C. 1145, 24 S. E. 722; State v. Rhyne, 124 N. C. 847, 33 S. E. 128; State v. Spivey, 132 N. C. 989, 43 S. E. 475; State v. Cole, 132 N. C. 1069, 44 S. E. 391. There was ample time for deliberation and premeditation by the defendant, according to any rule that has been laid down upon the subject. No particular time is required for this mental process of premeditation and deliberation. The question always is whether, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, the defendant had previously and deliberately formed the particular and definite intent to kill, and then and there carried it into effect. This is a question for the jury to determine. State v. Johnson, 47 N. C. 247, 64 Am. Dec. 582. The facts of our case are substantially like those in State v. McCormac, 116 N. C., at page 1034, 21 S. E. 693.

The testimony of the witness W. P. Wheeler as to the confession made to him by the defendant was sufficient in itself to warrant the jury in finding the fact of premeditation and deliberation, if they believed it, and if, after weighing the testimony, they inferred and found the fact therefrom; but this testimony was re-enforced by that of the defendant himself at the trial, which tended to show not only premeditation and deliberation at the time of the killing, but preconceived malice and a spirit of revenge.

The exception to the charge of the court is not well taken. There is no principle better settled in the law of homicide than the one stated by the court to the jury. When a killing with a deadly weapon is shown or admitted, the law presumes malice, and, if nothing else appears, it is murder in the second degree, just as it would have been murder at common law, and would still be, if it were not for the act of 1893 requiring the state to prove premeditation and deliberation in order to establish a case of murder in the first degree, and in this respect leaving murder in the second degree as defined by that statute, just as was murder at the common law. If there is no proof of premeditation and deliberation, and there is a killing with a deadly weapon, the law presumes malice, and it is murder in the second degree, under the statute. State v. Wilcox, 118 N. C. 1131, 23 S. E. 928; State v. Capps (at this term) 46 S. E. 780. This being so, the conviction should be of murder in the second degree unless the defendant can satisfy the jury of the existence of such facts as will, in law, rebut this presumption of malice which is raised when the killing is with a deadly weapon. What facts are sufficient to rebut the presumption has always been held to be a question of law, which the court must decide. Whether there is any evidence to rebut the presumption is also a question of law. Whether, if there is any evidence sufficient for the purpose, the presumption is repelled in the particular case, is a question for the jury, under proper instructions from the court. State v. Matthews, 78 N. C. 523; State v. Capps, supra; State v. Craton, 28 N. C. 164. To illustrate: If A. assault B., giving him a severe blow, or otherwise making the provocation great, and B. strikes A. with a deadly weapon and kills him, or if, on a sudden quarrel, the parties begin the fight without deadly weapons, and, after blows pass, one uses a deadly weapon and kills the other, or if, on a sudden quarrel, the parties fight by mutual consent, at the instant, with deadly weapons, the fight being on equal terms, and no undue advantage being taken, the implication of malice in either of the cases stated is rebutted, and the law mitigates the offense, out of indulgence to the frailty of human nature, and adjudges the killing to be manslaughter. State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. 452, 86 Am. Dec. 442. And, if the first assault is committed under such circumstances as to induce the party assaulted reasonably to believe that he is about to be killed or to receive enormous bodily harm, and he kills his adversary, the law excuses the killing, because any man who is not himself legally in fault has the right to save his own life, or to prevent enormous bodily harm to himself. In each of the above cases it would be the duty of the court to charge the jury that if they found the facts to be as we have stated them, provided there is evidence to prove the facts, the implication of malice is rebutted, and the killing is either manslaughter or excusable homicide, according as the facts may be found by them. Whether the blow was given, or whether the parties fought suddenly or on fair and equal terms, so as to reduce the killing to manslaughter, or whether the assault was committed under such circumstances as to justify the fear or apprehension of the defendant that he was about to be killed or to receive enormous bodily harm, so as to reduce the killing to excusable homicide, are questions solely for the jury. The matter is fully considered in the case of State v. Matthews, supra. It was therefore proper for the court to charge the jury in this case that there was no evidence of any facts and circumstances sufficient to rebut the presumption of malice which arose from the killing with the gun, which, of course, is a deadly weapon, and the defendant was at least guilty of murder in the second degree. There was no evidence of any provocation, nor was there evidence of any fact which could be considered in mitigation, excuse, or justification of the killing. The only question in the case was whether the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree or of murder in the second degree, the killing having been admitted. But if there had been error in the instruction to which exception was taken, we do not see how the defendant could have been prejudiced thereby, for the jury found that he killed his victim intentionally and willfully, and with premeditation and deliberation; and it could make no difference, with that fact found by the jury from the evidence, whether the presumption of the common law as to malice, arising from the use of a deadly weapon, had been rebutted or not. Prejudice could not come from such a charge, if erroneous, unless the defendant had been convicted of murder in the second degree, and there had been evidence of facts or circumstances in mitigation or excuse of the killing. We have said there was none. The principle contained in the instruction of the court had no application to the difference between murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree. It related only to the difference between murder in the second degree and manslaughter or excusable or justifiable homicide.

The motion to set aside the verdict because one of the jurors was under 21 years of age was properly refused, or at least the refusal of it was not reversible error. The challenge propter defectum should be made when the juror comes to the book to be sworn, and before he is sworn, or the right of challenge will be deemed to be waived. No juror can be challenged by the defendant after he has been selected and sworn, without the consent of the state, unless it be for some cause which has arisen since he was chosen and sworn. State v. Patrick, 48 N. C. 443; State v. Davis, 80 N. C. 412. In State v. Lambert, 93 N. C. 618, a motion to set aside a verdict for a reason the same as the one now urged was held to have been properly refused. As indicated by this court in Patrick's Case, supra, there is an apt time for each and every step in all legal proceedings, and every objection must be made and every privilege claimed at the proper time, or the party who should thus have asserted his right will be considered as having waived it. The objection to the juror in this case was not presented in apt time. State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 43 S. E. 830. It came too late after verdict, and could then be addressed only to the discretion of the court. State v. Mantaby, 130 N. C. 664, 41 S. E. 97, and cases supra. The exercise of this discretion adversely to the defendant is not reviewable by this court. State v. Davis, supra; State v. Perkins, 68 N. C. 126; Spicer v. Fulghum, 67 N. C. 18.

The indictment in this case, though drawn according to the precedent in use before the act of 1893, p. 76, c. 85, is in proper form, and charges the offense of murder in the first degree. State v. Gilchrist, supra.

We have considered the case and the record with the greatest care and scrutiny, and our conclusion is that there is no error in the rulings of the court below, and none in the record, and it must be so certified. No error.

BURWELL v. BRODIE.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—EVICTION—SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS — RESTITUTION — DAMAGES — ITEMS — SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATIONS — IN WHAT ACTION RECOVERABLE — RIGHTS OF LANDLORD—FORFEITURE — CREDITS — JUDGMENTS—ESTOPPEL.

1. Under Code, § 1776, which secures to a tenant who has been ejected in summary proceedings by order of a justice, but who afterwards procures a reversal, the right to recover damages of his landlord for his removal, a tenant may demand an issue for the determination of such damages on the trial on appeal in the superior court, or he may bring a separate action for the damages sustained by the wrongful suing out of the writ and eviction.

2. The judgment is the record, and controls in respect to what is decided by the trial court.

3. A complaint in an action by a tenant for wrongful eviction by summary proceedings, alleging that by reason thereof plaintiff was deprived of his house and garden for shelter and support of his family, and was distressed in body and mind, and put to great mortification and shame and loss of employment, sufficiently alleges damages other than the loss of crops.

In Defendant's Appeal.

4. A judgment for a tenant on appeal in summary proceedings is an estoppel on the landlord only to the extent of what was or should have been decided, and does not operate to prevent him from showing in a subsequent action the value of the crop, and what portion of it he was entitled to retain for advancements made before the eviction.

5. A landlord, in wrongfully evicting his tenant, does not forfeit his rights which had accrued to him under the lease contract and the statute, such as the right to a credit for guano, cotton seed meal, and cotton seed furnished by him, and used in planting and making the crop.

6. The court may take judicial notice of the season for planting.

7. A landlord who has wrongfully evicted his tenant by summary proceedings, and prevented him from doing the farming work on the premises, cannot, on the tenant's being restored to possession on appeal, charge him for having the work done by another person.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Vance County, Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Matthew Burwell against B. T. Brodie. From a judgment for plaintiff, both parties appeal. Reversed on both appeals.

The present plaintiff was the tenant or cropper on the present defendant's land during the years 1901 and 1902 under a farming contract, by the terms of which he was to have one-half of the crop made on the land. In May the present defendant instituted summary proceedings before a justice of the peace to eject the present plaintiff. From a judgment against him he (the present plaintiff) appealed to the superior court. He gave no undertaking to stay execution, and was, by the constable acting under an execution issued upon said judgment, evicted, and the present defendant put in possession. At October term, 1902, the cause came on for trial upon the appeal, and the court held upon the plaintiff's (present defendant) own showing that he was not entitled to recover, and adjudged that a writ of restitution issue to put the present plaintiff in possession. The court also adjudged that the present plaintiff recover one-half of all crops raised on the land. The present defendant appealed, and had time allowed to give bond and perfect his appeal. He failed to give the bond or perfect his appeal, but remained in possession, gathered and sold the crops, receiving therefor $366.79. The present plaintiff thereupon brought this action, alleging the foregoing facts, and alleging that the defendant's conduct in the premises was unlawful, wrongful, and tortious, and amounted to an abuse of legal process, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff "was deprived of his house and garden for shelter and support of his family; that he was greatly distressed, agitated, and troubled both in body and mind thereby, and specifically and more so on account of the condition of his wife, which was known to the defendant, and was put to great mortification and shame thereby, as well as loss of employment," etc.; for all of which he demands damages. His honor rendered judgment "that the plaintiff has not alleged in his complaint matters sufficient to constitute a cause of action for damages other than the value of the crops." He thereupon proceeded to adjudge that the plaintiff recover one-half the value of the crop—ascertained to be $183.30. The court held that in respect to the crop the defendant was bound by the judgment rendered at fall term, 1902, and refused to allow the defendant to show the amount expended by him in making and saving the crop. From this judgment the plaintiff and defendant appealed.

T. T. Hicks and B. S. McCoth, for plaintiff. W. B. Shaw and A. C. Zollicoffer, for defendant.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). We are of opinion that his honor was in error in holding that the plaintiff did not state facts sufficient to enable him to submit an issue to the jury in regard to the alleged damage sustained by him for the eviction. While he could have demanded such an issue upon the rendition of the judgment of October term, 1902, he was not compelled to do so. Section 1776 of the Code expressly secures to him the right to "recover damages of the plaintiff for his removal" in such cases as the precept. The question is settled by this court in Woody v. Jordan, 69 N. C. 189. It is there said that the defendant who successfully resists an action of replevin may have his damages assessed in the original action, but that he is not compelled to do so, and may have his separate action on the bond or on the case for damages sustained by the wrongful suing out of the writ and eviction. Mr. Justice Rodman says: "It must be, then, that the common law gave him full indemnity by means of a separate action for the damages for the taking and detention." It seems from the statement of the case on appeal that his honor was asked by the defendant to hold that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant "for damages for abuse of legal process, mental or physical anguish, or malicious prosecution, and that the said complaint does not allege malice or want of probable cause, or special damages because of his eviction," and moves the court to dismiss the action as to any and all such alleged causes. The motion was sustained. As we have seen, the judgment, which is the record, and controls in respect to what is decided, simply states that his honor ruled that the complaint did not allege any damage other than the loss of his crop. We cannot concur with this construction of the complaint. We think it is sufficiently alleged that he suffered damages incident to his wrongful eviction; i. e., "a shelter and support for his family," etc. We do not express any opinion in regard to the character and nature of the damages which he may recover upon the allegations. He alleges a wrongful eviction, and for this injury he may recover such damages as proximately resulted from such injury. His honor should have submitted an issue involving this inquiry, and instructed the jury in regard to the measure and kind of damages which might be recovered. This court has in Remington v. Kirby, 120 N. C. 322, 26 S. E. 917, announced the principle upon which punitive damages may be recovered.

We simply decide that upon the complaint the plaintiff was entitled to have an issue as to his actual damages. To this end there must be a new trial.

In Defendant's Appeal.

CONNOR, J. His honor Judge Winston, at the October term, 1902, rendered judgment that the plaintiff be restored to the possession of the land from which he had been wrongfully evicted, and recover one-half the crops made. The execution of this judgment was prevented by the appeal of the defendant, who remained in possession until the expiration of the plaintiff's term, gathered and sold the crops. While it may be that the present plaintiff may have had the value of the crops ascertained, and judgment therefor at the next succeeding term of court, the present defendant having failed to perfect or prosecute his appeal, he was not compelled to do so. In this action he relies upon the judgment as an estoppel upon the defendant. It is an estoppel to the extent of what was decided, or should have been decided. It does not operate to prevent the present defendant from showing the value of the crop, and what portion of it he is entitled to retain for advancements made before the eviction under the terms of the contract. By his wrongful act in evicting the plaintiff he does not forfeit his rights under the contract and the statute, as landlord, which had accrued to him. The record shows that the plaintiff was evicted about May 1st; that the defendant furnished guano, cotton seed meal, and cotton seed used upon the crops. The date at which these articles were furnished is not given, but we may take notice of the season for planting, and find that they must have been purchased or furnished at or about the time of the eviction. We infer from the record that the crop was not planted, as the controversy grew out of a difference between them as to what crop should be planted. However this may be, the defendant should be allowed a credit for the guano, cotton seed meal, and cotton seed, used in planting and making the crop, as the use of them was necessary to the planting and making the crop, and in no way affected by the eviction. In regard to the amount paid for labor, the defendant may not have credit. Having, as the record shows—and for the purpose of disposing of this appeal conclusively so—wrongfully evicted the plaintiff, and prevented him from doing the work, he cannot charge him for having it done by some other person. This would be to take advantage of his own wrong.

We are not sure that we understand the last two items on the account for corn and hay furnished to feed the mules "over amount furnished." It does not appear when, or under what circumstances, these articles were furnished. It is possible that these questions may be adjusted under the advice of the intelligent counsel representing the parties. There are few controversies more difficult to adjust than those arising out of farming contracts. It is a subject of congratulation that they are usually settled by mutual concessions. This case would, as it seems to us, seem to offer an opportunity to do so.

There must be a new trial.

WALKER, J. I dissent in this case from the opinion and judgment of the court in the defendant's appeal. I cannot agree with the court as to the legal force and effect of the judgment awarding to the plaintiff in this case, who was the defendant in the other suit, one-half of all the crops grown on the land. The defendant, Brodie, who was the plaintiff in that suit, had his day in court, and full opportunity to show that Burwell was not entitled to one-half of the crop, but to one-half less the part to be retained by him for advancements made before the eviction. If Brodie was entitled to any deduction on account of advancements, then Burwell was not entitled to one-half of the crop; and yet that is precisely what the court decided when the parties were at issue as to what were their respective rights in the crop. The judgment or decree of a court possessing competent jurisdiction is final as to the subject-matter thereby determined, and as to every other matter which the parties, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, might have litigated in the cause, and which might have been decided or determined therein. Clark, J., in Wagon Co. v. Byrd, 119 N. C. 460, 26 S. E. 144, thus states the rule: "The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to the points upon which the court was required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject in litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time and determined respecting it;" citing 1 Herman on Estoppel, §§ 122, 123. I do not think it can be successfully contended that the defendant, Brodie, did not have full time and opportunity to bring forward the matter of advancements, now claimed to have been made by him to Burwell, and to have his right to so much of Burwell's half of the crop as was necessary to pay them adjudicated. The point was directly presented in that action. Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 106. The judgment declares that Burwell is entitled to one-half of the crop, and that finding and determination preclude the other question now attempted to be raised. Bryan v. Alexander, 111 N. C. 142, 15 S. E. 1031.

STATE v. HUNT.

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—MURDER — EVIDENCE—PREMEDITATION.

1. On a prosecution for murder, a requested instruction that if there was an opportunity to use a deadly weapon, but none was actually used, the circumstance should be considered as strong evidence against willful and premeditated murder, was properly modified by striking out the word "strong."

2. Accused requested an instruction that if it was the intention of the accused to do serious bodily harm, and death ensued from injuries inflicted with such intention, accused could not be convicted of a higher crime than murder in the second degree; and the instruction was modified to the effect that if it was the intention of the accused to do serious bodily harm, and death ensued in consequence of injuries inflicted with such intention, the accused would be guilty of murder in the second degree. Held, that the modification was not error.

3. It appeared that, after an altercation between deceased and accused, accused followed deceased out of the store where it occurred, and ran around the store in search of him, and then followed deceased about 30 yards, and struck deceased and killed him. Accused requested an instruction that he could not be convicted unless the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that deceased was killed in pursuance of a fixed and deep-rooted purpose, with actual premeditation, formed in a cool state of the blood; and the instruction was given, modified by striking out the words "and deep-rooted" before the word "purpose," and the word "actual" before "premeditation." Held, that the instruction was not erroneous.

4. No particular time is necessary to constitute the premeditation requisite to the crime of murder.

5. On a prosecution for murder, where the circumstances do not bring the case within the language of the statute, the state must prove deliberation and premeditation.

6. Deliberation and premeditation on the part of accused on a prosecution for murder may be inferred from such circumstances as ill will, previous difficulty between the parties, and declarations of an intent to kill after or before the crime.

7. It appeared that, after an altercation between deceased and accused, accused followed deceased out of the store where it occurred, and ran around the store in search of him, and then followed deceased about 30 yards, and struck deceased and killed him. Held, that the question of premeditation and deliberation was for the jury.

8. It appeared that accused, after having an altercation with deceased, in which he assaulted deceased, followed deceased, and, while the latter was supported, and staggering from injuries previously received, he struck the fatal blow. Held that, though there was some provocation, the killing was brutal, and to be attributed to a malicious disposition, rendering the crime murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Person County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Adam Hunt was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Bradsher and F. O. Carver, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree. The deceased was in charge of a store belonging to his brother, who employed the prisoner as a sawmill hand. It was in evidence that the deceased had no authority to settle with the sawmill hands; that the accused went to the store that Saturday night, and stated in conversation with one West, about a half hour before the homicide, that "he would have his pay, or there would be a God d—n dead nigger there that night." He left, but returned to the store about 9 o'clock, and asked for a settlement. Deceased told him he could not pay him without authority from his brother. The prisoner commenced cursing and stamping the floor. The deceased told him to hush, and started round the counter with a hammer in his hand. The prisoner jerked the hammer out of his hand and struck the counter violently, saying, "Pay me." The witness told prisoner he would go off and get the timekeeper to get prisoner's time. When he returned with the timekeeper, the prisoner had deceased down, with his knees on his breast, jumping up and down on him, and beating deceased in the face. The timekeeper told him to "stop! stop!" whereupon the prisoner assaulted him, and, in the fight that followed, knocked the timekeeper down. The witness led the deceased towards his house, 30 yards away, holding him up and helping him along, and they were met about halfway by the wife of deceased's brother, crying. The prisoner then came on, and made at her, but she got home without being caught by him. The prisoner then ran around the witness and knocked deceased down. The prisoner then pulled off a strip about 20 feet long and tried to strike the deceased—struck trees. The deceased staggered along, half bent, trying to get into the house. The prisoner then ran up and struck the deceased a heavy blow on the head, knocking him down; his head striking the porch. Mrs. Wilkins said, "Lord! you have killed Fleetwood." The prisoner replied, "Yes; damn him! that is what I intended to do." The deceased fell entirely unconscious. The deceased was a weakly man, weighing about 118 pounds, and 6 feet tall. The prisoner was a powerful man for his size, and weighed 160 pounds, or 165. The deceased died of his injuries on Thursday following. The prisoner testified in his own behalf, contradicting the two state's witnesses who testified to his having deceased down, beating him, when they got there, and testified that deceased assaulted him with his knife, and cut him in the back and side, and he took the knife away; that Wilkins ran to his house, as though to get his gun, and he hit him as he went into the porch, and "knocked him against the floor of the porch"; that he (prisoner) ran against the pole and knocked it down, but did not try to use it; that he hit deceased only one lick, and that was at the porch; was only trying to keep them from killing him; that he was badly cut. The wounds exhibited to the jury were a slight cut in the hand, and another, about one inch long, on the back; and a cut on nose and some cut places on clothing were also shown, all of which prisoner said were made by deceased. The prisoner says he followed the timekeeper, who fled out of the back door and lost him; that then he went round the store to the front, and overtook deceased as he was going into his house, and struck him with his fist; and that this was the only blow he gave deceased. The medical evidence was that the teeth of deceased were crushed, and his temple appeared to have been struck with a hard substance; that both blows may have been made with a hammer, though they may have been inflicted with a fist; that the breast and other parts of the body of deceased showed severe contusions; and that the cuts on the prisoner were not serious. The evidence of a broken plow point found on the floor next morning was competent. It does not appear whether the point was used or not, nor does the evidence appear to have been prejudicial to the prisoner.

The prisoner, in apt time, requested the court, in writing, to charge:

"(1) Taking the evidence offered for the state to be true, there was no evidence of a premeditated and deliberate intent to murder, and the prisoner cannot be convicted of murder in the first degree." Refused, and the prisoner excepted.

"(2) In no view of the case, as shown by the whole testimony, is there evidence of a premeditated and deliberate intent to kill and murder; and the prisoner cannot, therefore, be convicted of murder in the first degree." Refused, and the prisoner excepted.

"(3) If the jury shall find in this case that there was an opportunity to use a deadly weapon, but that none was actually used, this circumstance should be considered as strong evidence against willful and premeditated murder." This was given—the word "strong," however, being struck out—and the prisoner excepted to the modification.

"(4) If the jury shall find that it was the intention of the prisoner to do serious bodily harm to the deceased, and death ensued in consequence of injuries inflicted with such intention, then the prisoner cannot be convicted of a higher crime than murder in the second degree." This was modified, and given as follows: "If the jury shall find that it was the intention of the prisoner to do serious bodily harm to the deceased, and death ensued in consequence of injuries inflicted with such intention, then the prisoner would be guilty of murder in the second degree." The prisoner excepted to the modification.

"(5) In the case at bar, before the prisoner can be convicted of murder in the first degree, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence that the prisoner killed the deceased in pursuance of a fixed and deep-rooted purpose, with cool premeditation, formed in a cool state of the blood." This was given, but modified by striking out the words "and deep-rooted" before the word "purpose," and the word "cool" before "premeditation," and the prisoner excepted.

There was no exception to the charge of the court.

We find no error in the matters excepted to. If the prisoner's own evidence is to be believed, the only blow he struck was when the deceased was entering his house, and was felled to the floor of his porch; and, by the prisoner's testimony, there had been cooling time, for he had followed the fleeing timekeeper out of the back door, and, after "losing him," had gone round the store, and had gone 30 yards, to the home of the deceased; there being also testimony that the deceased was supported and staggering, and was helped to get that far. Besides, no particular time is necessary to constitute premeditation. State v. Norwood, 115 N. C. 791, 20 S. E. 712, 44 Am. St. Rep. 498; State v. McCormac, 116 N. C. 1033, 21 S. E. 693; State v. Covington, 117 N. C. 834, 23 S. E. 337; State v. Dowden, 118 N. C. 1145, 24 S. E. 722; State v. Foster, 130 N. C. 668, 41 S. E. 284.

We may mention here that in capital cases it is according to precedent, and more appropriate to style the accused "the prisoner," and not "the defendant," as was done here, but we have substituted the proper word.

Whenever the circumstances attending the killing do not bring the case within the language of the statute, the state must prove deliberation and premeditation. This it may do in many ways. Ordinarily they are not capable of direct proof, but are inferable from various circumstances, such as ill will, previous difficulty between the parties, and declarations of an intent to kill after or before striking the fatal blow. State v. Conly, 130 N. C. 683, 41 S. E. 534; State v. Covington, 117 N. C. 861, 23 S. E. 337. The circumstances surrounding this homicide were sufficient to go to the jury on the question of premeditation and deliberation. Besides, assuming that some provocation existed, the evidence shows that the killing was done in a brutal and ferocious manner; and, where this is so, the killing will be attributed to a malicious disposition, and not to a provocation, and the homicide will be murder. State v. Hill, 20 N. C. 629, 34 Am. Dec. 396; State v. Chavis, 80 N. C. 364; State v. Boon, 82 N. C. 637; State v. Coley, 114 N. C. 879-884, 19 S. E. 705.

No error.

TAPP et al. v. DIBRELL et al.

PARTNERSHIP—STATEMENT OF PARTNERS—ADMISSIONS—OFFER OF COMPROMISE—GARNISHMENT—PARTIES.

1. In an action against a firm, evidence that one of the alleged partners, who was served with summons, stated that he wanted to settle the claim, but that he would be liable on certain garnishments if he did so, was admissible, though the partnership was denied.

2. Such statements were not objectionable as an offer of compromise.

3. Where certain tobacco sued for was sold by the W. C. T. Co., a corporation, to a partnership known as D. Bros., and thereafter garnishment proceedings were issued against certain individuals trading under the firm name of W. C. T. & Co., and notice of attachment was served on "D. Bros., a corporation," as being indebted to the firm of W. C. T. & Co., payments made by the firm of D. Bros. on such garnishment constituted no defense to their liability to the corporation seller of the tobacco.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by L. P. Tapp and another against R. L. Dibrell and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiffs, L. P. Tapp and J. W. Grainger, as assignees, sued to recover of the defendants, R. L. Dibrell and A. B. Carrington, trading under the firm name and style of Dibrell Bros., an account of $1,120.80 for certain tobacco sold and delivered by their consignor to the W. C. Thomas Tobacco Company, a corporation duly incorporated and organized under and pursuant to the laws of this state. The defendants deny that they, as partners, purchased any tobacco of the W. C. Thomas Tobacco Company, but aver that a corporation duly incorporated and organized pursuant to the laws of Virginia as Dibrell Bros. purchased certain tobacco of a copartnership composed of W. C. Thomas and the plaintiffs, Tapp and Grainger, the price of which was $1,111.44. They deny the assignment of the account. They further say that the Hoge-Irvin Tobacco Company, a corporation chartered and organized in the state of Virginia, attached $215.50 of the proceeds of said tobacco in the hands of Dibrell Bros., and has obtained judgment in said attachment; that one R. R. Traxton also attached of said proceeds $20.50, and has obtained judgment for said amount; that Dibrell Bros. have tendered to W. C. Thomas & Co. a check for the balance of the proceeds of said tobacco. The defendants also set up a counterclaim for $400 damages for loss suffered in defending said attachment proceeding. In response to issues submitted, the jury find that Dibrell Bros. was a corporation at the time of the purchase of the tobacco; that the tobacco was not purchased for Dibrell Bros. as a corporation; that both the defendants were indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount named in the complaint. The plaintiffs introduced the articles of incorporation of the W. C. Thomas Company, to which there was no objection.

The plaintiff Tapp testified that he never knew of any such firm as W. C. Thomas & Co.; that the tobacco represented by the account sued on was sold by the W. C. Thomas Company to the defendants through A. B. Carrington, one of the defendants, and delivered to Hoge-Irvin Tobacco Company for the defendants; that he had known Dibrell Bros. since 1895; that A. B. Carrington and R. L. Dibrell were members of the firm, and that Carrington was served with summons here; that he talked with Carrington in August, 1902, and said that he wanted to settle the claim, but he would be liable on garnishment. This was objected to by the defendants, and to the admission of the testimony, exception was taken. We cannot see any valid objection to this testimony. It was the declaration of one of the defendants. It was certainly admissible against him, and, if there was a partnership, against his copartner. It was not offered to prove a partnership. The witness had testified to the partnership. While this was not conclusive, it was a sufficient basis to admit the declaration of Carrington. Of course, if the jury did not find that Carrington and Dibrell were partners in this transaction, the declaration was admissible only as against Carrington. The learned counsel, in their brief, do not rest their exception upon this ground, but say that it is not admissible as an offer to compromise. It was not offered for that purpose, and was not capable of that construction. In view of the answer, we cannot see that it was of any importance, in any point of view. The witness further testified that he had about the same conversation with the defendant Dibrell; that neither of them denied that Dibrell Bros., partners, owed the claim.

The plaintiffs introduced the following: "Cable Address: Dibrell, Danville. Dibrell Bros., Leaf Tobacco Brokers. Danville, Va., U. S. A., May 12, 1902. Mess. W. C. Thomas Tobacco Co., Kinston, N. C.: Your valued favor of the 10th inst. returning our check for $774.94 tendered W. C. Thomas & Co. is to hand. We note carefully your remarks as to the position you take in regard to the matter. We regret very much that we are not at liberty to accede to the demands of the W. C. Thomas Tobacco Co. for the money claimed to be due them by us, and we wish to assure you that it is in no spirit of vindictiveness that we refuse the demand, but only for our protection and by the advice of our attorneys. We believe we have made our position very clear to you, but we repeat that we do not know The W. C. Thomas Tobacco Company in this transaction, but only W. C. Thomas & Co. We will be compelled to pay the amount of garnishments when ordered to do so by the court and we hope that you will see fit to have some one to represent you when the case comes up in July Corporation Court. Very truly yours, Dibrell Bros." Objection was made to the manner of proving the assignment of the account. We concur with his honor's ruling in this respect.

The defendants introduced a copy of articles of incorporation of Dibrell Bros., duly certified, and a certified copy of the proceedings in attachment in the case of Hoge-Irvin Tobacco Company, issuing out of the corporation court of Danville, against W. C. Thomas, L. P. Tapp, and J. W. Grainger, copartners, trading under the firm name and style of W. C. Thomas & Co. Notice of attachment was served on "Dibrell Bros., a corporation, as being indebted to the defendant partners." The defendants also introduced the proceedings in attachment sued out by L. P. Morgan & Co. against W. C. Thomas for $25.50, containing this indorsement: "The plaintiff herein designated R. L. Dibrell and A. B. Carrington, partners in business as Dibrell Bros., as being indebted to, or having in their possession effects of, the defendant W. C. Thomas;" also a proceeding against W. C. Thomas & Co. by R. A. Craxton, upon which is the same indorsement; also a similar proceeding by Reagan, Walton & Davis, with the same indorsement. The witness Tapp said that he received notice of the attachment through the mail. His honor held that the attachment proceedings should not be introduced, and used to decrease the amount of the plaintiffs' claim. To this ruling the defendants excepted. The value of this exception is dependent upon the correctness of his honor's charge and the finding of the jury upon the second issue. He told the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiffs to satisfy them by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendants were a partnership at the time of the purchase of the tobacco referred to in the complaint; that, if they found that Dibrell Bros. was a corporation, they might consider further whether the tobacco was bought for the corporation. The jury having answered the second issue as set out in the record, it was entirely immaterial whether the attachment proceedings in Virginia were valid or not. They were against W. C. Thomas & Co., and there was not a scintilla of evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs were ever members of such a copartnership, or that any such ever existed. All the evidence was to the effect that the tobacco was purchased of the corporation, the W. C. Thomas Tobacco Company.

The defendants except to his honor's charge for that there was no evidence that there was any such partnership as Dibrell Bros. This exception presents the vital question in the case. We do not think it can be sustained. The plaintiff Tapp swore that they were partners. The letter introduced by the plaintiffs was competent to be considered by the jury upon the question. The record in three of the attachment suits shows that they were garnished as partners. In their answer they say that they have suffered loss, and set up a counterclaim. Of course, this must be as partners, because the corporation was not sued. We think there was evidence, competent and sufficient to be considered by the jury, tending to show a partnership. This having been found, the attachment proceedings against W. C. Thomas & Co. could not affect the right of the plaintiff. It is singular, in the light of the testimony of Rouse, that the defendants permitted judgment to be entered against them as garnishees, when they could so easily have defended themselves. It may be that some light is thrown upon the matter by reference to the fact that "A. B. Carrington, as agent for, and a stockholder in, the Hoge-Irvin Company," made the affidavit in the attachment proceeding. This record presents the singular spectacle of both parties supposing that they were dealing with partnerships, whereas, as the jury find, the defendants were trading as a partnership with a corporation. The confusion and litigation show the wisdom of our corporation act, requiring the names of all corporations to end with the word "company." It would safeguard persons dealing with trading or mercantile corporations to require by statute that all stationery, advertisements, and contracts should contain the word "incorporated."

We do not find any error in his honor's rulings or instructions. If the defendants have suffered loss by the attachment proceedings, it is the result of their refusal to defend themselves on the return of the garnishment. The judgment is affirmed.

LACY, State Treasurer, v. ARMOUR PACKING CO.

TAXATION—LICENSE TAXES—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—DOING BUSINESS IN STATE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Laws 1903, p. 339, c. 247, § 56, imposing a license tax on packing houses carrying on business in the state, applies to a foreign corporation engaged in the slaughtering of animals and the preparation of their carcasses for food and other purposes, though the corporation does no actual slaughtering, etc., in the state, but merely ships its food products into the state, and deposits them in warehouses, where they remain until disposed of in the course of business.

2. The tax is not an interference with interstate commerce.

3. The tax is not violative of Const. art. 5, § 3, requiring that laws shall be passed for taxing by a uniform rule.

4. The tax is not violative of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by B. R. Lacy, as State Treasurer, against the Armour Packing Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. B. Felder and Pou & Fuller, for appellant. The Attorney General, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This action calls in question the constitutionality of section 56, c. 247, p. 339, Laws 1903, which chapter provides in schedule B, as one of the license taxes "for carrying on business" (section 26, p. 331), the following: "Section 56. Packing Houses. Upon every meat packing house doing business in this state, one hundred dollars for each county in which said business is carried on."

From the facts agreed it appears that the defendant was incorporated in New Jersey, but has its principal office and place of business in Kansas; that it has property in this state; that a meat-packing house is a place where the business of slaughtering animals and dressing and preparing the products of their carcasses for food and other purposes is carried on; the products thus prepared consist of fresh and cured meats, such as hams, dry salt sides, bacon, lard, beef extracts, glue, blood, tankage, etc.; that the defendant does not slaughter, dress, or manufacture its products in this state, but, after the animals are slaughtered, dressed, and prepared for food or other commercial purposes by the defendant in Kansas, such product is shipped in bulk to five points in this state (Wilmington, Greensboro, Asheville, Charlotte, and Fayetteville), where the defendant has cold-storage plants and warehouses, and sold from such storage plants, some of such product to parties in this state and some to parties outside of this state; that part of said products shipped to the defendant's cold-storage warehouse in Asheville (whence this appeal comes) remain there until disposed of in due course of trade on orders taken and received after said products have been stored or placed in said warehouse or cold-storage plants. At such of said five points in this state, where the defendant maintains a warehouse and cold-storage plants, it has one or more employes, i. e., bookkeepers, stenographers, shipping clerks, salesmen, drivers, and laborers who box said meats, and who wrap and crate goods for delivery as they are sold. There are in said city of Wilmington, and other cities of said state, commission merchants, brokers, and butchers who sell by wholesale and retail, in competition with the Armour Packing Company (and who are not engaged in a meat-packing house business in North Carolina or elsewhere), fresh, cured, and salt meats and other products that have been manufactured from the carcasses of slaughtered animals for food and commercial purposes, and under the laws of North Carolina said commission merchants, brokers, and butchers are not amenable to the tax levied under section 56 of said revenue act of 1903. At all points in North Carolina where the Armour Packing Company is engaged in business, and at various other places in said state, there are engaged in business, as the Armour Packing Company is engaged, packing houses which pack articles of food other than meat, and offer them for sale in said state, such as peas, beans, tomatoes, corn, pumpkins, fruits, fish, oysters, etc. The products of said packing houses are articles of food and commerce, and are sold in the state of North Carolina through agents, brokers, and wholesale and retail merchants, just as the products packed by the Armour Packing Company are sold.

This is a statement of all the material facts agreed, as stated in the "action submitted without controversy." Upon these facts the defendant contends: (1) That it is not engaged in doing a packing-house business in this state. This may be true, but upon the facts agreed the packing house is "doing business" here, and the license tax is laid upon whatever business it is doing. (2) That the tax is an interference with interstate commerce. (3) That the tax contravenes section 3, art. 5, of the Constitution of North Carolina, which requires taxation "by uniform rules." (4) That the tax is forbidden by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. (5) That singling out "meat-packing houses" for taxation is arbitrary or class legislation, and prohibited by both state and federal Constitutions. These contentions were held adversely to the defendant, who was adjudged to pay the tax, and appealed.

If the business of the defendant was solely that of shipping food products into this state, consigned directly to purchasers on orders previously obtained, it is clear that this would be interstate commerce, and a tax laid by the state upon such business would be illegal. But the defendant does a large business within the state—the selling of products already stored here on orders received after these products are thus stored. The tax is laid upon every meat-packing house “doing business in this state.” The evident meaning of the Legislature is to tax the agency “doing business” within this state, and not to lay any tax upon the interstate commerce of shipping products into the state, to be directly or indirectly delivered to purchasers whose orders were obtained before the goods were shipped. In Express Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S., at page 850, 12 Sup. Ct. 253, 35 L. Ed. 1035, it is said that a tax “on business within the state cannot be made to mean business done between that state and other states.” The appellant contends that a packing house cannot be considered as doing business in this state unless it actually engages, at some point in this state, in the business of maintaining a place where the slaughtering of animals and the dressing and preparing of the products of their carcasses for food and other commercial purposes is carried on. The record shows that the appellant ships its food products into this state in car load lots, and deposits them in warehouses or cold-storage plants, where they remain until disposed of in due course of business on orders taken after the goods have thus become intermingled with property in this state. The company also maintains at various points in North Carolina, in addition to its warehouses and cold-storage plants, offices and sales places and agencies, where it has in its employment bookkeepers, stenographers, shipping clerks, salesmen, drivers, and laborers who box said meat and who wrap and crate goods for delivery as they are sold.” No question is here raised or passed upon as to the right to tax the sale of goods shipped here and resold in the original packages. The appellant is certainly “doing business” in this state, and it can only do this as a matter of comity, for the Legislature has the power to exclude foreign corporations altogether, or to prescribe such conditions as it sees fit. 3 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 844, p. 2695, and cases cited; 2 Cook, Corp. §§ 696-700; Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C., at page 335, 24 S. E. 352; Ins. Co. v. Edwards, 124 N. C., at page 121, 32 S. E. 404; Commissioners v. Tobacco Co., 116 N. C. 441, 21 S. E. 423. This license tax is the condition upon which the defendant is permitted to do this intrastate business above recited. That this tax is not an interference with interstate commerce, we have a case exactly in point (Osborne v. Florida [filed January, 1897] 164 U. S. 650, 17 Sup. Ct. 214, 41 L. Ed. 596), in which it is held that “the license tax imposed upon express companies doing business in Florida, as construed by the Supreme Court of that state, applies solely to business of the company within the state, and does not apply to or affect its business which is interstate in its character, and, being thus construed, the statute does not in any manner violate the federal Constitution. The construction of the state statute by its highest court is not open to review.” The present case is stronger against the defendant, for, unlike the appellant in Osborne v. Florida, this defendant is not a common carrier. See citations of Osborne v. Florida, 12 Rose's Notes (U. S.) 917. The defendant doing business in this state, and the license tax being exacted only by virtue of its intrastate business, the first two grounds of objection are overruled.

Nor is the third exception any stronger, which is that the tax violates section 3, art. 5, of the state Constitution, which requires that “laws shall be passed for taxing by a uniform rule.” That section has often been passed upon, and it is settled that “a tax is uniform when it is equal upon all persons belonging to the described class upon which it is imposed.” It has been held that the tax may be different upon a dealer in whisky by retail and a dealer in the same article by wholesale, if uniform as to each class (Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C., at page 122); on tobacco buyers as a specific class (State v. Irvin, 126 N. C. 989, 35 S. E. 430); on hotel keepers as a class, graduated in amount by the gross receipts, and exempting those whose yearly receipts are less than $1,000 (Cobb v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338); on the total amount of purchases by a merchant in or out of the city, except purchases of farm products from the producer (State v. French, 109 N. C. 722, 14 S. E. 383, 26 Am. St. Rep. 590); in cities and towns, according to population (State v. Green, 126 N. C. 1032, 35 S. E. 462; State v. Carter, 129 N. C. 500, 40 S. E. 11). In State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C., at page 734, 14 S. E. 387, 26 Am. St. Rep. 595, it is said: “It is within the legislative power to define the different classes, and to fix the license tax required of each class. All the licensee can demand is that he shall not be taxed at a different rate from others in the same occupation as classified by legislative enactment.” This is stated as a universal rule. 1 Cooley, Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 260.

The fourth exception is that the act violates the fourteenth amendment (which in these latter days it is diligently sought to construe into a quo minus and ac etiam device by which every question may be drawn within the jurisdiction of the federal courts). It has been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that this section of the Constitution does not forbid the classification of property or persons for the purposes of taxation, but merely compels the equal application of the law to all members of the same class, when the classification is based upon reasonable ground, and not an arbitrary selection. Railroad v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 165, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666; Tel. Co. v. Indiana, 165 U. S. 304, 17 Sup. Ct. 345, 41 L. Ed. 725; Railroad v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 164, 24 L. Ed. 94; Dow v. Biedelman, 125 U. S. 680, 8 Sup. Ct. 1028, 31 L. Ed. 841; Ins. Co. v. New York, 184 U. S. 606, 10 Sup. Ct. 593, 33 L. Ed. 1025; Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 6 Sup. Ct. 57, 29 L. Ed. 414; Com. v. Clark, 195 Pa., at page 688, 46 Atl. 286, 86 Am. St. Rep. 694, 57 L. R. A. 848 (held, as has been held by this court, that a separate classification of wholesale dealers from that of retail dealers is not an illegal and arbitrary classification); Cable Co. v. Attorney General, 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Atl. 733, 19 Am. St. Rep. 394; State v. Applegarth, 81 Md. 293, 31 Atl. 961, 28 L. R. A. 812 (imposing a license tax on oyster packers).

The fifth exception cannot be sustained. The Legislature is sole judge of what subjects it shall select for taxation (other than a property tax, which must be uniform and ad valorem), and the exercise of its discretion is not subject to the approval of the judicial department of the state. A very full discussion of the whole matter, concluding as above, will be found in State v. Packing Co., 110 La. 180, 84 South. 368.

No error.

(88 S. C. 192)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 9, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—BREACH OF ORDINANCE—FORMER JEOPARDY—REMARKS OF JUDGE—REVIEW—SENTENCE.

1. Where the solicitor, on the day before handing out a bill of indictment, stated to defendant's attorney that a bill would not be handed out at that term of the court, but on the following day, on the request of the grand jury, handed out the bill, it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to continue the case when called for trial the next day, there being no showing that defendant had made any effort to get her witnesses.

2. A defendant can be tried for a breach of a city ordinance relating to disorderly houses, and afterwards tried for keeping a disorderly house in the court of general sessions under the state law.

3. An exception to remarks of the judge, not set out in the case with the connections in which they were made, will not be considered.

4. Sentence within the limits fixed by law for the punishment of a violation of such law is within the discretion of the judge.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Sumter County; Townsend, Judge.

Judy Sanders was convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. John S. Wilson, for the State.

POPE, O. J. The appellant was tried and convicted of keeping a bawdy house at the November term, 1902, of the court of general sessions for Sumter county, and duly sentenced by his honor Judge Townsend. After judgment, the defendant (appellant) appealed from such judgment on four exceptions, as follows:

"(1) It is respectfully submitted that the presiding judge abused his discretion in forcing the defendant to trial under the circumstances and facts in this case, in that his honor would not allow the defendant time in which to get her witnesses and testimony; and in forcing her to trial when the solicitor, John S. Wilson, Esq., had informed her attorney on Wednesday night, November 6th, that he would not give out a bill at that term of court, and in forcing her to trial on Friday morning, November 8th, when a true bill had not been found until Thursday, November 7th, and she had no time in which to get ready, not expecting to be tried at that term of the court, after the state's attorney had said he would not give out a bill at said term of court, and she was taken wholly by surprise.

"(2) It is respectfully submitted that his honor committed error of law in admitting testimony relating to keeping the same kind of house prior to the conviction in the mayor's court, in that defendant could not be convicted in the sessions court for keeping the same house at the same time and for the same offense for which she had been tried and convicted in the mayor's court.

"(3) It is respectfully submitted that the circuit judge erred in using the following language in the presence of the jury: 'Yes, sir; and a house where liquor is kept. For a fact, on one occasion there was a glass of liquor sent from her house by her little son.' Mr. Jennings, on the part of the defendant, objects. The Court: 'I suppose they could get along without your whisky'—in that his honor, by such expression, intimated to the jury that the testimony was sufficient to convict without any proof of the selling of whisky.

"(4) It is respectfully submitted that his honor abused his discretion in passing sentence on the defendant, in that the said sentence for six hundred dollars or for eighteen months is oppression, unreasonable, and disproportionate to the offense for which the defendant was convicted."

We will now pass upon these exceptions in their order.

1. From the "case" it is made to appear that at night, on the 6th day of November, 1902, the solicitor stated to defendant's counsel that he would not give out a bill, though on the next day, the 7th of November, 1902, the said solicitor did give out a bill against the defendant to the grand jury, which returned a true bill on that day, and that on the next day the circuit judge overruled the defendant's motion for a continuance. It would seem, therefore, that the defendant could not have been much put out by the remark of the solicitor on Wednesday night of the 6th of November, 1902, that he would not give out a bill of indictment against her at that term of the court. It was not likely that more than 14 hours, including the hours of nighttime of the 6th of November, 1902, had intervened between the remark of the solicitor and handing out the bill of indictment. The fact is that the grand jury insisted that the bill should be given out, and the solicitor felt it to be his duty to hand out the bill at the request of the grand jury. The solicitor, with great propriety, admitted his conversation with defendant's attorney on the night of the 6th, and that at the request of the grand jury he gave out a bill on the 7th. There was no showing made that the defendant's attorney had made any effort to get his witnesses before the court on the 8th of November, 1902, when it was called for trial, nor was it shown that such witnesses lived outside of the city of Sumter, S. C., nor was it shown that any of such witnesses lived outside of the limits of Sumter county, nor did the attorney for defendant offer to state what his witnesses would prove, so that the solicitor could admit that they would so swear. The Constitution of our state requires that the defendant "in all criminal prosecutions shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial." See section 18 of article 1. As before remarked, the circuit judge ordered the trial to proceed. This court has repeatedly held that the matter of continuance is within the discretion of the circuit judge. State v. Way, 38 S. C. 333, 17 S. E. 39, where it is said: "This matter of continuance is confided to the wise discretion of the circuit judge, as this court has repeatedly and uniformly held." The recent case of State v. Judy Sanders, 46 S. E. 769, when on trial for selling liquor under similar circumstances to the present, is full authority to this holding of the court. This exception is overruled.

2. It is entirely competent for a defendant to be tried for a breach of a city ordinance relating to keeping a bawdy house, and afterwards being tried for keeping a bawdy house in the court of general sessions, under the state law. One is an offense committed by a corporator and the other is as a citizen of the state. The one offense is breach of a corporate regulation, and the other is a breach of a general law for the whole state. This doctrine is well stated in the opinion rendered by the late Chief Justice McIver in City Council of Greenville v. Kemmis, 58 S. C. 433, 36 S. E. 727, 50 L. R. A. 725, where it is said: "The utmost that can be said is that the municipal corporation, under the authority vested in it by its charter, has seen fit to make an act done within the corporate limits a criminal offense which the Legislature has not seen fit to constitute an offense. Indeed, it is well settled in this state, at least, that the same act may be made an offense both against the state and the municipal law. As that great jurist, Judge Cooley, expresses it in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 199 of second edition: "Indeed, the same act may constitute an offense both against the state and municipal corporation, and both may punish it without violation of any constitutional principle. * * * " And the late chief justice cites in support of his position Rogers v. Jones, 1 Ward, 261; Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131, 10 Sup. Ct. 47, 33 L. Ed. 287; State ex rel. Burton v. Williams, 11 S. C. 288; City Council v. O'Donnell, 29 S. C., at pages 368, 369, 7 S. E. 593, 1 L. R. A. 632, 13 Am. St. Rep. 728; and other cases. This exception is therefore overruled.

3. This exception is overruled, because the "case for appeal" fails to show in what connection such language was used by the circuit judge. It only appears in the exception. Numerous decisions of this court have expressly ruled that the ground upon which the exception is based must be set out clearly in the "case" itself. Lites v. Addison, 27 S. C. 226, 3 S. E. 214; Welch v. Gleason, 28 S. C. 347, 5 S. E. 599; Daniel v. Hester, 29 S. C. 147, 7 S. E. 165; Hodges v. Tarrant, 31 S. C. 608, 9 S. E. 1038; Brown v. McWhite, 30 S. C. 356, 9 S. E. 277.

4. This exception must be overruled. Sentences within the limits fixed by law for the punishment of a violation of such law are ruled by the discretion of the circuit judge. State v. Judy Sanders (at this term of court) 46 S. E. 769.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 7, 1904.)

EMINENT DOMAIN — SEWERAGE — CONTAMINATING STREAMS — DAMAGES — NUISANCE.

1. Under Code 1902, §§ 2008, 2012, providing for the same remedy on the condemnation of lands for waterworks, sewerage, and lights as is provided for the condemnation of lands for railroad companies, private persons whose property outside of the city limits is damaged by reason of emptying sewerage pipes into a stream, thereby contaminating the waters, may have compensation.

2. The remedy given by Code 1902, §§ 2008, 2012, to a private person whose property outside of a city is damaged by the sewerage emptied into a stream, is exclusive, and such person cannot sue the city for tort, nor to abate the nuisance.

3. Where a city empties its sewerage into a stream, thereby damaging the property of a person outside the city limits, it is a private, and not a public, nuisance.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Gage, Judge.

Actions by John Matheny and by J. G. Harrigal against the city of Aiken. From an order sustaining demurrers to the petition, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Croft & Lamb, for appellants. Hendersons, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The following statement is taken from appellants' argument:

"The above-entitled actions were begun by proper service of the summons and complaint in each action upon the defendant on the 17th day of September, 1901. By consent of counsel, both causes were heard together, upon demurrer in each case, before his honor Judge Gage at the special term of the court of common pleas for the county of Aiken, held at Aiken, the first Monday in January, 1903. Each action is for damages by a riparian proprietor against the city of Aiken for the pollution of a stream by city sewerage. Plaintiffs pray also for an injunction to abate the nuisance. The plaintiff John Matheny is the owner and occupant of certain premises, containing seventy-five acres, some three miles west of the city of Aiken, and outside of its city limits. This tract of land, upon which the plaintiff resides, is watered by a stream known as 'Wise Creek,' which, having its source near the city of Aiken, runs westwardly through the plaintiff's land, and empties into Big Horse creek, a short distance beyond Warrentville, and about five miles from Aiken. For a number of years prior to the year 1899 the plaintiff Matheny was engaged in a dairy business, disposing of the product of his dairy farm in the adjoining towns of Warrentville and Graniteville, not far distant from his farm upon which he resided. The stream above described flowed through his farm, and of the tract lying along Wise creek he had made a pasture for his cattle, in order that he might avail himself of the water supply thereby afforded for his stock. His cattle drank the waters of Wise creek, and his business prospered, for, as the plaintiff alleges in his complaint, before his dairy business was destroyed by the construction of a sewerage system by the city of Aiken, 'said dairy business has in times past been very profitable to this plaintiff.'

"In 1893 the General Assembly of South Carolina authorized the city council of Aiken to order an election for the purpose of issuing bonds to provide for constructing a system of waterworks and sewerage. The text of this act is as follows:

"An act to authorize the city council of Aiken to order an election for the purpose of issuing bonds for the purpose of putting in a system of water works and sewerage.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the state of South Carolina, now met and sitting in General Assembly, and by authority of the same, that the city council of Aiken is hereby authorized and empowered, upon the presentation to them of a petition, in writing, of a majority of the freehold voters of said city, to order an election, upon two weeks' notice by advertisement in a newspaper published in said city of the time and place of said election, to determine the question whether or not said city shall issue bonds in an amount to be petitioned for, as aforesaid, by said freehold voters, not to exceed fifty thousand dollars.

"Sec. 2. That in the event of an election being called as above provided for, the question as to whether or not said bonds shall be issued shall be determined by a majority of the qualified voters who shall vote at said election.

"Sec. 3. That if a majority of the qualified voters at said election shall be in favor of issuing said bonds, then the city council of Aiken is hereby empowered and authorized to issue bonds to the amount so voted and in such denominations and to fall due at such times, not earlier than ten years from the date thereof, as may be determined by resolution of said council: provided, said bonds shall bear no greater rate of interest than six per cent per annum.

"Sec. 4. That said city council of Aiken shall have full power to sell said bonds and to use the money arising therefrom for the exclusive purpose of erecting said water works or sewerage system, or both: provided, said bonds shall not be sold for less than their par or face value.

"Approved December 22d, A. D. 1893."

"See 21 St. at Large, pp. 544, 545.

"Thereafter, in 1899, the defendant, the city of Aiken, constructed sewers for the purpose of collecting the sewerage in said city, and all of the sewerage was collected and carried in one large main pipe to a point about two miles west of the city of Aiken, where its contents are discharged into Wise creek. The point at which the sewerage is emptied into Wise creek is above plaintiff's farm, and the effect of discharging this sewerage into said stream is to render its water unfit for use, and to cover the banks and the bed of the same with a filthy and unwholesome sediment.

"The facts set forth in the complaint for the purpose of this demurrer are assumed to be true, and it appears therefrom that the discharge of the sewerage into the stream flowing through and past the plaintiff's farm contaminates, fouls, and pollutes the waters of Wise creek, and that the said stream emits nauseous and offensive odors where it flows through the plaintiff's land. The water of the creek is now unfit and unwholesome to drink, and it has poisoned several of the plaintiff's cattle, from which they died. The plaintiff's dairy business, once flourishing and prosperous, has been broken up and destroyed. The plaintiff prays damages in the sum of five thousand dollars, and asks that the defendant, the city of Aiken, be enjoined from discharging the contents of its sewers into Wise creek, so that he may use the waters of said stream in its original purity, as accustomed by nature.

"With few exceptions, the complaint of J.

G. Harrigal sets out substantially a similar cause of action. Harrigal is the owner of a tract of land containing about twelve acres, bounded on the east by lands of John Matheny. Wise creek also runs through the land of Harrigal. The residence of Harrigal is only a few yards distant from the stream. The offensive odors from the putrid waters flowing past his home have rendered it unhealthy as a place of residence, destroyed the purity of the atmosphere about his home, and greatly depreciated the value of his property. He has been compelled to erect fences to prevent his stock from drinking the poisonous waters of the stream. The plaintiff Harrigal also alleges that the defendant committed the acts complained of wilfully and recklessly, for, before the sewers were laid, he informed the mayor of the city of Aiken that to empty the city sewerage into this stream would create a nuisance and tend greatly to depreciate the value of his property, and he protested against this being done. The plaintiff Harrigal prays for damages in the sum of three thousand dollars, and asks for relief by injunction to abate the nuisance.

"Both complaints contain allegations that the acts of the city of Aiken, in destroying plaintiff's property rights in the waters of Wise creek, as riparian owners, are in violation of article 1, § 5, of the Constitution of South Carolina, and that the plaintiffs are deprived of their property without due process of law; further that the acts of the defendant are in violation of article 5 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in that plaintiffs are deprived of their property without due process of law, and that the acts of the defendant constitute a taking of their property for the public use without just compensation, and are contrary to the law of the land.

"The defendant demurs to each action upon two grounds: (1) That, in the absence of a statute authorizing such action, a municipal corporation cannot be sued in an action of tort; (2) that the nuisance complained of is a public, and not a private, nuisance, and that plaintiffs have not sustained such special injuries as would entitle them to maintain a private action for damages. The demurrers came on to be heard before his honor Judge Gage, and, as a result of said hearing, he sustained the first ground of demurrer, but overruled the second. Thereafter, on the 16th day of February, 1903, the plaintiffs appeared before his honor Judge Gary, then sitting as circuit judge for the county of Aiken, and made a motion, after notice to defendant's counsel, to amend both complaints by alleging further that defendant's acts were in violation of article 1, § 17, of the Constitution of South Carolina; also of article 1, § 23, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1868; and also in violation of article 14, § 1, of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and by alleging further that the plaintiffs are citizens and residents of the state of South Carolina and of the United States of America. Judge Gary refused to allow these amendments, upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction. From the decree of his honor Judge Gage and from the order of his honor Judge Gary plaintiffs then appealed, upon exceptions, which are as follows:

"(1) Because it is respectfully submitted that the act of defendant in fouling the stream mentioned in the complaint, and in depriving the plaintiffs of the use of the same, and in destroying the plaintiff Matheny's property, therein mentioned, violates their rights, as secured to them under amendment 5 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law, and that private property shall not be taken for private use without just compensation, and that his honor the circuit judge erred in not so deciding.

"(2) Because it is respectfully submitted that the act of defendant in fouling the stream and depriving plaintiffs of the use of the same, and in destroying the plaintiff Matheny's property, as stated in the complaint, is in violation of the plaintiffs' rights, as secured to them by section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall deprive any person of his property without due process of law, and that his honor the circuit judge erred in not so deciding.

"(3) Because it is respectfully submitted that the acts of the defendant in fouling the stream, and in depriving plaintiffs of the use of the same, and in destroying the plaintiff Matheny's property, as mentioned in the complaint, is in violation of the plaintiffs' rights, as secured to them under section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, which provides that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, and that his honor the circuit judge erred in not so deciding.

"(4) It is respectfully submitted that the acts of the defendant in fouling the stream mentioned in the complaint, and in depriving plaintiffs of the use of the same, and in destroying the property of the plaintiff Matheny, as mentioned in the complaint, is in violation of plaintiffs' rights, as secured to them by section 17 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, which declares that private property shall not be taken for the public use without just compensation being first made therefor.

"(5) Because his honor the circuit judge has erred in deciding that, under the common law, a municipal corporation, like the state, was exempt from suit unless the right to sue had been expressly given by statute, whereas he should have decided that under the common law a municipal corporation was liable for any wrong done by it which deprived a person of his property without compensation.

"(6) It is respectfully submitted that his honor the circuit judge erred in holding that the act of 1893 which authorized the city of Aiken to issue bonds for the exclusive purpose of erecting a sewerage system gave the city the right to empty its sewerage into the stream which flows through plaintiffs' land, for it appears by the complaint that the place where such sewerage is emptied is two miles west of the city of Aiken, and no authority is given in said act to empty the city sewerage outside the corporate limits; and hence, by a proper construction of such act, the city would have only had the right to empty the sewerage within the corporate limits of the city of Aiken; and his honor the circuit judge therefore erred in deciding that the city had authority under said act to discharge the sewerage beyond its limits.

"(7) Because his honor the circuit judge erred in deciding that the act of 1896 (Townsend's Code, § 2012) allows condemnation proceedings and compensation to the person whose property has been taken for the purpose of constructing a sewerage system, for it is submitted that condemnation proceedings are not allowed for sewerage purposes, but only for the purpose of waterworks and electric lights.

"(8) Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs might have obtained compensation for damages sustained by them by a special proceeding, it being submitted that there is no statute in this state providing for special proceedings for compensation for property taken for the use of a sewerage system by a municipal corporation. And it is submitted that his honor further erred in holding that the plaintiffs did not rely upon section 17, art. 1, of the state Constitution, for, while it is true such section and article were not expressly pleaded in the complaint, yet they were specially referred to in the argument of plaintiffs' counsel, and they relied upon them to sustain the rights of the plaintiffs.

"(9) It is submitted that even if an action for damages cannot, under the law of this state, be sustained against a municipal corporation for destroying a person's property, that action may nevertheless be maintained against such municipal corporation to protect the property from continuous injury by such municipal corporation, and especially to enjoin such corporation from continuing and perpetuating a nuisance.

"(10) Because his honor erred in sustaining the first ground set forth in the demurrer of the defendant, for it is submitted that the complaint does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

"(11) The plaintiffs further except to the rulings of his honor Judge Gary in refusing to allow the plaintiffs to amend their complaints in the particulars set forth in the notice containing the proposed amendments, and which are as follows: 'By adding at the end of line 6 of the fourth paragraph of the amended complaint herein the following: "And also in violation of article 1, § 17, of the Constitution of South Carolina, which provides that private property shall not be taken for the public use without just compensation being first made therefor; and also in violation of article 1, § 23, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1868, which provides that private property shall not be taken or applied for public use, or for the use of corporations, or for private use, without the consent of the owner or a just compensation be made therefor." Also by adding at the end of the line 9 of the fifth paragraph of said amended complaint the following, to wit: "And is also in violation of article 14, § 1, of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law." And by adding at the end of the fifth paragraph of the said amended complaint the following, which shall stand as the sixth allegation of said complaint: "(6) The plaintiff further alleges that at the times mentioned in the complaint he was, and is now, a citizen and resident of the state of South Carolina, and also a citizen and resident of the United States of America." That it is respectfully submitted that his honor Judge Gary had the power and authority to allow such amendments, and he erred in not so deciding; but, should this exception be overruled, the plaintiffs now ask leave of the Supreme Court, in the furtherance of justice, to allow the complaints to be amended as prayed for and as above stated."

This case, involving, as it does, the suabillity, so to speak, of municipal corporations for torts alleged to have been committed by them, is one of moment, and possibly it is better to have the language of the circuit judge before us. The text of that decision is as follows:

"The same issues of law are made in these two cases, so that by consent of counsel they were tried together at one and the same hearing. The issues arise upon the demurrer to the complaint, and the demurrer makes two issues, to wit, it appears on the face of the complaint (1) that the action is for tort, for the misfeasance of a municipal corporation, resulting in the fouling of the waters of a running stream, when there is no statute making a corporation liable therefor; (2) that the action is for damages as aforesaid for a public nuisance, and not a nuisance private, special, or particular to the plaintiffs, when, in law, defendant is not liable to plaintiffs for a public nuisance.

"It is settled by a line of decisions of the Supreme Court of this state that ordinarily a municipal corporation is not liable to an action for tort except by permission of the Legislature. White v. Charleston, 2 Hill, 571; Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 291; Parks v. Greenville, 44 S. C. 172 [21 S. E. 540]. That is not denied by the plaintiff. But the complaint charges that the acts of the defendant are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, at amendment 5, where it is provided (1) 'that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law'; and (2) 'that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.' And it further alleges that the acts of the defendant are in violation of the Constitution of this state, at article 1, § 5, where it is provided that 'no person shall be deprived * * * of property without due process of law.' The fifth amendment of the federal Constitution is a limitation on the powers of the federal government, and not the powers of the state government. Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 18 Wall. 177 [20 L. Ed. 557]; Thorington v. Montgomery, 147 U. S. 492 [13 Sup. Ct. 394, 37 L. Ed. 252]. It has, therefore, no relevancy to the issues of this cause, and its consideration may be dismissed without further comment.

"There is a provision of the federal Constitution which declares that 'no state shall deprive any person of * * * property without due process of law' (fourteenth amendment, § 1), but the plaintiff has not invoked that provision by plea or argument. There is also a provision of the state Constitution which declares private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation being first made therefor. Article 1, § 17. The plaintiff has not pleaded violation of that law. The only inquiry left, then, is to consider if the things charged against the defendant in the complaint disclose a denial to the defendant of the protection of the law of the land, or, as it is sometimes called, 'due process of law.' Article 1, § 5, Const. 1895. The complaint does not refer to the warrant of the defendant to do the things charged against it. The allegations are simply that the defendant, a municipal corporation, constructed in 1899 a sewerage system for the purpose of carrying sewerage from the water-closets in said city, which sewerage empties into Wise creek, a stream of water running through the plaintiff's seventy-five acres of land, and at a point above plaintiff's land, and 'that said sewerage emits very offensive and nauseous odors, and the same contaminates, fouls, and pollutes the water of said creek * * * where the same runs through plaintiff's farm, and also causes offensive odors and smells on said plaintiff's farm, and has destroyed the use of the same as a dairy farm, and has fouled and so polluted the water of said creek as to render the same nauseous and unfit for his cattle to drink from, and has already poisoned several of his cows, by drinking said polluted waters, and thereby caused them to die, and has also, by polluting and fouling said water, caused plaintiff's dairy business to be broken up and destroyed, to the damage of the plaintiff $5,000.' The plaintiff prays also for a permanent injunction to arrest the wrong. There is no allegation that the defendant's construction or operation of the sewer has been negligent. The plaintiff's property is entitled to the protection of the common and statute law of force when the first Constitution was enacted. That common and statute law is what the Constitutions of 1790 and 1895 denominated the 'law of the land,' and what the Constitution of 1895 entitles 'due process of law.' State v. Simons, 2 Spears, 644. If the defendant was a private corporation or a natural person, the common and statute law would declare it was liable for a willful hurt to plaintiff's property. But by the same common law, because by nothing else, a municipal corporation was exempted from such liability, for it was esteemed a part of the state, and, like the state, exempted from suit, except by consent of the state, expressed in a statute. White v. Charleston, 2 Hill, 571. The case is not altered if a warrant for defendant's action be disclosed and considered. As hereafter stated, the pleadings do not disclose that warrant. It was, however, fully adverted to by both sides in the argument. The General Assembly, in December, 1893, authorized the city of Aiken to issue bonds for the exclusive purpose 'of erecting a sewerage system.' 21 St. at Large, 544. The sewer in question was constructed pursuant to that authority. As was said in the argument, the power to construct the sewer implies of necessity the power to discharge its contents somewhere. If a municipality is not liable for its action independent of a statute, it is certainly not liable if its action be warranted by a statute.

"As before stated, the complaint does not rely on that clause of the Constitution of this state which declares that private property shall not be taken for public purposes without just compensation being first made therefor. Although the argument of plaintiff's counsel was full and strong to the effect that the plaintiff had a property right in the stream, and that permanently fouling its waters was a taking of property, yet the demand for compensation for the breach of the right was by the plea and argument referred to the federal Constitution. I have been strongly tempted, however, to consider the plaintiff's case under the provisions of the state Constitution, but reflection has satisfied me I had better not make a case which was not made by learned counsel.

"It yet remains to consider if the defendant, though not triable for tort, is liable to be enjoined from the continuance of a nuisance, for the complaint is one for a permanent injunction as well as for damages. The limit to which our court has gone is to hold that a municipal corporation is not liable to be muicted in damages for tort, except a statute allow it. It has not held, so far as I have ascertained, that, if a municipal corporation creates a nuisance, the court of equity could not enjoin its further continuance. If a municipal corporation is not so liable, it is because such corporations are not amenable to judicial control, wherever their action is independent of a contract relation and the outcome of misfeasance only. The reason assigned why a city is not liable to an action for damages for misfeasance is that the city corporation 'is a mere government agency established for public purposes.' Young v. Charleston, 20 S. C. 118 [47 Am. Rep. 827]. The state cannot be sued in its courts on contract or tort, because it is not a corporate entity, but a sovereignty. A city is not a sovereignty. It is a corporate entity, and may be sued on its contracts, and it may, too, be restrained from other illegal actions. Wilkins v. Gaffney, 54 S. C. 199 [32 S. E. 299]; Vesta Mills v. Charleston, 60 S. C. 2 [38 S. E. 226]; Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 505 [19 L. Ed. 984]. If the allegations of the complaint be true—and they are assumed to be on demurrer—the defendant has created a nuisance damaging to the plaintiff's property.

"Again, the owner of land along the banks of a running stream has a property right in the flowing water, and the fouling by a city sewer of the waters so as to permanently damage the land owner is the taking of property by the city from the citizen without compensation. Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 167 [20 L. Ed. 557]; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 544; Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 504 [19 L. Ed. 984]. But if this be so, would injunction be finally allowable in a case like that at bar? The sewer was constructed in 1899 by authority of the state, granted in 1893. It is for a public purpose, for it carries off the fecal matter of a city of 4,000 people. The city had, therefore, the legal right to foul the stream, and if, in doing that, private property was destroyed, the owner thereof has a right to compensation at the hands of the city. The act of 1896 recognizes that right of the citizen, and points him to a remedy. Townsend's Code, § 2012. The subject-matter of that act is waterworks, sewerage, and lights. Section 2008, Id. The remedy prescribed by the statute is the same provided for the condemnation of lands by railroad corporations, and generally it is exclusive of every other remedy. Tompkins v. R. Co., 37 S. C. 382 [16 S. E. 149]. Certainly the remedy is not injunction. It is either the special proceeding prescribed by the statute, or an action in this court for compensation. This action is not a special proceeding, nor can the complaint herein be sustained as one for compensation under article 1, § 17, of the state Constitution, first, because that article and section are not relied on; and, second, because there are no allegations that the defendant has denied the plaintiff's right to compensation, or that plaintiff never consented to entry by the corporation. Glover v. Remly, 62 S. C. 56 [39 S. E. 780].

"Having reached the conclusion the action does not lie, the second ground of demurrer is irrelevant; but the issue has been made, and I shall consider it. The complaint does not state facts from which a public nuisance is inferable. In that particular it differs from the complaint in the case of Baltzger v. R. Co., 54 S. C. 242 [32 S. E. 359, 71 Am. St. Rep. 789], cited by the defendant. If the defendant was a manufacturer, and fouled the waters of the stream with drugs, the riparian owner would have an action for damages done to him. 'If a person brings or accumulates on his land anything which, if it should escape, may cause damage to his neighbor, he does so at his peril.' Quoted in Frost v. Berkeley Co., 42 S. C. 411 [20 S. E. 283, 26 L. R. A. 693, 46 Am. St. Rep. 736]. See, also, Threatt v. Mining Co., 49 S. C. 128 [26 S. E. 970]; Spelling on Injunction, § 313. The case is not altered because the defendant fouled the waters by means of a sewer pipe. I am therefore of the opinion that the first ground of demurrer must be sustained, and the second ground of demurrer must be overruled. It is so ordered, and the complaint dismissed."

There can be no question that the plaintiffs, respectively, have had their property rights invaded by the defendant. It may be conceded that the sewer, as authorized by the Legislature of this state to be constructed by the city of Aiken, was a necessity to the preservation of the health of its citizens; and yet such city had no right to despoil these citizens, the plaintiffs, of their property without compensation. The General Assembly, if it do so by the act of 1893, has no power in itself to disregard the plain mandates of the Constitution of this state, when it authorized the city of Aiken to take the property of these plaintiffs for its sewer. The very object of the Constitution is to protect the individual owner of property from the spoliation of his property at the hands of any person or persons or power without compensation for its injury or destruction. To say the contrary is to advocate an absurdity. I would be inclined to hold that the acts of the defendant, the city of Aiken, touching the emptying its sewerage into Wise creek, to the destruction or very great injury of the property right of these plaintiffs, without compensation therefor, was such an invasion of such property rights as immediately gave the plaintiffs a right to action, if it were not for some matter which will hereinafter be specifically set forth. It must be remembered that the complaint alleges that the city of Aiken has emptied its sewerage into Wise creek two miles beyond its corporate limits, and that this stream runs through the property of these plaintiffs, and also that there are no allegations in the complaint which justify this action of the city council of Aiken. Certainly the act of the Legislature passed in the year 1893 gives the city no such authority, directly or indirectly. There is no allegation in the complaint that the city has had septic tanks for the attempted purification of the matter which passes through the pipe before it is dumped into Wise creek. These would be matters of defense. But now we are confined to the demurrer to the complaints, and are confined to the allegations of those complaints. The act of 1893 is pleaded at length in the complaints. Such facts appearing in the complaints, it seems to me that it is there made to appear that the defendant, the city of Aiken, for the purposes of these two actions, admits that it has caused its sewerage to be conducted for two miles beyond its city limits, and caused the same to be emptied into Wise creek at that distance from its city limits, without any effort on its part to purify the contents of its pipe before they are emptied into the said creek.

It has been held in several cases that in some instances cities may be held liable to actions for tort by individuals. As is said in Hill v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332: "If a city or town negligently constructs or maintains the bridges or culverts in a highway across a navigable river or a natural water course, so as to cause the water to flow back upon and injure the land of another, it is liable to an action of tort, to the same extent that any corporation or individual would be liable for doing similar acts. Anthony v. Adams, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 284, 285; Lawrence v. Fairhaven, 5 Gray, 110; Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 544 [66 Am. Dec. 431]; Parker v. Lowell, 11 Gray, 358; Wheeler v. Worcester, 10 Allen, 591." Also in the same case: "So, if a city, by its agents, without authority of law, makes or empties a common sewer upon the property of another, to his injury, it is liable to him in an action of tort. Proprietors of Locks & Canals v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 223; Hildreth v. Lowell, 11 Gray, 345; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208. But in such cases the cause of action is not neglect in the performance of a corporate duty, rendering a public work unfit for the purposes for which it is intended, but it is the doing of a wrongful act, causing a direct injury to the property of another, outside of the limits of the public work." Merrifield v. City of Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, 14 Am. Rep. 592, was an action of tort by the plaintiff against the city of Worcester, where the complaint alleged that the (plaintiff) was seised of land lying on each side of Mill brook, and that he owned a machine shop on said brook, fitted up with a large steam engine and boilers, for the purpose of furnishing steam power to the tenants of said machine shop; that he had the right to have the water of the brook flow pure and uncorrupted, such water in a pure condition being absolutely essential to the carrying on of his works; "that the defendant wrongfully and unjustly cast, carried, and deposited into said Mill brook, and the waters thereof, at points in the channel thereof above and higher than the works of the plaintiff, great quantities of filth, * * * and discharged from sewers, privies, and water-closets, * * * by which the water became greatly corrupted and unfit for use in the plaintiff's business," etc. The judgment of the appellate court was to reverse the judgment of the court below, and send for trial this question: "Whether the damage which plaintiff had suffered was attributable in any degree to the improper construction or unreasonable use of the sewers, or to the negligence or other faults of the defendant in the management of them, is a question which does not seem to have been tried. If it should be found to be so attributable, the action may be maintained. * * *" In the course of the opinion of the court in the case just cited, these words will be found: "To enable a riparian owner to maintain an action for damages, he must show not only that defendant has done some act which tends to injure the stream, and which he has no legal right to do, or which is in excess of his legal right, so as to be an unreasonable use thereof, but also that the detriment of which the plaintiff complains is the result of that cause. When he can show an appreciable detriment to himself, and connect it with such wrong by another, he may recover the damages shown to be due to that wrong. Merrifield v. Lombard, 13 Allen, 16 [90 Am. Dec. 172]." The comparatively recent case of Barnes v. District of Columbia (decided in 1875) 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. Ed. 440, which was sustained in the case of Maxwell v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 557, 23 L. Ed. 445; also Dant v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 557, 23 L. Ed. 446. It is true, these cases were decided by a bare majority of the court, yet they have never been overruled. In Barnes v. District of Columbia, supra, it was held that a city or village holding a voluntary charter is responsible for its mere negligence in the care and management of its streets. While these cases have been criticised in Hill v. City of Boston, supra, and in our case of Young v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C. 116, 47 Am. Rep. 827, yet such is still the rule in the United States Supreme Court. We would remark just here that White v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill, 571, was the case where the city council of Charleston ordered the private dwelling house of a citizen to be blown up by powder to check the spread of a fire in that city. The case of Black v. City Council of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785, was where the waterworks in the city of Columbia failed to furnish water with which to extinguish a fire which destroyed plaintiff's residence, notwithstanding he paid for such water supply. The case of Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 291, was where the private property of plaintiff was taken by the city council of Chester, to wit, a piece of plaintiff's land to widen a street in that city. The case of Young v. City Council of Charleston, supra, was where the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective culvert on the street of that city. None of these cases fall under the class of cases cited herein from our South Carolina Reports, but all of our South Carolina cases fall under the class where there were valid laws vesting the city council with full power to do the acts complained of. As before remarked, the act of 1893 only gave the power to the city of Aiken to ordain a waterworks and sewerage system, without coupling the additional power to go beyond the city limits to lay piping for sewerage, yet the act of 1896, as amended by the act of 1897, set forth as section 2008, vol. 1, Code Laws S. C., has corrected this, and fully empowered cities in this state to construct sewerage; and section 2012 has authorized cities to lay pipes, and to condemn any property or rights of way to enable it to lay pipes, on paying to the owner thereof just compensation for such property or rights of way to be condemned; such condemnation to be determined in the manner provided by law for the condemnation of lands and rights of way by railroad corporations. Thus it will be seen that the mode of acquiring any property or rights of way has been fixed by our statutes, which includes the duty of compensation to riparian owners of property along a stream. This being so, the method prescribed for such purposes is exclusive of any suit therefor for damages. The complaint does not set up a refusal by the defendant to comply with this law. The circuit judge was not in error in holding and adopting the views herein announced.

It is not necessary to consider defendant's ground of appeal. It may be remarked, however, that we fail to see any error in that part of the circuit decree which refuses to hold that the action of the defendant was a public, and not a private, wrong. The mere reading of the complaint shows that it was a private wrong.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and is hereby, affirmed.

JONES, J., concurs in the result.

WOODS, J. I concur in the view that plaintiffs had an adequate and exclusive remedy under section 2012 of the Civil Code, and in affirming the judgment of the circuit court on that, as a sufficient ground. I am unable, however, to assent to the view indicated by the Chief Justice—that, but for that statute, these actions could be maintained as actions for damages for tort against the city of Aiken. That a municipal corporation cannot be held liable for damages in such an action has been often decided in this state.

White v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill, 571; Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 286; Black v. City of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785; Young v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C. 116, 47 Am. Rep. 827; Chick v. Newberry County, 27 S. C. 419, 8 S. E. 787; Hill v. Laurens County, 34 S. C. 141, 18 S. E. 318; Parks v. Greenville, 44 S. C. 168, 21 S. E. 540; Bramlett v. City of Laurens, 58 S. C. 60, 36 S. E. 444. As the Chief Justice has shown, these decisions are not in accord with the weight of authority elsewhere, and they could hardly be sustained on principle. For these reasons, I agree that the doctrine they maintain should not be extended. They do not go to the extent of holding that a municipal corporation may not be restrained from committing a nuisance, or wrongfully taking or damaging private property, or that property may not be recovered back when unlawfully taken by such corporation. Hence it seems to me that the opinion of the circuit judge is correct—that, but for the exclusive remedy provided by section 2012, under the allegations of the complaint the plaintiffs would have been entitled to an order of injunction, but not to a verdict for damages.

COLUMBIAN BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N
v. RICE et al.

BUILDING ASSOCIATION — MORTGAGE — CONSTRUCTION — USURY — PLEADING FOREIGN STATUTES — COMMON LAW — PRESUMPTIONS — ATTORNEY'S FEE.

1. A mortgage given to a Virginia building and loan association, providing that payment shall be made in the manner prescribed by the charter, which requires all moneys due from the members of the association to be paid in the home office in Virginia, is a Virginia contract, and to be construed according to the laws of that state.

2. Where usury is set up as a defense to a contract governed by the laws of another state, the laws of such other state should be pleaded by plaintiff in reply that the contract is not usurious.

3. The presumption that the common law prevails in Virginia raises the presumption that there is no legal limitation to the rate of interest.

4. Where a building and loan mortgage provided for attorney's fees on any litigation touching the transaction, in an action to foreclose, on judgment for plaintiff, fees should be allowed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by the Columbian Building & Loan Association, of Richmond, Va., against Seal Rice, Alfred Smith, and Henry Jackson, as trustees of Mt. Olive African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. From the decree, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hall & Willis, for appellants. Stanyarne Wilson and J. E. Webster, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendants, trustees of Mt. Olive African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, subscribed to two shares of stock in the Columbian Building & Loan Association, a Virginia corporation, and as such subscribers borrowed money from the association, giving a mortgage on the church property to secure the loan. They now plead usury as a defense to this action to foreclose the mortgage, and set up a counterclaim for the penalty of receiving usurious interest.

The first inquiry is whether the contract falls under the law of South Carolina or of Virginia, for it is conceded that, if the law of this state is applicable, the transaction must be held usurious. The master and the circuit judge both held that the contract was to be performed in the state of Virginia, and construed in accordance with the laws of that state. It is incumbent upon the defendant to overturn this finding of fact by the preponderance of the evidence. The mortgage provides that the payments shall be made to the association "in the manner prescribed by its charter, by-laws, rules and regulations." Section 7, art. 6, of the by-laws requires: "All money due from the members of the association, or from it to the members, shall be payable at the home office in Richmond, Va." Provision is made in the by-laws for the organization of local boards in towns where sufficient stock is held to make such organization desirable. Section 4, art. 11, which relates to this subject, is as follows: "Members may, if they desire, make monthly payments on stock to the local treasurer, but such local treasurer shall be the agent of the members, and not of the association." The defendants insist this is a mere subterfuge to avoid the usury laws of the state, and, even if it is not, the contract is nevertheless to be construed as a South Carolina contract. A contrary view was taken by this court in Pollock v. Association, 51 S. C. 420, 29 S. E. 77, 64 Am. St. Rep. 683, Turner v. Association, 51 S. C. 37, 27 S. E. 947, and Tobin v. McNab, 53 S. C. 75, 36 S. E. 827. It is true, in Meares v. Finlayson, 55 S. C. 105, 32 S. E. 986, Chief Justice McIver expressed dissatisfaction with the decision of Pollock v. Association, supra, but expressly said that the point we are now considering was not involved in the case he had under discussion. In the later case of Association v. Powell, 55 S. C. 320, 33 S. E. 355, the provisions of the mortgage and of the by-laws, so far as they relate to this question, were practically the same as those involved in this case; and it was there held by a unanimous court that the contract was to be performed in Georgia, and the laws of that state must govern its validity and construction. The defendants rely upon the case of Mortgage Co. v. Bates, 58 S. C. 552, 36 S. E. 917, as holding a different doctrine; but in that case the facts were not the same as in this, and the circuit judge found as one of the facts that the parties had contracted with reference to the laws of this state. This finding was sustained as not being against the preponderance of the evidence. The finding of fact was the other way in this case, and, as we have seen, this court has heretofore sustained the same finding on similar evidence. The rights of the parties to this contract must therefore be adjudicated under the laws of Virginia.

The plaintiff offered in evidence the statutes of Virginia and the decisions of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, from which it appeared that this contract would not be adjudged usurious in that state. Objection was made to this evidence on the ground that these statutes had not been pleaded. The general rule is that the existence and terms of the statute of another state cannot be proven unless alleged. Rosemand v. Ry. Co., 66 S. C. 98, 44 S. E. 574. It is true, usury is an affirmative defense, and it was not, therefore, necessary for the plaintiff to anticipate it and set up the Virginia statutes in his complaint; but, when the counterclaim for usury was put in, the plaintiff was bound to set up in reply its defenses to that plea. Having failed to set out in reply the existence of Virginia statutes on this subject, or their terms, evidence as to such statutes should have been excluded. The case is to be considered, then, as if the court had before it a contract whose validity and effect as to the plea of usury were to be considered under the laws of Virginia, without any pleadings or evidence as to those laws. In such case there is certainly no presumption that the law of usury is the same in that state as in this. Such a presumption would be altogether unreasonable, for some states have no statute law on the subject, and in the others the enactments are very diverse. Virginia having been once subject to the laws of England, in the absence of proof the presumption is that the common law prevails, and that there is no legal limitation to the rate of interest in that state. Rosemand v. Ry. Co., supra; Brown v. Wright, 21 L. R. A. 471, note. This being so, the error in admitting proof of the Virginia statutes was harmless.

In insisting that the statute law of this state must be applied, the defendant relies on Gist v. Telegraph Co., 45 S. C. 370, 23 S. E. 152, 55 Am. St. Rep. 763, in which this language is used: "Again, it has been held in this state, in the case of Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill, 319, that the legality or illegality of a transaction depends on the law of the place where it transpires; but it is incumbent on those who would avail themselves of it to show what that law is, and, until that is done, our courts must decide that question according to the laws of this state. The same doctrine seems to have been held in Thatcher v. Morris, 11 N. Y. 437, which is represented in the New Jersey case above cited as holding that: 'Where the contracts of a particular kind are forbidden by the law of the state in which they are sought to be enforced, and the party seeking to enforce them relies upon the fact that they were made in a foreign state, and are valid contracts by the lex loci contractus, it has been held elsewhere that he is bound to aver and prove those facts.' Now, as there is no allegation in the complaint that the law in New York is otherwise than what it is in this state, the plaintiff cannot, in the absence of any such allegation, derive any benefit from the fact that the contract was made and was to be performed in New York." It will be observed that case involved a gambling transaction. Gambling contracts and some others so offend good morals, and so contravene established public policy, that courts will presume that the laws of other states forbid them, in consonance with the laws of their own state; and, even if this presumption is rebutted by proof, they will recognize no claim of comity which would require them to give countenance to such transactions. Numerous decisions in this state have held contracts to be free from usury because they fell under the laws of other states, when such contracts would have been usurious under the laws of this state. It is therefore clear that usury is not regarded as standing on the same plane with gambling and other intrinsically immoral practices. See, also, Bank v. Cook, 46 Am. St. Rep. 201, note. It is true, in the case of Meares v. Finlayson, 55 S. C. 121, 32 S. E. 986, it was held that when the contract was proved to be usurious under the laws of North Carolina, as well as those of this state, the penalties prescribed by the South Carolina statute would be enforced, even regarding the contract as a North Carolina contract. This was on the ground that our statute expressly forbids the collection of interest or costs in a suit on a usurious contract. It is manifest, if the contract in that case had not been usurious under the laws of North Carolina, a very different question would have been presented, and the usury law of South Carolina would have been disregarded.

This is a Virginia contract. The common law, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is presumed to be of force in that state, and hence no usury statute can be applied.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. None of the appellants' exceptions were overlooked in the decision of this cause, and therefore the petition for a rehearing is refused.

The fifteenth exception assigns error to the circuit judge "in not holding that under the laws of this state, when a member of a building and loan association borrows money from the association, and pledges his stock as security for the loan, he thereby ceases practically to be a member of the association, and his relation thereto becomes that of borrower to lender; and in not finding, under this rule, that if the contract is not usurious the association can recover only the balance of the principal, with legal interest; and that, if the contract is usurious, it can recover only the balance of principal due, without interest, cost, or attorney's fees." No special allusion was made to this exception, because it seemed to be covered by the principle controlling the opinion. It is not denied that, in ascertaining the amount due, the circuit judge followed precisely the terms of the contract made by the parties themselves. The court held that the law of Virginia was to be applied to the contract, and that the law of Virginia was presumed to be the common law. Under the common law, a contract must be enforced according to its terms. The defendants expressly agreed in the bond and mortgage that they would pay the amount found by the circuit judge, and that they would remain members of the association, as well as borrowers from it. The court could not substitute another contract, making them liable for the amount they received, and interest on it at the South Carolina rate. In Association v. Holland, 65 S. C. 448, 43 S. E. 978, upon which defendants rely, it does not appear that the contract was made with reference to the laws of another state. In Bird v. Kendall, 62 S. C. 178, 40 S. E. 142, which was held to be a Georgia contract, the contract was enforced according to its terms. See McIlwaine v. Ellington, 55 L. R. A. 933, and notes.

The sixteenth exception charges that the circuit judge "erred in allowing ten per cent. attorney's fees, for the reason that the contract, being usurious, attorney's fees cannot be collected." As to the application for a rehearing on this exception, it is only necessary to say that by the terms of the bond and mortgage the mortgagors obligated to well and truly pay "all fees, costs, and expenses to or for which said association may become subject or liable by reason of any litigation touching this transaction." This exception was based on the charge of usury, and fell with it. When it was held that there was no usury in this contract, it seemed to the court to follow, without special allusion to the subject, that the attorney's fees growing out of this litigation must be paid. The circuit judge, with all the pleadings, testimony, and facts before him, fixed the attorney's fee, and there was no exception as to the reasonableness of the amount allowed.

It is manifest that the court could not admit such part of the testimony as to the law of Virginia as would be favorable to the appellants and exclude the remainder. It must all be admitted or all excluded. The defendants' exceptions can bear no other interpretation than that they urged upon this court the entire statute law of Virginia upon this subject should be excluded, and the defendants cannot complain that this position was sustained.

It is ordered that this petition be dismissed, and that the stay of the remittitur heretofore granted be revoked.

CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH et al. v.
DART.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 15, 1904.)

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES — POWER OF TRUSTEES — SALE OF PROPERTY—APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

1. As, under the constitution and by-laws of the Baptist Church, the trustees have no right to make any contracts affecting the real property of the church, an agreement for the sale of the church property without the consent of the congregation is invalid.

2. Where, on an issue as to whether the congregation of a Baptist church ratified the act of its trustees in selling its real estate, the evidence is contradictory, the conclusions of the master and of the circuit judge will not be disturbed.

3. A contract with the owner of real estate to purchase it at foreclosure, and resell to the original owner at the same price, which is its full value, with 7 per cent. interest, taking a mortgage as security, is lacking mutuality.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Watts, Judge.

Action by the Calvary Baptist Church and its trustees against J. L. Dart. Complaint dismissed, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

All issues were referred to Master Sassa, who filed the following report, omitting the statement of facts in part:

"So far, there is no dispute as to the facts. But with the sale to Dart the contention begins. The plaintiffs claim that the contract between Dart and the church was that Dart should go to the sale and buy the property for their benefit, and practically as their agent, and, having done so, he should reconvey the said property to the church, receiving in consideration therefor a bond for the amount paid by him, bearing interest at seven per cent., and secured by a mortgage of the property. They claim that the apparent want of mutuality in this transaction is obviated by the fact that thereby Dart obtained a good seven per cent. investment, and also increased his reputation in the Baptist denomination, to which both he and the plaintiffs belong. On the other hand, Dart alleges that while it is true that he did undertake to purchase this property, with the primary object of assisting the church in their trouble, and while he did make the purchase with that intent, he did not intend to, nor did he, bind himself to reconvey in the manner and upon the terms alleged by the plaintiffs, but intended to settle and arrange all such details after the sale had been completed, having, however, clearly intimated to the committee of the church with whom he dealt that his purpose was to retain in his own possession that portion of the land on which the parsonage and shop stood, and to convey to the church the lot which held the church building; the valuations of the two lots to be settled after the sale in accordance with the price paid for the whole property.

"Upon the issue thus joined a great deal of contradictory testimony has been taken. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that, under the constitution and by-laws of Calvary Baptist Church, the trustees have no right to make any contracts affecting the real property of the church. If this is true, it proves too much, for in that case the very contract upon which the plaintiffs' case is based falls to the ground, and the whole substratum of the present suit is destroyed. The allegation of the complaint is that the board of trustees are charged with the duty of holding the property of the said church and administering its financial affairs; and in the fifth paragraph of the complaint is set forth the agreement, according to the plaintiffs' view of it, between Dart and the Calvary Baptist Church, which agreement, as testified to by the plaintiffs' witnesses, was entered into between Dart and certain persons claiming to represent the church, one of whom, at least (Washington), was not a trustee at the time. Of the rest, one was the pastor of the church, and the others were trustees. If the trustees 'had no power to dispose of the church's property directly or indirectly,' and could not contract with regard to it, clearly this agreement, so far as the church was concerned, was entirely illegal. No formal action of the church has been shown, authorizing or confirming the alleged agreement.

"A study of the testimony satisfies me that while Dart did undertake to buy in the property for the benefit of the church, so that the congregation should not eventually be deprived of their church building, he did not make the definite agreement contended for by the plaintiffs. Such an agreement, involving, as it does, a marked absence of mutuality, would have to be proved very fully and distinctly, and I do not think the plaintiffs have succeeded in doing this. On the other hand, the form of agreement contended for by Dart is supported, in my judgment, by the preponderance of the testimony, and is confirmed by the circumstances of the case, as well as by the strong evidence of the written contract or agreement signed by Dart, Smith, Prioleau, Albert Washington, and Reeder—the last five calling themselves 'trustees of the Calvary Baptist Church'—dated 3d September, 1901. By this paper, Dart agreed to sell and convey to the said trustees the church building, and so much of the lot of land upon which it stands as would measure seventy-eight feet on north and south lines, and fifty-five feet on east and west lines, for the consideration of $1,200, with interest at seven per cent. per annum, payable semiannually from date. Dart testifies that this was substantially the agreement made verbally between himself and the trustees prior to the sale, and that it was subsequently put in writing at the request of the trustees, and I think the weight of the testimony confirms this. Dart's conduct immediately after the sale is entirely consistent with this view of the case. On July 1, 1901, he wrote a letter (which is in evidence) to the pastor, officers, and members of the Calvary Baptist Church, in which he says: 'The Calvary Baptist Church having been purchased by me at public sale on the 25th of June last, I desire to state to them that for the present, and until I shall be able to make more permanent arrangements with them, I shall require and expect them to pay a monthly rental of $7 to me, which shall be due on the 1st day of the month.' It is testified, though the evidence is conflicting, that this letter was read to the congregation and acceded to at a mass meeting of the church. Whether this was so or not, it is certain that at least one payment of $42 was made to Dart under this notice. Meanwhile he himself went into possession of the other lot, and received the rents thereof. A rental of $7 a month represents seven per cent. on a valuation of $1,200, the amount specified in the written paper or agreement above referred to. It seems to me that these facts all cohere sufficiently to furnish a reasonable and intelligent story of this whole transaction. The plaintiffs' case has not been proved to my satisfaction, nor am I able to discern any sufficient proof of the fraud charged against the defendant. There is some conflict of testimony all through, but, looking carefully at all the evidence of all the witnesses, and at all the circumstances of the case, I am convinced that the plaintiffs' contention in this case cannot be sustained. I do not believe that the agreement set up in the complaint was ever made.

"The only other point in the case is as to the power of the trustees who signed the contract with Dart in confirmation of the verbal agreement made before the sale to bind the church to carry out the same. It is attempted to defeat this by the claim that the trustees had no power to sell the property. But this objection misses the point. They did not sell the property. It was sold by the court against their will. They were authorized to find some one to help them in this emergency, and to make the best terms with such a one as they could. Accordingly they made such terms with Dart, and I am bound to say that I do not think the bargain that he drove was an unconscionable one. There is testimony going to show that this arrangement was reported to the church, and I do not think that this positive testimony has been rebutted by the negative evidence offered by the plaintiffs. In my opinion, the action of the trustees was for the best interests of the congregation, and was, at any rate, at first accepted by them. I therefore recommend that the complaint be dismissed, with costs."

The circuit decree is as follows:

"This case was heard by me at the March term of court, at Charleston, S. O., upon the pleadings, testimony taken before Master Sassa, his report, and exceptions thereto. In view of the very able and earnest arguments of the counsel engaged in the case, I have given unusual and careful consideration to the case before announcing my judgment. I am of the opinion that the master is right in every conclusion reached by him, and I cannot improve on his report. It is therefore ordered, decreed, and adjudged that the exceptions to the report be overruled, and that the report be approved, confirmed, and made the judgment of this court, and that the complaint be dismissed, with costs."

The plaintiffs appeal from the decree on the following grounds:

"First. Power of Trustees. (1) In not holding that the trustees of the Calvary Baptist Church generally had only power to hold its property and not to dispose of it, unless authorized by a mass meeting of the entire congregation, both males and females.

"(2) In not holding that the only authority that the trustees had in this case, as given by the congregation of the Calvary Baptist Church, was to get some one to buy in the church's property, viz., the church lot and parsonage lot, with the shop thereon, for the benefit of the church—the church to repay the amount so expended in a reasonable time—and that they had no power otherwise to sell or otherwise dispose of the church property.

"(3) In attributing to the plaintiffs the position that the trustees of the Calvary Baptist Church 'have no right to make any contracts affecting the real property of the church.' The contention of the plaintiffs in this regard being that while the trustees, as authorized by the congregation, had authority to get some one to buy in the church property for the church, and consequently, as effecting this object, to give a bond and mortgage to repay the amount so used, yet they had no power to sell or dispose of the property, or any part of it, absolutely.

"(4) In holding that the alleged division of the property, and the absolute sale of the parsonage and shop and lot, as enlarged by the defendant, by the moving of the fence back, was not an attempted sale of the property by the trustees, or at least a part of them, to the defendant, and were wholly beyond the power of the trustees. In not holding that the proceedings of Whaley and Hawksford against the church were a mere consent case, and consequently the act of the parties, and not of the court.

"Second. The Defendant as Trustee. That the court further erred:

"(1) In not holding that, in the circumstances developed in this case—the avowed declaration of the defendant, Dart, that he 'was buying the church [property] simply to help the people out' (Whaley's testimony), and his acting with the trustees in the negotiations with Mr. Whaley for the sale at a reduced price, and his other actings and declarations in the matter that he was buying in the property for the church, etc.—he put himself in the position of a trustee, and on him was the burden of proof (a) that he was in all things frank and fair; (b) that he paid for the property what it is worth; (c) that he held out no delusive hopes; (d) that he exercised no undue influence on the church; and (e) took no advantage of the fears or poverty of the church; and that every doubt will be resolved against him; and, further, that the preponderance of the testimony is in all these particulars directly the reverse, viz.: (a) To Washington and the other trustees and the congregation his conduct was not frank and fair, as he left them under the impression that 'from the jump everything was in favor of the church'; (b) the property (the parsonage and shop lot as enlarged by the defendant) is proved to be worth $1,500 to $1,800, and yet the defendant aims to get it for $905; (c) he held out to the trustees and congregation that he was helping them, that he was the 'savior' of the church, and yet is now seeking to get the larger part of the property below its value; (d) the trustees being panic-stricken by the fear of some one buying in the church, he wrought on their fears to increase his demands on them, and took advantage of them to make them sign the contract of September, 1901.

"(2) That the influence acquired by the defendant, Dart, over the trustees of Calvary Baptist Church, especially after he had acquired the title to the property, and the confidence reposed in Dart by the Calvary Baptist Church, should have made him a trustee, without power to profit by the transaction.

"(3) In not holding that such trustee could not contract with the said church; that such contracts, even if otherwise valid, should have been held fraudulent, and have been set aside.

"Third. Mutuality of Contract. That the court erred in holding that there was no mutuality in the contract if the absolute sale of the property, worth from $1,500 to $1,800, for $905, is not sustained, whereas the law is that promise for promise is always a valuable consideration, and the court has been misled by a consideration of the adequacy of consideration, in which it also erred, as to get an investment now at seven per cent. interest, payable monthly, is more than an adequate consideration. The court further erred in holding that the sale by Mr. Whaley was against the will of the church. On the contrary, it was clearly proven that it was with their full assent, and was consent by the action of Mr. Wha-ley, Dart, and other trustees of the Calvary Baptist Church.

"Fourth. The Alleged Bid of September 1, 1901. The court further erred in this: The testimony showing that the contract of 3d September, 1901, was made after the defendant had bought in the church, and held title from the master to himself, the court erred in throwing on the plaintiff the burden of proof that the deed was made by the authority of the church. The burden was on the defendant to prove that that contract was made, not with the trustees only, but with the congregation before the sale, or ratified after the sale, of which there was an utter failure of evidence as to the congregation, and certainly not a preponderance of the evidence even as to the trustees.

"Fifth. Fraud. (1) The court erred in not holding that the defendant's 'intention [to commit a fraud] in this case may be proved or inferred from the facts whose tendency is to produce the results,' and that from the facts in the case the fraud of Dart must not simply be inferred, but is proved.

"(2) In not holding that the whole conduct of the defendant and his partisan pastor, Smith, shows a scheme to get the property of the church against the will of the congregation, and at an inadequate price; the removal as trustees of those opposed to the defendant's scheme, the appointment of others to do their work, the resignation of Outino to let Smith be appointed chairman of the trustees, the studied secrecy both by the defendant and his partisan, Smith, practiced to the congregation, showing this fraud very conclusively.

"Sixth. The Resolution of the Mass Meeting September 4, 1902. The court erred in failing to take notice of the fact of the mass meeting refusing to confirm the illegal acts of the trustees and setting them aside, and in not holding that the action of the mass meeting—the only one held on the subject, and held as soon as Dart's and Smith's plans were discovered by the congregation—was conclusive against the act of the trustees in assenting to the division of the property, and its sale at a price under its value to one who held himself forth as helping the church.

"Seventh. Facts. That the court erred in his finding:

"(1) That the defendant [Dart] did not agree with the church to buy in all its property at the foreclosure sale for the benefit of the church, and to allow the church to redeem the same by paying to him [Dart] the purchase money by him bid with interest.

"(2) That the pretended agreement made the 3d of September, 1902, and signed by Dart, for himself, and Smith, Prioleau, Reed, and Washington, assuming to act for the church, was, in substance, the agreement made between Dart and the church before the foreclosure sale, and was binding on the church.

"(3) That this last alleged agreement was not repudiated by the church at the meeting held 4th September, 1902, as soon as brought to the knowledge of the congregation.

"(4) That the bargain the defendant, J. L. Dart, attempted to drive with the plaintiff church, is not an unconscionable one; the testimony showing that such bargain, if driven, would give to Dart property worth $1,500 to $1,800 for an expenditure by him of $905.

"(5) That the action of the trustees in this last-mentioned agreement was for the best interest of the congregation, and was, at any rate, at first accepted by them; it being, on the contrary, greatly to the church's disadvantage, and not as advantageous to them as that offered by Mr. Whaley and another.

"(6) That the letter of the defendant, Dart, of 1st July, 1901, and his taking possession of the enlarged parsonage and shop lot, corroborate the court's finding in the matter.

"(7) That the plaintiff's case has not been proved; the testimony proving the claims of the plaintiff, and the fraud charged against the defendant, Dart, though the burden of proof to show the fairness of the transaction was on the defendant, Dart.

"Eighth. Legal Aspect of the Case. That the court erred in not holding that the defendant should reconvey all the property of the church; that an account be taken of the amounts due to him, with interest at seven per cent., payable semiannually—the amounts received by him, with like interest; that a reasonable time be given to the church to repay the same, and that the defendant remove the buildings he has begun to build on the lot; and that he restore the former buildings to the positions from which he had removed them."

Young & Young, for appellants. W. St. J. Jerve and J. L. Mitchell, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. On the 16th day of April, 1903, his honor Judge Watts heard the report of G. H. Sasa, Esq., as one of the masters for Charleston county, S. C., together with the exceptions thereto filed, and also the testimony offered at the hearing before the master. The master had recommended that the complaint be dismissed. The said circuit judge sustained the said master in all respects, and adjudged that all the exceptions be overruled, and that the complaint be dismissed with costs. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed. The report of the master, the decree of Judge Watts, and the grounds of appeal should all be included in the report of this case.

We will now proceed to pass upon these grounds of appeal, and, in order that our views may be better understood, we will give a brief summary of the facts upon which plaintiffs' contention is bottomed: The Calvary Baptist Church, a body corporate under the laws of this state, was the owner of a lot of land in the city of Charleston, S. C., whereon was located its meeting house used for divine worship, its parsonage, and also a shop, which last building was usually rented to outside parties. In some way this corporation owed a debt which in June, 1901, amounted, principal and interest, to $3,600. This debt was secured by a bond and mortgage of all the land of the corporation. The obligees of this bond and mortgage were W. Gibbes Whaley and Francis Hankford, as trustees. The latter was in England at the happening of the events hereinafter mentioned. The trustees above named, the holders of the bond and mortgage, notified the church that some arrangement for the payment of this indebtedness must be made. The church had elected a body called its "trustees," which trustees, under rule 7, were to "hold all property or properties of the church in possession, and shall collect such contributions that will enable them to defray all debts, such as repairing and other debts of this said church, at what time fixed by trustees." So, when the threat to foreclose the mortgage held by W. Gibbes Whaley and another, as trustees, was made, the church called upon its trustees to look after the matter. Mr. Whaley, in one of his conferences with these trustees of the church, told them he would call to his aid a Charleston broker, Capt. T. T. Hyde, who reported to Mr. Whaley that the church and lot upon which it stood was worth about $1,000, and the parsonage and shop, together with the balance of the land, was worth about $1,100. Mr. Whaley, as trustee, offered to take the latter at $1,100 if the church would pay him $1,000 for the church lot. This proposition was declined by the trustees for the church, stating that they wished to keep all the property for the church itself. Soon another element was brought into these discussions. The Reverend John L. Dart, who was then, or had been just before, pastor of what is known as the Morris Street Baptist Church, also of Charleston, S. C., attended with the trustees of the plaintiff church these conferences with Mr. Whaley. As a result of all these conferences, it was agreed that Mr. Whaley would take $2,100 for his debt of $3,600, and that the Reverend Dart would go $5 better than Mr. Whaley. A foreclosure of Whaley's mortgage by due legal proceedings was had—altogether a friendly suit, consent decree. So on about the 2d July, 1901, the sale was made under the judgment in foreclosure. Mr. Whaley bid $2,100, Rev. J. L. Dart bid $2,105, and at that figure he was declared the purchaser. In a few days the purchase money was paid in cash by Dart, and the master delivered to him a deed for the whole property. Dart then wrote a letter to the church, asking that they pay over to him 7 per cent. on $1,200 in monthly payments—$7 per month. He (Dart), when asked to give papers to the church, stated that he was just then going North, and that, on his return to Charleston, papers could be prepared. So, early in the month of September, 1901, Dart met the trustees of the church, and, after some discussion, all parties signed, sealed, and delivered the following paper, to wit:

"I hereby promise and agree to and with J. W. Smith, J. R. Pringleau, B. H. R. Reeder, R. Cuttino, A. Washington, trustees of the Calvary Baptist Church, a corporation, to sell and convey to them the building known as the Calvary Baptist Church, at the corner of Morris and Smith streets, this city, and so much of the lot of land upon which said building now stands as will measure and contain seventy-eight (78) feet on the north, also south lines, and fifty-five (55) feet on the east and west lines, on the following terms, etc.:

"(1) That the trustees of the said Calvary Baptist Church corporation shall pay to me the sum of twelve hundred ($1,200) dollars, with interest thereon at seven (7) per cent. per annum, payable semiannually from the date hereof.

"(2) That during the time of purchasing the said corporation shall have the right to occupy the said church building; all insurances and necessary repairs to be paid for by the said corporation, and should they fail to do so, I shall pay for them and be reimbursed by the said corporation.

"(3) That this agreement shall continue and be valued for a reasonable period of time, and should the said corporation ultimately fail to purchase the said church property, I shall not be held responsible for any payments made on account.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals, this third day of September, 1901, [L. S.] J. L. Dart, J. W. Smith, J. R. Pringleau, Robert Outtino, A. Washington, B. H. R. Reeder.

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Jos. A. Purcell, F. V. Cleckley."

The church plaintiff paid Dart $42 as the semiannual interest, but, when the next interest became due, it refused to pay, alleging that Dart had bought the property really for the plaintiff; that he was now attempting to keep it for himself; charged that he was trustee for the plaintiff; that he was guilty of fraudulent conduct to the church; and that the trustees of the plaintiff church had no right, in law or in morals, to sign the paper with John L. Dart on the 3d September, 1901; that the plaintiff church was willing to pay Dart principal and interest on $2,105 from July 2, 1901, but that Dart should reconvey the property to the church. An action was begun in the year 1902 by this church and its trustees to procure the relief hereinbefore specified. Dart, in his answer, denies all the material allegations. The issues of law and fact were referred to G. H. Sass, Esq., as master, who took a good deal of testimony, and sustains the defendant, and Judge Watts, in his decretal judgment, does also. We will now pass upon the exceptions in their order.

1. So far as the trustees of the plaintiff church are concerned, they do not hold any office in the spiritual concerns of such church. The only officers of a Baptist church are the pastor and the deacons. A Baptist church "is distinct from and independent of all others, having no ecclesiastical connection with any, though maintaining a friendly intercourse with all. The government is administered by the body of the members, where no one enjoys a pre-eminence, but each enjoys an equality of rights." See Hiscor's Baptist Church Directory. But it is in the power of the plaintiff, in the administration of its temporal affairs, to employ agencies of its own choice; to give such agencies such power over its property as the church may see proper to do. In this particular instance the plaintiff, by its rule 7, which we have already quoted, saw proper to elect four trustees to manage its property. This church did not vest the title to its property in these trustees. Of course, it was at all times in the power of this plaintiff church to alter, either by enlargement or restriction, this control of its property by its trustees. Indeed, it could abolish rule 7 at any time it saw proper. It was not possible for these trustees legally to assert any rights of their own. When any step was taken or contemplated by them, it was absolutely necessary that the church should clothe them with power. By virtue of their office as trustees, they could not buy or sell church property, nor could they mortgage the same. If the church wished to clothe them with any such power, it had to proceed to do so in the way such powers are created by any other person or body. So, therefore, when these trustees signed this paper along with John L. Dart, unless the plaintiff saw proper to authorize it in the first instance, or ratified it afterwards, it was mere waste paper. The defendant, Dart, saw this; hence he introduced testimony tending to show that this church ratified the action in its behalf of these trustees, being fully informed of their conduct. This is a question of fact. The master and circuit judge have both found that the church knew what those trustees had done, and, after such knowledge, ratified it. There is contradictory testimony in the record before us. We have felt ourselves bound to adopt the conclusion of the master and circuit judge, especially in view of the payment of the $42 as semiannual interest on the $1,200 set out in the instrument under seal hereinbefore introduced.

2. We cannot hold the defendant, Dart, trustee for the plaintiff church, in view of our conclusion as to the paper writing referred to in disposing of the first exception. There is some ugly testimony in the record, however. We refer just here to the testimony of the Rev. D. J. Jenkins, who, on oath, says he was willing to give $2,600 for the property, and told the pastor (Smith) of the plaintiff church of such willingness. Smith was a close friend of Dart. Smith prevailed on him not to bid for the property, as he wanted it bid in for the church. But

Dart is not convicted by the testimony with this chilling of bids, or with this statement that the property was to be bid in for the church.

3. We think the judgment is right in holding a want of mutuality in the contract alleged by the plaintiff to have been made by Dart. Interest at 7 per cent. was too precarious in purchasing property at the price of $2,105, when that was the full market value thereof. Deterioration, possible loss by fire, etc.

4. We think our holding under the first exception virtually disposes of this exception. We agree with the appellants that it was incumbent on the defendant to show that the agreement of the 3d September, 1901, was ratified by the church. But we hold that the testimony showed that the church did ratify it.

5. The testimony does not convince us that J. L. Dart was guilty of fraud in his dealing with the plaintiff church. He certainly made a payment for the property in cash, which was more, by a little, than Capt. Hyde, as a real estate broker, said it was worth. He (Dart) wrote to the church at once after he received his deed. He met the church trustees soon after his return to Charleston in the month of September, 1901. All things were then reduced to writing. He used all the property purchased, except the church, as his own, from the date of the purchase. This was to be seen by all men. The church paid $42 as semiannual interest thereafter. The rents of the parsonage and shop were $156 per annum. If they represented $905 of the $2,105 purchase, it was far beyond 7 per cent. These people knew what these rents were.

6. The resolution adopted at the mass meeting of the plaintiff church in September, 1902, cannot throw much light on the happenings of 1901. Indeed, it is easy to fan a little dissatisfaction into a raging flame, with these excitable people.

7. The facts recited in this exception are virtually included in our previous holdings herein, and we will not go over them anew.

8. Having made our views plain as to our inability to upset this settlement of differences between Dart and the plaintiff church, we cannot order Dart to reconvey the property to the plaintiff church, as pointed out and asked for in this, the eighth exception.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

J. C. STEVENSON & CO. v. BETHEA.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 19, 1904.)

SEALED NOTE—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. Where a sealed note is assigned to a third person, he takes it with all the infirmities it has when in the possession of the original obligee.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; Townsend, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by J. C. Stevenson & Co. against Philip W. Bethea. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. W. Johnson, for appellant. J. M. Johnson and Junius H. Evans, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action is brought to enforce, by claim and delivery, a chattel mortgage, after condition broken. The circuit judge, in his charge to the jury, directed them, if they found as a fact that the note and mortgage were actually made by the defendant, then they must find a verdict for the plaintiff. Such was their finding. Hence this appeal.

It seems to us that the pleadings themselves tended to cloud the true issue. In the complaint the note is described as a promissory note, and in the answer it is admitted to be a promissory note. In the evidence furnished by the note itself when it was introduced, it is shown to have been a sealed note or single bill. There is all the difference in the world, in law, between a promissory note and a single bill, for, when the former is passed for value before maturity into the hands of a new holder, the maker loses all right to question its character. Not so as to a single bill—a sealed note—for, when it is assigned to a third person, such third person or assignee takes it with all the infirmities it has when in the possession of the original obligee. The obligor can show that the single bill or sealed note was without consideration, or is void from any cause. These matters are so fully discussed in the cases of Patterson v. Rabb, 38 S. C. 138, 17 S. E. 463, 19 L. R. A. 831, and also in McLaughlin v. Braddy, 63 S. C. 438, 41 S. E. 523, 90 Am. St. Rep. 681, that it is useless to discuss them anew. We may therefore content ourselves with the bare announcement of the principles governing the two classes of notes. The note made by Philip W. Bethea, defendant here, to B. S. Ellis, was as follows: "$1,000.00. Zion, South Carolina, June 19th, 1901. [By first day of October after date I promise to pay to the order of B. S. Ellis, of Zion, S. C., the sum of one thousand dollars for value received with interest after maturity at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. The party or parties making this note agree to pay all attorney's fees and expenses which may be incurred in its collection. P. W. Bethea. [L. S.]]" It was transferred to the plaintiffs, J. S. Stevenson & Co., a few days after it was made. No notice was given by any one to P. W. Bethea of Ellis' assignment thereof. Under the principle of law governing choses in action in this state, the foregoing note was a sealed note; it was sealed by the defendant; and whatever infirmities or equities existed in favor of P. W. Bethea as to J. B. Ellis also existed in his favor against J. C. Stevenson & Co., as his assignee. The defendant, in his answer, sets up that this note, and the mortgage given to secure it, represented no debt due by him to B. S. Ellis, but the sole purpose of their execution was in order that Ellis might raise money for P. W. Bethea, with which Bethea was to pay a debt to a third person, and that Ellis never raised a dollar for Bethea, and also that Bethea is not indebted to J. C. Stevenson & Co., nor does Bethea owe Ellis anything. Under these circumstances, it was perfectly competent for Bethea, at the trial, to show these facts, which, if established, would have been a complete defense. But it seems the circuit judge took a different view of his power to admit such testimony. Herein he erred. This error is set up by the defendant as his third ground of appeal. We do not think there would have been any error by the circuit judge in his direction to the jury if this had been, as he supposed, a negotiable or promissory note. We have just held it was a sealed note. The trial judge was wrong in this particular also. The foregoing is the first ground of appeal.

As to the admission of B. S. Ellis' letter, dated 24th June, 1901, to J. C. Stevenson & Co., if error at all, it was harmless error. Certainly the defendant ought not to complain as to its introduction, for it shows Ellis wished to have had the cash—at least $750—from one of the banks in Wilmington, N. C., from the discount of Bethea's note. It was an afterthought to seek to obtain groceries upon it from Stevenson & Co. This is the second ground of appeal.

We have already held that the circuit judge erred, as set out in the fourth exception, in not permitting the defendant to develop his case by offering testimony.

We have thus disposed of the exceptions of defendant by sustaining all but the second.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the action be remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

DRINKARD v. HEPTINSTALL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 15, 1904.)

UNLAWFUL DETAINER—SUMMONS—PLEADING—AMENDMENTS—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

1. A justice's summons in a suit of unlawful detainer, defective for an insufficient description of the property, may be amended on appeal to the circuit court, when substantial justice will be promoted by such amendment.

2. On appeal from a justice the case may be tried on such pleadings as will secure substantial justice between the parties, whether such pleadings are made up in court or before the justice. The circuit court may amend the pleadings to promote the ends of justice and secure a fair trial.

3. A lease which provides that the tenant may have the refusal of the premises from month to month so long as the tenant may desire to occupy the premises is a grant of preference over other proposed tenants if the landlord continues to rent the property. Such lease terminates at the end of each month, and no notice to quit is necessary. A demand for the possession of the property is sufficient to prevent a renewal of the tenancy and give the landlord the right to sue for possession at the end of the current month.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by Hattie N. Drinkard against J. P. Heptinstall. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. Walter McClaugherty, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Ritz and Anderson & Easley, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. J. P. Heptinstall complains, on writ of error, of a judgment of the circuit court of Mercer county, rendered against him on the 29th day of May, 1902, in favor of Hattie N. Drinkard, in an action of unlawful detainer, entitling her to possession of certain property held by the defendant as her tenant.

The first error assigned is that the circuit court permitted plaintiff to amend her summons as to the description of the property after motion to quash. The court did this by virtue of section 212, c. 50, Code 1899, which reads as follows, to wit: "No such summons shall be quashed or held insufficient for any defect in the description of the premises therein mentioned, if the description be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended thereby. And if in the opinion of the justice such description is not sufficient under the provision of this section, the plaintiff may amend the summons so as to make the description sufficient." And section 169, c. 50, says: "The appeal may be tried upon the pleadings made up in the justice's court, or the pleadings may be amended before or during the trial of the appeal when substantial justice will be promoted by the amendment." It is very plain that the court committed no error in allowing such amendment. Thorn v. Thorn. 47 W. Va. 4, 34 S. E. 759; Simpkins v. White, 43 W. Va. 125, 27 S. E. 361.

The second error assigned is because the plaintiff failed to refile her affidavit filed before the justice denying that title to real estate would come in controversy. This was wholly unnecessary, as such counter affidavit was already in the case, and the issue on the same was fully made up before the justice; and because the defendant chooses to have an order refile his affidavit in court does not destroy the issue already joined thereon before the justice. It plainly appears that the title to the property in controversy was not in question, and the defendant did not even insist on the circuit court passing on this question prior to trial, but his refile of the affidavit was regarded as the filing of a

All the other assignments of error relate to the merits of the case and depend entirely on the construction of defendant's lease. Plaintiff purchased the property in controversy of J. H. Nash, and held a deed for it bearing date 14th August, 1901. On the 15th August, 1901, she served on the defendant the following notice: "Bluefield, W. Va., Aug. 15, 1901. Mr. J. P. Heptinstall, Bluefield, West Virginia—Dear Sir: Owing to the fact that I wish to have the rooms which you now occupy overhauled and papered, I hereby notify you to vacate said rooms at once. Should you remain in said rooms over five days from date of this notice you will be required to pay rents at the rate of twenty dollars ($20) per month, also to pay all water rents. This August 15th, 1901. Hattie N. Drinkard."

He refused to give up the property, and wrote plaintiff a letter as follows:

"J. P. Heptinstall, Lawyer and Notary Public. Reference—First National Bank, Bluefield, W. Va., August 18th, 1901. Mrs. Hattie N. Drinkard, Bluefield, W. Va.—Dear Madam: Your notice dated August 15th, 1901, was received to-day. I beg to say that I have a rental contract with H. M. Nash who represented himself to be the owner of the property which I now occupy, and I shall still claim the rights so acquired by me and shall not comply with the terms of your notice. Respectfully, J. P. Heptinstall."

Defendant's lease is in the following words:

"This deed, made the 8th day of June, 1898, between H. M. Nash and J. P. Heptinstall, Witnesseth that the said H. M. Nash doth demise unto the said J. P. Heptinstall all of the second floor of the two-story brick building belonging to said H. M. Nash, fronting on Bland Street on the east side thereof, in Bluefield, Mercer County, West Virginia, lately occupied by V. V. Austin, and over that part of said building used by said H. M. Nash as a grocery store, and doth demise to said Heptinstall one coal house and one privy on the eastern end of said lot, with the right of ingress, egress and regress through and over said lot to said coal house and privy, from the 10th day of June, 1898, to the 10th day of July, 1898, thence next ensuing with the refusal of said premises from month to month thereafter so long as said J. P. Heptinstall may desire to occupy said premises, said Heptinstall paying to said Nash therefor the monthly rentals of fifteen $\frac{75}{100}$ dollars at the end of each rental month, said H. M. Nash to furnish water for the use of said Heptinstall, delivered on said second floor of said brick building, and to pay the water rents, to keep said premises in good repair, and to remove all deposits from said privy, and should said repair not be made or said privy not cleaned within 48 hours notice thereof, then said Heptinstall shall have the power to have same done and deduct any necessary expense incurred thereby from the rents of said premises; and nothing shall be paid to said Nash until the rents shall make sufficient returns for payment of the expense so incurred. Witness the following signatures and seals.

H. M. Nash. [Seal.]

"J. P. Heptinstall. [Seal.]"

Defendant's objection to the introduction of plaintiff's deed in evidence because the description in the summons does not correspond with the description in the deed is not tenable for the reason that defendant only withheld a portion of the property mentioned in the deed, which undoubtedly covered the same. It is insisted on the part of the defendant that his contract made him an annual renter, and that he was entitled to three months' notice to quit; or that he was a periodical monthly renter, and entitled to one month's notice to quit. A careful examination of the lease shows that neither of these propositions is correct. He was not an annual renter for the reason the lease reads, "thence next ensuing, with the refusal of said premises from month to month thereafter, so long as said J. P. Heptinstall may desire to occupy said premises." These words create a mere preference of renting from month to month, and not a periodical tenancy; and this is, if the landlord continues to rent the property, he will accord to the tenant the privilege of renting at the end of each month of the tenancy. There is no obligation on the landlord to continue to rent his property indefinitely or perpetually to any one, or to renew defendant's lease so long as he may desire to occupy the property from month to month, but at the end of any month the landlord may desire to cease renting the property he may terminate the tenancy by refusal to renew the lease and demand for possession of the property. Crawford v. Morris, 5 Grat. 90. The defendant's term ends with his month each time, unless it is renewed by the assent of the parties, express or implied, and no notice to quit is necessary. Code 1899, § 5, c. 93. A demand for possession and a refusal to renew is sufficient. The plaintiff gave the defendant notice on the 15th day of August that she wanted possession of the property for the purpose of making repairs. He was entitled to hold on until the end of his current month, the 10th day of September following. Thereafter he could not continue to hold without a renewal of his lease. She began her suit for possession on the 16th of September, one month from the time of her demand. She was entitled to possession at any time after the 10th of September, the expiration of the tenancy.

Defendant insists that because plaintiff's notice contained the following language, to wit: "Should you remain in said rooms over five days from date of this notice, you will be required to pay rents at the rate of twenty dollars ($20) per month; also pay all water rents"—that this is a renewal of the lease.

Such is not the case, but the language is only warning that, if he remains over five days, and she is compelled to put him out, she will require him to pay her $20 per month so long as he unlawfully withholds the property from her. The notice is that she wants the property at once, and does not want to rent it to the defendant any longer, and cannot be otherwise construed.

This determines all material points in favor of the plaintiff. The circuit court's judgment is plainly right, and is affirmed.

WASHINGTON NAT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. WESTFALL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

APPEAL — RECORD — USURY — PLEADING — FORECLOSURE — SALE — DECREE.

1. A demurrer, copied into the record by the clerk, no order or decree of the court having been entered in the cause tendering or filing the same, nor in any manner recognising it as tendered or filed, is not a part of the record, and cannot be considered by the appellate court.

2. In a suit in equity to enforce a specific lien, to make the defense of usury, the defendant may in his answer in general terms aver that the contract or assurance on which the proceeding is founded was for the payment of interest at a greater rate than is allowed by law.

3. In such suit, where the plaintiff, a building and loan association, was claiming a balance due it, according to the terms of its contract, of $670.40, as of the 30th of November, 1899, and the defendant by his answer says that his payments, as shown by his passbook, furnished by plaintiff, aggregated $639.70; that the association charged $4 per month interest on the $800 loan, and $4 per month premium thereon, and $4.80 dues on the eight shares of stock upon which the loan was made, and that on the 1st day of September, 1898, he only owed the plaintiff $317.65, with interest from that day; that from the 1st day of September, 1898, he made default in the payment of dues, interest, premium, and fines, and has continued to do so from that time to this; and further answered "that under the terms of said deed of trust, if default should be made, the whole debt should become due and a mere interest-bearing fund," held, such answer did not raise the question of usury. Held, further, that the defense of usury not being made by the defendant by his answer, the commissioner was not warranted in applying all payments made by defendant, of interest, premium, dues, and fines, on account of said loan of $800 and interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

4. In a suit brought directly against the defendant to enforce the collection of a demand, the defense of usury must be pleaded, either by special plea or answer, or it cannot be relied on at the hearing.

5. It is error to decree the sale of real estate by a special commissioner in a cause, without specifying therein the terms upon which the sale is to be made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Upshur County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Action by the Washington National Building & Loan Association against G. D. Westfall and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Forrest W. Brown and G. M. Fleming, for appellant. Young & McWhorter and C. C. Higginbotham, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. Granville D. Westfall subscribed for eight shares of stock in the Washington National Building & Loan Association, of Washington, D. C. The association advanced to him a loan of $800, the par value of said eight shares of stock, in redemption thereof. Westfall executed his bond, dated July 30, 1894, payable to said association, in the sum of $1,600, with the following conditions: "The conditions of the above obligations are such that if the above-bound Granville D. Westfall shall well and truly, in the manner prescribed by its charter and by-laws, pay the said association monthly installments of twelve and ⁰⁰/₁₀₀ dollars each from the first day of August, 1894, until such time as the shares of stock hereinafter referred to shall be fully paid up—but no payments on account of stock nor premiums shall be exacted for a longer period than 84 months from the date hereof; but, should said shares of stock fail to mature on or before the expiration of said period of 84 months, then 6 per cent. per annum on the original amount loaned shall continue and be paid in monthly installments until said stock shall mature, when all payments shall cease and the mortgage be canceled—in consideration of the sum of eight hundred (800) dollars advanced to him by said association for the redemption of eight (8) shares of stock thereof, and shall, in accordance with said charter and by-laws, during the time, pay all fines and charges, and shall faithfully perform all other obligations to said association as provided and imposed by and in pursuance of said charter and by-laws, and any amendment thereto, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force and virtue. The said Granville D. Westfall hereby waives the benefit of his homestead exemption of this bond, and hereby agrees that, if suit is brought on this bond or to foreclose the mortgage given to secure the same, then upon such suit or foreclosure the same to be taxed as costs. G. D. Westfall. [L. S.]" He made the following assignment to the said association of his stock: "For value received, I hereby assign to the Washington National Building & Loan Association, of Washington, D. C., eight (8) shares of stock therein, this day redeemed at one hundred dollars per share. Witness my hand this 30th day of July, 1894. G. D. Westfall. [L. S.]" On the same day he conveyed to Josiah O. Stoddard and Addison G. Du Bois, trustees of the said association, a tract of 11¼ acres of land in Upshur county, "in trust for the following uses and purposes: First, that the party of the first part may retain quiet possession of said property so long as there shall be no default on the part of the said Granville D. Westfall in performing the condition of the said bond or complying with the covenants herein contained. Second, that upon such default the said trustees, or either of them, or the survivor of them, thereunto required by the board of directors of said association, shall sell the property hereby conveyed, or so much thereof as may be necessary, at public auction on the premises, after having given ten days' notice of the time and place of sale in some newspaper published in Upshur county, W. Va., and upon the following terms: For cash as to so much of the purchase money as may be necessary to pay the expenses of executing this trust and the balance that shall be ascertained by the said board of directors to be due on said bond, the whole amount of which it is agreed shall, upon such default, at once become due and payable, together with all fines, charges, or other money at that time due said association on account of the debt evidenced by the bond hereby secured; and as to the residue of the purchase money upon such terms as to cash or credit as the trustees may determine—the credit payments, if any, to be secured by lien on the property, and, after paying the debt secured by said bond, the balance, if any, shall be paid to the said Granville D. Westfall, his heirs, personal representatives, or assigns. It is further covenanted between the parties hereto that the said grantors will, so long as the bond hereby secured remain unpaid, keep the buildings on said property hereby conveyed insured for the benefit of the beneficiary hereunder in some solvent insurance company for at least the sum of eight hundred (800) dollars. And the said grantors further covenant that, should they fail so to do, the said association or its assigns, or the trustees in this deed, shall be at liberty to insure the said buildings for at least the sum aforesaid, and all sums of money so paid shall be deemed and treated as secured by this deed as a part of the costs and expenses of this trust, and be paid out of the proceeds of sale of said property, if not otherwise paid. The said party of the first part covenants that he has the right to convey the property aforesaid to the parties of the second part, that the same is free from incumbrance, that he will warrant generally the title hereto, and that the party of the first part will execute such further assurance thereof as may be requisite." This deed of trust was duly acknowledged and recorded.

The said Westfall having made default, the said building and loan association filed its bill in the circuit court of Upshur county against said G. D. Westfall, Annie L. Post and Josiah C. Stoddard and Addison G. Du Bois, trustees, alleging the loan to the said Westfall on the 30th day of July, 1894, on the said eight shares of stock, subscribed for and owned by him, and the execution of the bond and the said deed of trust, and the assignment of the said shares of stock to the company, so redeemed by it at $100 a share, and alleging that there was a balance due September 30, 1898, of $709.13, and, if payment should not be made by September 30, 1898, 26½ cents per day thereafter should be added to said balance to cover interest and premium; that after bringing said suit, and before the filing of its bill, there had been paid on said interest and premium, dues, and fines the sum of $100; that on April 6, 1895, said Westfall conveyed said 1¼ acres of land to the defendant Annie L. Post, by deed of that date, with condition that she should pay the dues monthly to said association from said Westfall; that by dues it was intended in said deed that said Post should assume all of said Westfall's obligations to said association under said bond and deed of trust, and pay all of said dues, interest, and premiums monthly, and pay fines, if any were allowed to accrue, and pay taxes and insurance; that both said Westfall and said Post, by the latter's acceptance of said conveyance, were under obligations to pay plaintiff said interest, premiums, insurance, and fines, and that there had been default in such payment by both Westfall and Post, and under the terms of said bond and trust deed all of said loan had become due, and the lien of said trust deed was entitled to be enforced; that defendants Stoddard and Du Bois had failed and refused to execute said trust, for which reason and because of said conveyance to said plaintiff it was advised that it was proper to resort to a court of equity to have the trust enforced—and prayed that the said debt of $709.13, as of the 30th day of September, 1898, with a credit of $100 as of the — day of December, 1898, with addition of 26½ cents per day from the 30th of September, 1898, until the date of said credit, be decreed against said Westfall and said Post, and that said real estate be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of said debt, and that it might recover its costs, and for general relief.

The defendant G. D. Westfall suggested that plaintiff had not filed any of the exhibits mentioned in its bill, and prayed a rule against the plaintiff requiring it to file its exhibits; and upon such suggestion and motion of the said defendant the court made an order requiring such exhibits to be filed with the bill by the next morning. The date of the order does not appear in the record; but, as the exhibits appear embodied in the bill as the record is made up, we take it that the order was complied with. There is copied into the record a paper purporting to be a demurrer on behalf of defendant G. D. Westfall; but the record does not show that it was filed, or even tendered for consideration, and no order or decree takes any notice of it. The demurrer is not relied upon, or even mentioned, in the brief of counsel for defendant, and, being no part of the record, we cannot consider it. Park v. Petroleum Company, 25 W. Va. 108.

The plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental bill, reiterating the allegations of the original bill in relation to the loan of the $800 to Westfall and the execution of the bond and deed of trust, and the conveyance of the real estate to the defendant Post, with condition that she pay to plaintiff the obligations of said Westfall under his bond and deed of trust; that said Westfall had again postponed and delayed the prosecution of said suit by promises to make settlement of the arrearages and costs, and carry on his loan and payments of interest thereon, and monthly premiums on stock in accordance with his original contract, but had utterly failed to do so; that it was informed by said G. D. Westfall that he had paid said Post all advancements that she had made on said land, and had paid all, or nearly all, interest, monthly premiums, and dues paid to the plaintiff under said loan, and had paid back to said Post any such premium, interest, and dues that she might have paid under said loan and said Westfall's conveyance to her of said real estate, and that he was entitled to have said land reconveyed to him, and was in fact the bona fide owner thereof as between him and said Post; that said Westfall was still delinquent and in arrears in the payment of interest, premium, dues, taxes, fines, and insurance, which he was to pay and keep paid under said deed of trust and bond filed with the original bill; that Post was likewise delinquent; and that plaintiff's entire debt, under the provisions of said loan, was then due and payable, and plaintiff was entitled to have a decree for the same, both against Post and Westfall, and declared a lien against said land superior to any rights of the said Post to the same—and filed a statement as an exhibit with said amended and supplemental bill, showing a balance due December 29, 1899, of $697.53, and prayed for a decree for the satisfaction of the same as a lien on said property and for general relief.

Defendant Westfall filed his separate answer to said original and amended bills, admitting that he subscribed for the stock, and borrowed the $800, and executed the bond and deed of trust to secure the said loan, and filed as an exhibit with his answer, showing payments made by him on said dues, interest, premium, and fines, which he claimed aggregated the sum of $639.70, and that he paid to said association $4.80 in addition thereto. Defendant further claimed that the association charged $4 per month interest on said $800, premiums $4 per month, and dues $4.80 per month, which interest, dues, and premiums should be applied on said debt; that on the 1st day of September, 1898, he only owed said association $317.65, and that he had not owed said association any other debt since that time; that from the 1st day of September, 1898, he made default in the payment of the dues, interest, premiums, and fines, and had continued to do so from that time to the present; that under the terms of said deed of trust, if default should be made, the whole debt should become due and a mere interest-bearing fund; that he owed said association $317.65, with interest from the 1st day of September, 1898. Respondent denied that he had gained postponement and delay in the prosecution of the suit by promises to make settlement in the arrearages and costs, and carry on his loan and payment of the interest thereon and monthly premiums on stock in accordance with his original contract, but had failed to do so, and denied the allegation that he had asserted that he had paid Post all advancements as alleged in the bill, and that he was in fact the bona fide owner of the land, and entitled to have same conveyed to him.

A decree was entered upon the process on the original bill, and the amended bill taken for confessed and set for hearing, except as to G. D. Westfall, who filed his answer, and the cause was referred to one of the commissioners of the court to ascertain and report the present owner, legal or equitable, of the 11½ acres of land in the bills mentioned, the liens thereon, and the amounts and priorities, and to whom owing, and any other matters deemed pertinent by him or any of the parties. This decree is dated the 13th day of June, 1900. The commissioner filed his report, bearing date the 2d day of March, 1901, to which report the plaintiff filed the following exceptions: "The plaintiff excepts to the foregoing report: (1) Because the commissioner has applied all payments made by G. D. Westfall under his contract with plaintiff, by which the loan of $800 was made to him, to interest at 6 per cent. and to the reduction of said loan as payments upon said principal, instead of allowing premium as agreed between the parties and monthly dues on stock; the true balance that should have been found in favor of plaintiff being $670.40 as of the 30th of November, 1899, as shown on the paper 'A' with deposition of J. O. Stoddard. (2) Because he has made monthly application of such payments, when in fact, as shown by said Westfall's passbook, the payments were made principally at two or three times only, and in bulk of $100, $150, etc., at a time. (3) Because he has not allowed to plaintiff the 800 fines unpaid, or the $10.80 already credited up to him out of the payment he has made. (4) Because he did not make statement of the calculation by which he arrived at the balance due, but at the request of plaintiff's attorney he (the said commissioner) has furnished said statement and pages of paper; and plaintiff asks that this calculation be held as a part of said report. March 2, 1901. G. M. Fleming, Atty. for Plaintiff."

The defendant G. D. Westfall by his counsel indorsed his objection to the said exceptions as follows: "G. D. Westfall says: That the first exception should not be sustained, because the plaintiff did not fix by its by-laws a minimum premium. See Code 1891, c. 54, § 26; Code 1899, c. 54, § 26; Gray v. B. & L. A. (W. Va.) 37 S. E. 535, 54 L. R. A. 217. That the second exception should not be sustained, because the commissioner applied the payments when made, and as to the payments of $100 and $150 he applied them when made, and not as stated in said exception. As proof of this he reported as due $423.90, as his calculation made on a basis of monthly applications makes us due only $363.44. See statement of such calculation filed by commissioner at request of plaintiff marked 'Exhibit X. Y. Z.' Accompanied by a statement showing regular monthly charges of interest and monthly credits from August, 1894, starting with the sum of $800 advanced, and closing with a total balance March 4, 1901, of $363.40. "That the third exception should not be sustained because plaintiff is not entitled to said $10.80 fines, and that the fourth exception should not be sustained because the commissioner is not required to file with his report his calculation. C. C. Higginbotham, Atty. for G. D. Westfall."

The court entered its final decree after these exceptions and statement by defendant Westfall, date of decree not given, as follows: "It appearing to the court that process in this cause has been duly served on the defendants, that the plaintiff's bill was filed at rules, was there taken for confessed and was by the plaintiff set for hearing at rules, and this cause coming on this day to be heard upon the bill, exhibits therewith, report of Commissioner W. G. D. Totten, with exceptions thereto by the plaintiff, which exceptions, being considered by the court, are overruled, and was argued by counsel for plaintiff, upon consideration thereof it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said report be confirmed. It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that G. D. Westfall do pay to the plaintiff the sum of $425.86, with interest from this day and the costs of this suit, which debt and costs are a first lien on the 11¼ acres, with dwelling house thereon, situate on the Staunton & Parkersburg turnpike, in Upshur county, and conveyed by said G. D. Westfall to Josiah C. Stoddard and Addison G. Du Bois by deed of trust dated the 30th day of July, 1894, and shall be first paid out of the proceeds of its sale. It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said G. D. Westfall pay to Franklin Davis Nursery Co. the sum of $111.10, with like interest, and that the same is a second lien on said 11¼ acres of land, with dwelling house thereon. It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that, unless said debts and costs shall be paid within 60 days from this date, it shall be the duty of G. M. Fleming, who is hereby appointed a special commissioner for the purpose, to sell said parcel of land at the front door of the courthouse of Upshur county, on some court day for said county, at public auction, to the highest bidder, taking from the purchaser notes, with good security, bearing interest from the day of sale, and retaining the legal title as a further security until the purchase money is fully paid, after having advertised the time, terms, and place of sale of said real estate, together with a general description thereof, by notice published once a week for four successive weeks in some newspaper published in said Upshur county." From such decree the plaintiff appealed.

The argument of counsel for the defendant and appellee starts out with this proposition: "All the points to be discussed in this case veer to the central question involved, viz., was the loan by appellant to G. D. Westfall usurious?" Has the question of usury been fairly raised in the cause? Section 6, c. 96, Code 1899, provides: "Any defendant may plead in general terms that the contract or assurance on which the action is brought was for the payment of interest at a greater rate than is allowed by law, to which plea the plaintiff shall reply generally, but may give in evidence upon the issue made up thereon any matter which could be given in evidence under a special replication." Webb on Usury, in section 405, p. 468, says: "The defense of usury must be pleaded, or it cannot be relied on at the hearing; and, where advantage is sought of usury in a foreclosure proceeding, it should be pleaded in the answer, and it cannot be properly exhibited in a cross-bill." In Chambers v. Chalmers, 4 Gill & J. 420, 23 Am. Dec. 572, it is held that "where a bill for the specific execution of a contract states a case which may or may not be usurious, according to the facts which really exist in the case, the statute of usury must be pleaded or relied upon in the answer, or it will not avail the defendant. The rule might be different if the bill stated a usurious contract, which no inference or intendment can help." 1 Beach, Modern Eq. Pr. § 349, says: "There can be no doubt that usury may be pleaded or relied upon in the answer, which must set out with precision and accuracy the particular facts and circumstances of the supposed usurious agreement, that the court may see that it was in violation of the statute. The terms of the usurious contract and the quantum of the usurious interest or premium must be specified, and distinctly and correctly set out"—and cases cited. The subject of pleading usury is fully discussed and many authorities cited in Tyler on Usury, pp. 458-463. The particularity and precision of the pleading of facts constituting usury is not required under our statute, as in most of the authorities cited; but "the defendant may plead in general terms that the contract or assurance on which the action is brought was for the payment of interest at a greater rate than is allowed by law, and this is sufficient in an answer to raise the question of usury in a court of equity." 1 Hogg's Eq. Proc. § 436, citing Brakeley v. Tuttle, 8 W. Va. 88, 131. Upon inspection of the answer defendant Westfall filed in this cause, it will be seen that he makes no specific allegation or averment of usury in the contract involved. He nowhere says that the plaintiff charged in said contract a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law. He contents himself with merely stating the amount of interest, premium, and dues paid under such contract, which would indicate that he was merely describing the contract as a building and loan contract, and says that the payment of such interest, dues, and premiums should be applied on said debt of $800, but gives no reason for any such application. He seems to have studiously avoided making any charge of usury against the plaintiff. He nowhere in his answer shows any reason why the contract is not a valid, honest building and loan contract, authorized by the statute. He says in his answer: "This defendant further says that under the terms of said deed of trust, if default should be made, the whole debt should become due and a mere interest-bearing fund. The defendant further says that he only owes said association $317.65, with interest from the 1st day of September, 1898." He does not show, nor attempt to show, in his answer, why or how he owes the association only the sum specified. "The plea of usury (apart from fraud) must conform to the statute, where, as a defense, it has been made the subject of special litigation. But where property is sold on a usurious mortgage, and the proceeds are in court for distribution, the defense of usury need not be raised by special plea." End. on Building Ass'ns, § 378. And, as has been cited in Webb on Usury, "the defense of usury must be pleaded, or it cannot be relied on at the hearing" in a suit brought directly against the defendant by the creditor upon the alleged usurious claim; yet in a creditors' suit against a debtor, where creditors not named as parties in a suit, but are brought in by being convened to make their claims before a commissioner against the defendant, the latter may raise the question of usury by exceptions to the commissioner's report. Barbour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410, 7 S. E. 1. See, also, Webb on Usury, p. 470, § 407, where it is said: "It may be relied upon before a commissioner; and if the commissioner audits a usurious debt against a debtor, and he has not raised such defense in any other mode in the suit, he must in a written exception to the report, signed by the counsel or himself, clearly and distinctly except on the ground that in the report interest has been charged against him in excess of what the law allows"—citing Barbour v. Tompkins. The defendant Westfall, having filed his answer and failed to make any defense of usury, could not raise the question of usury in the vague and uncertain manner it is supposed to be raised in his written reply to the exceptions taken to the commissioner's report by the plaintiff. In permitting the cause to be finally heard upon his answer herein, he failed to make the defense of usury, and waived his right to make such defense; and, the question not having been raised by the pleadings in the cause, it was error for the commissioner to base his calculation of interest on the theory that the debt of $800 was a straight loan at 6 per cent. interest, and the exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the commissioner's report should have been sustained, and a decree entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount due to it at the time of the entering of the decree according to the terms of the contract sued upon. The decree is further erroneous in that it does not direct the terms of the sale to be made, whether for cash or on credit, and terms, as provided in section 1, c. 132, Code 1899.

For the reasons stated, the exceptions of the plaintiff to the commissioner's report are sustained, the decree of the circuit court is reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Upshur county, with directions to ascertain the true amount due to the plaintiff on account of the said loan according to the terms and provisions of the bond and deed of trust securing the same, and to enter a decree therefor, together with provision for the sale of the 11¼ acres of land to satisfy the decree, in case it shall not be paid within the time to be fixed by the court for the payment thereof.

FAULKNER et al. v. GRANTHAM et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

EXPRESS TRUST—INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. To sustain an express trust by oral testimony against an absolute deed, after a lapse of over 30 years, the grantee being dead, and having exercised complete control over the property during his lifetime, the evidence must be full, clear, and explicit, and not open to grave doubts, contradictions, and circumstances of suspicion.

2. When the circuit court has examined the testimony, and found it insufficient to sustain an alleged verbal trust set up after a long lapse of time and the decease of the alleged trustee, this court will not interfere with such finding, unless it is plainly contrary to the competent evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Berkeley County; Forrest W. Brown, Special Judge.

Suit by E. Boyd Faulkner and others against Melvina Grantham and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Josephine O'Brien appeals. Affirmed.

D. B. Lucas, Marshall McCormick, and Flick, Westenhaver & Noll, for appellants. Faulkner, Walker & Woods, Ingles & Nadenbousch, and H. H. Emmert, for appellees.

DENT, J. Josephine O'Brien complains of a decree of the circuit court of Berkeley county of the 5th day of March, 1903, dismissing her petition and amended petition filed in the chancery cause of M. S. Grantham's Adm'r v. M. S. Grantham's Heirs, etc. Appellant filed her petitions in said cause, claiming that the property known as "Grantham Hall," situated in Martinsburg, said county, was held in trust by M. S. Grantham, deceased; that the same had been purchased and paid for by her father, who conveyed and had the same conveyed to his uncle, M. S. Grantham, to be held in trust for her; that the said M. S. Grantham always acknowledged the trust, and accounted for the rents until within a few years of his death; and she asked that the trust be sustained, and a deed be executed conveying the legal title to her. The deed from the commissioners of the court to M. S. Grantham bears date the 10th day of January, 1855, the deed from Joseph W. Grantham to M. S. Grantham for the former's interest in the property the 19th day of January, 1856. M. S. Grantham died in July, 1890. A period of over 34 years has passed since the making of the last of the two deeds, and now, against the same, the appellant attempts to set up a verbal trust, and sustain the same by oral testimony, as she has not during all these 34 years any kind of writing to show the existence of such trust, nor does she furnish any sufficient legal excuse for not having asserted such trust during the lifetime of her alleged trustee. This case is governed by the principles adjudicated in the case of Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, where it is held that equity will never enforce "a parol trust where a great lapse of time has intervened since the absolute deed was executed, and where the grantee has during such time acted as the absolute owner of the property, unless the laches of those claiming to be cestuis que trust is satisfactorily explained" by evidence full, clear, and unquestionable. Also, on page 582: "All the authorities agree that an equitable claim of any sort, and especially one which depends on parol testimony only, will not be recognized after great lapse of time, during which time it has been ignored, where no satisfactory reason can be assigned for not setting up the claim sooner. And that is more especially true when the equitable claim is of a character which required clear and explicit evidence to sustain it; such lapse of time itself rendering the evidence which might otherwise have been regarded as sufficiently clear and explicit unsatisfactory." A careful examination of the evidence in this case fails to show any good legal reason why this trust, if it existed, was not asserted during the lifetime of M. S. Grantham. The petitioner had 34 years in which to do so, and yet the only reason for not doing so is the confidence she had in her trustee, who died without having in any writing of any description recognized such trust. Yet he wrote many letters—10 to the alleged creator of the trust—and in none of which, even in the vaguest manner, did he recognize or admit such trust. On this question of lapse of time and insufficient excuse for delay this case could well be determined for the appellees. "A court of equity, which is never active in relief of stale demands, will always refuse relief where the party has slept upon his right and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call into activity this court by conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence. Where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing." Bill v. Schilling, 39 W. Va. 108, 19 S. E. 514. The evidence, taken as a whole, without regard to the competency of the witnesses, is neither full, clear, nor explicit to establish the trust claimed. There is no evidence showing an accounting from year to year of the rents of the trust property, and what little evidence of accounting there is tends rather to show a secret trust in favor of Joseph W. Grantham than a trust in favor of the daughter. The only positive evidence are the various pretended verbal acknowledgments of M. S. Grantham made to the witnesses, which are rendered insufficient and unsatisfactory by reason of his death and the relationship existing between the witnesses. The deeds, the will (which was refused probate, and of which the principal witness, Joseph W. Grantham, the creator of the supposed trust and father of the appellant, had knowledge before the death of M. S. Grantham), and the numerous letters, from what they fail to contain, are all strongly contradictory to the alleged verbal statements made by the deceased. Besides, the evidence of the appellant as to any transactions or communications had with the deceased is incompetent. Also the evidence of Joseph W. Grantham is equally incompetent. He was a party to the suit, and the creator of the trust, or the party through whom the appellant claims. Section 23, c. 130, Code 1899, provides that: "No party to any action, suit or proceeding, nor any person interested in the event thereof, nor any person from, through or under whom such party or interested person derives any interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall be examined as a witness with regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such person or the assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic." The appellant derives her whole interest from and through her father, Joseph W. Grantham; hence he is incompetent to testify, notwithstanding he may have an adverse interest, as to any transaction or communication he may have had with the decedent in establishing this alleged trust in favor of his daughter. Joseph W. Grantham being incompetent, so is his wife, H. C. Grantham, mother of the appellant. Kilgore's Adm'r v. Hanley, 27 W. Va. 451. These three witnesses, who are the principal witnesses, and without whose testimony the case is of but little weight, are entirely incompetent as to any transactions or communications had personally with the deceased, unless the opposing parties testified to identically the same communication or transaction. With the incompetent evidence

In, the case made out by the appellant is full of so many doubts, preplexities, and contradictions that this court would not feel justified in disturbing the finding of the circuit court; and, with the incompetent evidence out, the grounds for the interference of a court of equity are without foundation. If the property is appellant's, as she claims, she has lost it by her own negligence in failing to make her claim good during the 34 years of M. S. Grantham's life, or procuring from him some transfer or acknowledgment thereof.

This case, on its merits, being plainly insufficient to sustain the trust set up by the appellant, it is unnecessary to consider the other technical grounds of error alleged. The decree is therefore affirmed.

RES JUDICATA—PAYMENTS—APPLICATION.

1. Reversal of a decree is not res judicata as to any matters not necessarily passed on in reaching a decree of reversal, or not passed on in the opinion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by S. A. Rowan, administrator, and others, against E. B. Chenoweth and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants Yokum and Leonard appeal. Modified.

C. W. Dailey and Strader & Strader, for appellants. W. B. Maxwell and Harding & Harding, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. As will appear from a former decision in this case in 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. 544, 87 Am. St. Rep. 796, Chenoweth was sheriff of Randolph county, and Leonard was his deputy, and Chenoweth had a demand against Leonard for taxes collected by Leonard for which he failed to account, and for some duebills given by Leonard for different sums to Chenoweth; and Leonard had a demand against Chenoweth for half of the fees and emoluments of the office, going to Leonard under the agreement between them, and Leonard also held certain receipts for different sums of money received by Chenoweth from Leonard. In the former decision this court held that the demand of Leonard for half the fees of the office was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the demand of Chenoweth against Leonard for the taxes collected by Leonard was likewise barred. When the case was remanded to the circuit court from this court, it was recommended to a commissioner to restate the account between the parties. Leonard in the meantime had died. The commissioner made a statement, by which he charged against Leonard the duebills given by him to Chenoweth, and did not charge to Leonard's credit against Chenoweth the said receipts given by Chenoweth to Leonard for said moneys received from Leonard by Chenoweth. By this statement the said receipts were applied on the barred demand of Chenoweth against Leonard for taxes collected by Leonard. The commissioner also made another statement by which he credited to Leonard the moneys mentioned in said receipts given by Chenoweth, and thus applied those receipts on the duebills given by Leonard to Chenoweth. By the one statement Leonard was found indebted to Chenoweth $1,854.06, and by the other report Chenoweth was found indebted to Leonard $567.71. The court adopted by its decree the finding of the statement which gave Chenoweth against Leonard $1,854.06. The receipts given by Chenoweth to Leonard are four in number. They are alike in language. The following is a sample of them: "Received June 13, 1888, of G. W. Leonard, deputy for Z. T. Chenoweth, three hundred and twenty-five dollars, which I am to account to him for in the collection of taxes in the several districts of Randolph county for the year 1887. Z. T. Chenoweth, S. R. C." One of those orders states that the payment was made "in orders." There is a fifth paper, reading as follows: "Due George W. Leonard, deputy for Z. T. Chenoweth, sheriff of Randolph county, one hundred and forty three dollars and seventy five cents, it being amount of orders received from him this 15th day of July, 1889. Z. T. Chenoweth, S. R. C." From the decree Leonard's administrators appeal.

They complain of the action of the court in adopting that one of the two commissioner's statements submitted to the court for its decision which denies to Leonard credit for the said receipts on the theory that they were applicable on the taxes collected by Leonard as payments on the demand based on such collected taxes. Leonard's side claims that the moneys specified in said receipts should not be applied as payments on the barred demand of Chenoweth against Leonard for taxes collected by Leonard, but that those receipts should be treated as evidences of indebtedness in favor of Leonard, and credited to Leonard as such against Chenoweth. The Leonard side of the case says, first, that the decision of this court is res judicata to fix and settle the allowance to Leonard of the moneys specified in the said receipts, and that whether they should be allowed Leonard as evidences of debt against Chenoweth is not an open question, but is foreclosed by the former decision of this court, and that those receipts must be treated, not as payments on the barred taxes collected by Leonard, but as debts and set-offs against the duebills of Chenoweth against Leonard; and the Leonard side says, secondly, that, if even the former decision is not conclusive to show that said receipts must be allowed as debts against

Chenoweth, then those receipts on their face show that they are not payments on the demand against Leonard for the barred taxes collected by him, but are evidences of debt for Leonard against Chenoweth. First. Is the decision of this court conclusive to show that those receipts are to be allowed as evidences of debt for Leonard against Chenoweth, and are not to be treated as payments on the barred taxes due from Leonard to Chenoweth? The Leonard side argues that this court decided that Leonard's claim against Chenoweth for half the fees of office was barred, and could not be allowed, and that from this it follows that the receipts were allowed to Leonard; that the commissioner, in the report involved in the case when it was formerly in this court, had allowed those receipts to Leonard's credit; and that whilst the circuit court allowed Chenoweth the taxes collected by Leonard, and credited those receipts to Leonard, this court reversed the decree because of the allowance of said taxes to Chenoweth, it logically left the receipts untouched, left them as allowances in favor of Leonard, and did not reject those receipts, but only rejected Leonard's claim for half the fees of office. In other words, it rejected one of Leonard's claims, but not the other. Now, the allowance by the commissioner of those receipts to Leonard's credit was not excepted to by Chenoweth, and was not in issue before this court. No exception put them in controversy. This court did not pass on those receipts. It held Leonard's account against Chenoweth for half the fees of office barred, and Chenoweth's demand against Leonard for taxes collected barred, but did not pass on those receipts. It simply reversed the decree in toto, and remanded the case for a new account. A reversal is not res judicata as to matters on which the opinion does not pass, unless such matters were necessarily passed upon in reaching the decree of reversal. Reversal as to these receipts was not necessary to reach a reversal. Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103. If this court had only modified the decree of the circuit court so far as it allowed Leonard his half of the fees of office and allowed Chenoweth the taxes collected by Leonard, and in those respects reversed the decree, but in other respects affirmed it, or had simply reversed in those respects, then it might be said that those receipts were involved in the decision, and were to be allowed Leonard. But this, even, is questionable. A total reversal wiped out the decree, and left the case open except as to the items expressly passed on in the opinion. True, we did not hold those receipts barred; neither did we hold them debts. The circuit court, by confirming the report, did allow them to Leonard, but that confirmation was reversed. The opinion does not say whether those receipts were good or bad, and simply because they were not among the items held to be barred did not imply that they should be allowed in a further account. It is only by inference that it is sought to make the decision operate as allowance of those receipts, and the law says that a decision cannot be made to operate as res judicata by mere uncertain argument or inference. Bigelow on Estop. 152. Indeed, it may be said that the inference is the other way. Chenoweth's claim for taxes collected was allowed against Leonard by the report and decree, and the receipts were allowed as payments thereon, and, as such taxes were disallowed by the decree of this court, it would rather follow that so, too, the receipts were disallowed. The inference might be rather that the receipts were rejected than that they were allowed, because they were only allowed by the circuit court as payments on the demand against Leonard for taxes, and, as that demand was held barred, the payments would go with them. In short, the inference would be that the decree below impressed them with the character of payments on taxes, and hence the decision fixes them as payments on those taxes. If there is any res judicata, it is rather that they must be held as payments on those taxes, not as evidence of debt against Chenoweth. But I do not assert that the decree is final to stamp those receipts as payments. It is only an inference. They might be set-offs. But the decree is not res judicata to stamp them as evidences of debt.

In the next place, are those receipts in themselves, regardless of our former decision, payments, or are they evidences of debt? They contain, to start with, the word "received," a word so universally used in receipts for payments that it stamps the paper as evidence of a payment, not an obligation to pay. If they were intended as notes, why were they not made notes or duebills? And why do they not contain some promises of payment? And then they are official receipts between sheriff and his deputy, and that alone tell us that they are payments of some demand of the sheriff against his deputy, if they did not specify what demand it is. We know from the record that there was then existing a larger claim than the receipts against the deputy in favor of the sheriff for taxes, and we would naturally apply the moneys on that demand, if the receipts showed no more than the receipts of such money. But then the receipts negative that they are evidences of debt, because they specify that the moneys were to go as payments for liability "in the collection of taxes." They bind Chenoweth "to account to him for in the collection of taxes in the several districts of Randolph county." Why shall we not apply them as payments on those taxes, when we know that Leonard was at the time indebted to Chenoweth for taxes collected? Under all these circumstances what other constructions can be given these receipts? When those payments were made, the demand for the taxes was not barred, and we do not have the question how payments shall be applied when part of the demand is barred and part not. When the parties make no applications of payments, the law applies them to the oldest of several debts. Genin v. Ingersoll, 11 W. Va. 549. Leonard owed Chenoweth the taxes and duebills, the tax demand being the older. But we do not have to rely on that principle, for the reasons that the receipts themselves say on what particular demand they apply. Therefore, we hold that those receipts go as payments upon Chenoweth's demand for taxes collected by Leonard, and cannot be allowed as debts against Chenoweth. I should have said, though it is not important, that the word "orders" in two of the receipts does not change their import. They were orders on the sheriff, lifted by Leonard as deputy, and turned over by Leonard to Chenoweth to go to his credit in settlement with the county or districts. They were money.

The Chenoweth side excepts to the computation of interest on the duebills given by Leonard to Chenoweth. The commissioner's statement combined the principal of all the duebills into a lump sum, and deducted from it a store account of $80.06, and on the balance gave interest from a date not given to October 10, 1902, the date of his report, whilst the duebills bore interest from different dates, and thus made the interest materially less than the duebills call for. This is cross-assigned as error for this. It was error to decree the sum so found. The sum which should have been decreed is $1,843.14, instead of $1,654.06. Chenoweth's representatives also cross-assign error in the allowance of a store account to Leonard of $80.06, claiming that it is barred by limitation; but there is no exception for this.

Therefore it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the decree of the circuit court of Randolph county pronounced on the 15th day of May, 1903, be modified so that there be decreed in favor of the estate of Chenoweth $1,843.14, with interest from the 10th day of October, 1902, and that H. Yokum and Beulah W. Leonard do pay out of the assets in their hands as administrators of George W. Leonard, deceased, the sum $1,843.14, with interest from the 15th day of May, 1903, and that the estate of said Leonard is liable therefor, and do pay the same; and that the said decree of the circuit court, as modified by this decree, be affirmed.

VAN WINKLE v. CONTINENTAL FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

ARBITRATION—VACATING AWARD—REFUSAL TO HEAR EVIDENCE—MISTAKE.

1. In a suit to set aside an award because the arbitrators refused to receive or hear evidence, and it appears from the record that plaintiff had full notice of the meetings of the arbitrators, and was called upon several times by one of the arbitrators during the work of the arbitrators, to whom plaintiff furnished some bills to be used in evidence, and said he had further evidence which he desired to present, but failed to appear before the arbitrators or offer any further evidence, the arbitrators cannot be held to have refused to hear or consider his evidence.

2. While it is a general rule that, if appraisers refuse to hear or consider material evidence, it will be fatal to the award, it is also true that evidence must be offered before it can be rejected.

3. Where the plaintiff claimed to have papers material to his interests to present as evidence before the arbitrators, but failed to appear or present them, it cannot be said that the arbitrators rejected material evidence.

4. Prior service of an arbitrator in a similar capacity does not render him incompetent, or invalidate an award in which he joined, in the absence of evidence showing that he was prejudiced.

5. Mistake of judgment in arbitrators is not sufficient evidence of improper conduct on their part to justify the setting aside of their award by a court of equity.

6. An arbitrator cannot contradict an award which he has signed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County;
L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Bill by W. W. Van Winkle against the Continental Fire Insurance Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harry P. Camden, for appellant. Van Winkle & Ambler and Mason G. Ambler, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. W. W. Van Winkle was the owner of the one undivided half interest in a building in the city of Parkersburg known as the "Academy of Music," upon which interest he had two policies of fire insurance, of $2,000 each—one in the Continental Insurance Company, and the other in the Westchester Fire Insurance Company. In December, 1895, while the said policies of insurance were in force, the said building was partially destroyed by fire. Each of the policies contained a clause by which it was agreed that, in the event of disagreement in the amount of loss, the same should be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers; the insured and the company each selecting one, and the two so chosen to select a competent and disinterested umpire; the appraisers together then to estimate and appraise the loss, stating separately sound value and damage, and, failing to agree, were to submit their differences to the umpire. The award in writing of any two to determine the amount of such loss. The insured and the said companies, failing to agree upon the amount of loss, entered into the following agreement in writing for submission of their differences to arbitration:

"This agreement, made and entered into by and between W. W. Van Winkle of the ¶ 5. See Arbitration and Award, vol. 4, Cent. Dig. § 314.

First part, and the Insurance Company or Companies, whose name or names are signed hereto, of the second part, each for itself and not jointly.

"Witnesseth, That Stephen Davidson and George Hodgden shall appraise and ascertain the sound value of and the loss upon the property damaged and destroyed by the fire of December 9, 1895, as specified below. Provided, That the said appraisers shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire who shall act with them in matters of difference only. The award of any two of them, made in writing, in accordance with this agreement, shall be binding upon both parties to this agreement as to the amount of such loss.

"It is expressly understood that this agreement and appraisement is for the purpose of ascertaining and fixing the amount of sound value and loss and damage only, to the property hereinafter described, and shall not determine, waive, or invalidate any other right or rights of either party to this agreement.

"The property on which the sound value and the loss or damage is to be determined is as follows, to wit:

"W. W. Van Winkle. On his undivided one-half interest in the two and three story brick, slate and metal roof building, known as Academy of Music occupied on first floor for mercantile purposes; one room on third floor occupied by tenants as private club or lodge room; one room on second floor as clubroom by tenants residue of building occupied by owners as public hall, dressing rooms, ticket office and manager's office for same situate on the northwest side of Juliana Street, between Fifth and Sixth Streets in Parkersburg, West Va.

"It is further expressly understood and agreed that in determining the sound value and the loss or damage upon the property, hereinbefore mentioned, the said appraisers are to make an estimate of the actual cash cost of replacing or repairing the same, or the actual cash value thereof, at and immediately preceding the time of the fire; and in case of depreciation of the property from use, age, condition, location or otherwise, a proper deduction shall be made therefor.

"In Witness Whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, at Parkersburg, W. Va., this 3d day of January, 1896. W. W. Van Winkle. S. T. Carter for Westchester Fire Insurance Co. of New York. E. E. Cole for Continental Insurance Co., of New York."

The said appraisers mentioned in the agreement were duly sworn on the 6th day of January, 1896, to "act with strict impartiality in making an appraisement and estimate of the sound value and the loss and damages upon the property hereinbefore mentioned in accordance with the foregoing appointment, and that we will make a true, just, and conscientious award of the same according to the best of our knowledge, skill, and judgment. We are not related to the assured, either as creditor or otherwise, and are not interested in said property, or the insurance thereon. [Signed] Stephen Davidson, George Hodgden, Appraisers." The said appraisers then selected as umpire M. F. Gelsey, of Wheeling, to settle matters of difference between them in said appraisement. On the 14th of January, 1896, at the request of Appraiser Davidson, and with the consent of George Hodgden, C. T. Hickman, of Clarksburg, W. Va., was substituted for said Gelsey as umpire; and on the 15th day of January said Hickman accepted the appointment of umpire, and took the oath to act with strict impartiality in all matters of difference only that should be submitted to him in connection with his appointment, and that he would give a true, just, and conscientious award, according to the best of his knowledge, skill, and judgment, and that he was not related to any of the parties to the agreement, nor interested, as a creditor or otherwise, in the property or insurance. After having discharged their duties under said agreement and appointment the said appraisers and umpire made the following award:

"To the Parties Interested: We have carefully examined the premises and remains of the property hereinbefore specified, in accordance with the foregoing appointment, and have determined the sound value to be twelve thousand dollars, and the loss and damage as a whole to be six thousand twenty-nine and $\frac{4}{100}$ dollars. Witness our hands this 15th day of January, 1896. Stephen Davidson, Geo. Hodgden, Appraisers. C. L. Hickman, Umpire."

At the June rules, 1896, W. W. Van Winkle filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Wood county his bill in chancery against the said insurance companies, George Hodgden, Stephen Davidson, and C. L. Hickman, charging that the said award was void and should be set aside by reason of misconduct of the appraisers, and by reason of mistakes set forth in the bill, because of miscalculations therein and omissions of property that should have been included, by calculations of short quantities when true quantities should have been inserted, for unfairness and injustice, and praying that, if the court could not revise the award, it should be set aside and rendered null and void, and that the court would decree plaintiff entitled to the full amount of the policies, and that the court decree the $2,000 against each of said companies, with interest from the 2d day of March, 1896, and that the said several parties mentioned be made parties to the bill, and be required to answer the same under oath, and for general relief.

The said defendant companies, on the 20th of July, filed their joint demurrer to the plaintiff's bill, in which the plaintiff joined, and afterwards, on the 8th of August, 1896, the demurrer was overruled by the court, and leave granted defendants to file their answer, and on the 7th day of September the said defendant companies filed their joint and separate answer, in which they denied the material allegations of the bill. Depositions were taken and filed in the cause, and on the 5th day of February, 1903, the cause was heard on the process duly executed, and the orders and proceedings had in the cause, the said answer and general replication, and the bill taken for confessed, and set for hearing at the rules as to the other defendants, except Hodgden, and upon the depositions taken on behalf of the parties respectively, on the orders and decrees theretofore made and the papers formerly read; and the court, being of opinion that the award complained of in plaintiff's bill was unfair, unjust, and improper, and that the same should be set aside as a fraud on the rights of plaintiff, decreed that the award dated the 15th of January, and purporting to award to plaintiff the sum of $3,010.42, be vacated, annulled, and set aside, and held as null and void, and decreed that each of said insurance companies pay to the plaintiff $2,825, being the amount of $2,000 with interest thereon from the 2d day of March, 1896, until the date of the decree, with interest on each of said sums from the date of the decree until paid, and awarded execution against each of said defendant companies for the amounts, respectively; each execution to include one-half the costs of the decree. From which decree the defendant companies appealed.

The first assignment of error is the overruling of the demurrer to plaintiff's bill. The court is of opinion that the allegations of the bill are sufficient, and that the demurrer was properly overruled; and, in view of the circumstances and facts in the case, the court deems it unnecessary to discuss the demurrer. Appellants say the decree is contrary to the law and the evidence in the case, and that, if the evidence shows any error whatever, in the award, it was a mere error of judgment, without fraud or mutual mistake, and such error is not sufficient to overthrow the award; that the decree erroneously substituted the judgment of Stephen Davidson and H. M. Patton, an architect, for the judgment of the said Stephen Davidson, George Hodgden, and O. T. Hickman, acting as sworn appraisers and umpire, respectively. "This is simply to overthrow an award of appraisers duly selected by both parties, and sworn to impartially perform their duties, because an award of two individuals, of ex parte selection, and not sworn, is inconsistent or in conflict with it"—and that, if the award of the appraisers should be set aside for any good reason shown, there is no evidence on which to predicate a decree for the full amount of the policies in each company, and that it was error to enter such decree.

The principal grounds relied on by the plaintiff's counsel in his brief, as well as oral argument for setting aside the award, is the want of notice of the meetings of the appraisers, and an opportunity to be present and present his evidence. There is no allegation in the bill, nor complaint therein, that he had no notice of such meeting. There is an allegation in the bill that plaintiff "was not called upon, nor was he present, although he had expressed a desire to Mr. Davidson to present papers, and to offer evidence as to certain facts, as before stated." He further alleges "that he was not present at any of the sessions of the said appraisers, nor when they were holding their sessions with the so-called or supposed umpire; that he had requested, through Stephen Davidson, one of the appraisers, that, inasmuch as the entire inside of the greater and most valuable portion of the building had burned out, and that the facts and circumstances connected therewith, as to material, construction, cost and condition, was a matter of evidence, and could not be determined, nor seen nor known, except from evidence as to what existed there before the fire, and which had been entirely consumed, inclusive of the roof down to the second and first floors, that, before the arbitrators concluded, your orator would like to present bills, accounts, plans, specifications, and other evidence, if necessary, to inform the appraisers of the character, material, and quality of the construction, and the property that was consumed in said fire, and being a part and parcel of said building; and the said Davidson, who had made out the detail statement of loss which accompanied said proofs of loss, and which fact was known to said companies before the agreement was made, did come to your orator and get some accounts, but very few, but, notwithstanding he took such accounts, your orator is informed and believes that the said George Hodgden refused to consider the same, or to be informed or advised by what they contained, and also the said umpire, as your orator is informed and believes, refused to consider them, and also refused to hear any evidence of any kind on the part of your orator, claiming that this was an appraisal, in which it was not necessary to hear evidence, but they were to form their opinion independent thereof, from a view of the premises, for which your orator claims they could, at most, merely theorize and speculate as to many parts and portions of the building, construction, and decoration, and other details, where the subject itself had been entirely consumed by fire." Stephen Davidson was the builder who made out the proof of loss for the plaintiff after the fire, and was chosen by plaintiff as one of the appraisers, and who also had suggested the name of O. L. Hickman for umpire, to be substituted for Mr. Gelsey, of Wheeling. Mr. Davidson, a witness for plaintiff, testifies that the appraisers had the plans and specifications, which he says "were very explicit and plain, by elevation and floor plans and sections and cross-sections, so that they amply showed every part of the building." He stated that at two or three times he got bills from the plaintiff; that he had the bills for decorations, painting, and some lumber bills; they were not all that plaintiff said he had; that the plaintiff said he had other papers that he desired to present as evidence showing the entire construction of the building in detail; that witness presented plaintiff's request to the appraisers, and told them that he wanted to be heard before the appraisalment was closed. Although plaintiff knew of the meetings, and that the appraisers were in session, and he presented, through Mr. Davidson, one of the appraisers, some papers and bills, yet he did not present himself or make known to them what particular evidence he desired to present. Plaintiff relies very strongly on the case of Coons v. Coons (Va.) 28 S. E. 885, 64 Am. St. Rep. 804. That was a case where it was specifically alleged that the umpire or third arbitrator, without giving any notice to plaintiff, and without his knowledge or consent and without hearing any evidence, made up his award solely and exclusively upon statements the two arbitrators made in the absence and without the knowledge of the plaintiff. This cannot apply to the case at bar, when there is no complaint in the bill whatever for want of notice of any of the meetings of the arbitrators, with or without the presence of the umpire. It appears that the proofs of loss were made up in the first instance for the plaintiff by Davidson from the plans and specifications of the building, and the same which the arbitrators had before them in making up their award. Appellee also relies upon the case of McCormick v. Blackford, 4 Grat. 133. That was a case where the arbitrators had adjourned to enable the parties to take the testimony of a particular witness. Before they were to meet again, one of the parties wrote to one of the arbitrators, requesting them to meet at a time specified; stating that he wished to be present, and that he had papers which would throw light upon the subject. The deposition of the witness for whose testimony the adjournment was had having been taken, the arbitrators, at the request of one of the parties, met, and made their award in the absence of the party who had written expressing a wish to be present, and without any notice to him, and before the time he had specified. This was held to be misbehavior in the arbitrators. That could hardly be authority in this case, where the party had full knowledge of the meetings, and did not ask to be present, nor did he ask to present any particular or specific evidence, which he had an opportunity to do if he had seen proper to be present at the meeting of the arbitrators. So in the case of Halstead v. Seaman, 82 N. Y. 27, 37 Am. Rep. 536. In that case the parties entered into an agreement for an arbitration to be "conducted and decided upon the principle of fair and honorable dealing between man and man." On the hearing the parties presented written statements, and were heard. Plaintiff, on the second and third meetings of the arbitrators, offered to produce witnesses Sheldon and Brown to contradict the written statements made by the opposite party; but the majority of the arbitrators declined to allow it, on the ground that it was prohibited by the submission. The lower court sustained the award. See 52 How. Prac. 415. But the same was reversed by the Court of Appeals, as cited above. If plaintiff in the case at bar had appeared and offered any definite testimony or evidence proper to be introduced, and had been denied the privilege of being heard, this authority would be applicable to his case; but this he failed to do, and contented himself by sending by Davidson papers and bills when called on for them, but did not appear in person or by counsel to offer documentary or other evidence, although he knew the arbitrators were in session, passing upon his rights, pursuant to his agreement submitting same to them. Plaintiff, Van Winkle, states in his testimony that he told Hodgden, in the presence of Mr. Davidson, that when they made their examination, before closing any appraisalment, he desired to introduce evidence as to certain material and general matters as to such loss. At the time or shortly after there were placed in the hands of the appraisers the plans of said building, together with the specifications under which the building was originally erected. That, during the time that they were in session as appraisers, Mr. Davidson came to him, and wanted some bills, which he gave him. They were bills for the decorations of the walls, and the bill of the Parkersburg Mill Company for the lumber that had gone into the building, and they were returned to him afterwards with the statement that the other appraisers had refused to look at them. That Davidson came to his office several times and requested papers, which he did not then recall, outside of the bills mentioned. That he called his attention several times that when they were ready he wanted to insist upon his right to introduce testimony as to what had been destroyed, a great portion of which had been entirely consumed. That he was never permitted to introduce any such testimony, but, upon the contrary, was very much surprised to receive from Mr. Davidson a purported copy of the appraisalment, accompanied by the statement that they did not hear any testimony, and did not think it necessary. On cross-examination he was asked to produce the bills for examination that he had desired to lay before the appraisers. He produced two large packages of bills, marked on the back, "Academy of Music, Proprietary Vouchers, 1882 to 1889, Package number 1, Package number 2," and stated they extended over the period indicated. When asked what one of the bills he desired to produce before the appraisers, he said he did not know of any particular bill; he was going to use the package as the case required, if the evidence had been admitted; that there were a great many of those bills that were pertinent on the question of price and material, but that he had not picked out any of the bills which he desired to submit; that he had given to Mr. Davidson the bills for lumber and the bills in relation to decoration; that Mr. Davidson had come and asked for them. He wanted to take them where the appraisers were in session. He also produced the plans and specifications, which were the same that the appraisers had at the time they made the appraisal. It was clearly the duty of plaintiff, when he knew the appraisers were in session, considering the matters submitted to them, to lay his evidence before them, and offer such oral testimony as he might deem proper to assist the arbitrators to arrive at a just conclusion; and it was not the duty of the arbitrators to send to plaintiff from time to time for such evidence as he might desire to submit. Hodgden, one of the appraisers, testified that he never heard of any request made by the plaintiff to be present at the session of the appraisers. When asked: "Were any bills or accounts or plans and specifications presented by Mr. Van Winkle to the appraisers that you refused to consider? A. No, sir; nothing. Only Mr. Davidson wanted me to take a lot of bills for lumber, and I said that I would not do, because, when I see a piece of work right before my eyes, I would not think for a moment to have some one else to come and tell me what that was worth. I would not consider myself a competent appraiser. Some painting, papering, and decorations that were destroyed, I did consider the bills for them." Mr. Hickman, the umpire, testifies that there was some little difference between the appraisers as to the value of the painting, papering, and decorations—something on that line—and that Mr. Davidson went out somewhere and got a bill for papering, and brought it in, and what arrangement there was made between the appraisers he did not know. It was not referred to him any more. He states that he heard no effort to present any other papers that were refused by the appraisers or by witness and Mr. Hodgden; that he would have no right to refuse any papers offered. He stated that Mr. Davidson and Mr. Hodgden participated in the calculations and measurements, and that he never heard or saw anything of Mr. Davidson being excluded from such participation; that witness had had no meetings with Hodgden at which Mr. Davidson was not present, or with Davidson when Hodgden was not present. Mr. Davidson was asked what items he and Hodgden disagreed upon in making their calculations. He said: "Well, we disagreed about the brickwork. I did not think he was counting brick enough. We disagreed in regard to the galvanized ironwork. We disagreed in regard to the papering and decorating. We disagreed in regard to the stonework, and, I believe, in the painting"—and does not remember whether these were all; they might have been, and might not; that, when they disagreed, and submitted their disagreement to Hickman, he always agreed with Hodgden. Hodgden testified, when asked about what items he and Davidson disagreed, that the brickwork was the main item, and he thinks the galvanized iron was another, and, he thinks, painting, too, but that he remembered the brick and galvanized cornice distinctly. And on cross-examination Hodgden was asked to specify particularly on what articles of appraisal or materials he and Davidson disagreed, and were submitted to the umpire. His answer was: "One of them was the brickwork—that I know very positive—and the galvanized iron. I can't recall any other that we had very much difference regarding. It all went along smoothly. These two items was the only two we had any difference in at all. Possibly there might have been a little difference in the painting. I think he brought your bills over about this papering and painting. There was a talk among all of us together about the papering and painting. I have an idea that we used your bills. I said it was not out of the way very much. I had no word with Mr. Davidson at no time. Shook hands and laughed, and I supposed that was the end of it." Hickman, the umpire, testified that Mr. Hodgden, Mr. Davidson, and himself went to the building. There seemed to be a difference between the appraisers as to a few—two or three or four—different points. "I don't just remember or recollect, except probably three I can recall very distinctly. There were two places in the brick wall—probably three places—they could not agree as to where the wall should come down to, and another difference I remember of passing on was as to the value of the galvanized iron cornice, and another as to the value of square feet of the stone coping." He states that the two appraisers pointed out the difference that they desired him to settle. "On the building they spoke as to where the pressed-brick front should come down to, and also the common brick at the rear of the building. I think there were two places on the rear of the building that was cracked over the window, and another place near the rear on the right-hand wall, as you stand in front of the building, that was in dispute as to where they should come down to to be rebuilt to make it good. That the matter of the price of stone coping item was taken up when they were in the building or on the building, but the matter of galvanized iron cornice was taken up at the office; the number of feet was talked of between the two gentlemen, Mr. Davidson and Mr. Hodgden. I remember of taking a catalogue and selecting a cornice of about the same make as the old, and deducting the discount on it, and fixed the value at that. That was what we done in the office." With reference to the difference as to the walls, he was asked what examination was made by him, when he stated: "Well, I went up through the building, and looked at the building out through the windows, and examined the nature of the crack in the rear wall, and then we went down on the ground and around the building, and looked from the ground up, and looked also in front; and I fixed the places as to where I considered it right the walls should come down to; and as to the number of bricks, and the value of the same, to replace the same, I made no estimate. The figuring was done by the appraisers."

In Flubarty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 698 (Syl., point 6), it is held: "If the arbitrators unreasonably refuse to hear competent witnesses offered by either party, this is such gross misconduct as to vitiate the award." It is not contended in the case at bar that plaintiff offered any particular evidence to the arbitrators which was rejected, or that he appeared before them to ask to offer evidence. It is only shown that he told one of the arbitrators that he had bills, etc., that he wished to lay before them, but did not say what they were, and in his deposition states that he did not know what particular bills, but he only expected to offer them as occasion might require. He offered nothing that was rejected. It is shown by the testimony that the bills he placed in the hands of Davidson were considered. In Stemmer v. Insurance Company, 83 Or. 65, 49 Pac. 588, 53 Pac. 496 (Syl., point 8), it is held: "While it is a general rule that, if appraisers exclude material testimony, it will be fatal to the award, it is also true that testimony must be offered before it can be rejected, so that, where the insured only announces that he was willing to produce witnesses on a certain point, without actually offering them, it cannot be said that the arbitrators rejected pertinent testimony." This is about the case here. The plaintiff, without going before the arbitrators, or in any way presenting the evidence which he said he had, and wanted considered, simply intimated to one of the appraisers that he had evidence which he desired them to consider, but never offered it; and certainly he cannot contend that he had no opportunity to offer it.

It is alleged in the bill, and attempted to be proven, that the appraiser George Hodgden was incompetent because of partiality; that he himself had asserted that he was the appraiser in the interest of the insurance companies, and that his conduct was such as to indicate that he considered himself and was acting as the agent of said companies, rather than a disinterested, unprejudiced, impartial appraiser, and that his efforts were to minimize the loss and damages in so far as he possibly could, and at the same time pretending to be fair and impartial, and that his treatment of his co-appraiser, after the umpire was present, was to treat him with discourtesy, and not consult him in any way, and that he and the umpire attempted to make such appraisement independently of the said appraiser Davidson, and, by ignoring him, practically substituting the said umpire, who was not in any sense an appraiser, and could only pass upon matters of disagreement between the two, in place and stead of said Davidson; that the said appraisers were considering in the office of the agents of said insurance companies, in the city of Parkersburg; and that the agents were a part of the time present. Davidson, in his testimony for plaintiff, was asked what Hodgden said to him, or in his presence, relative to his business as appraiser of losses, and for whom. "A. Well, of course, he represented that he was here for the insurance companies, and was working for them. I do not know that he said that that was his business alone. I don't remember that he said anything about having been engaged in that business generally, but he spoke several times of having been employed for that business." Did not remember the language he used, and did not remember of hearing him say anything about having seen the proofs of loss in the case, but witness' impression was that he had seen them. Davidson states that, when Mr. Hodgden first came to Parkersburg, witness was sick, and could not attend to the business, and Hodgden returned to Pittsburg, and when he returned the second time he told Hodgden that he couldn't work with Mr. Gelsey, who had been chosen umpire, for the reason that he believed he was an expert, following that business; that he thought he got this idea largely from Hodgden's conversation on the previous visit; that Mr. Van Winkle came to his house, and he told him he could not work with that man, and that Hodgden and he were going to disagree, and that he was not willing to submit to Mr. Gelsey, and told him he could not serve with Gelsey, and wanted some one entirely disinterested, and that had not been posted; that Hodgden had intimated to him that he had seen and had a conversation with Gelsey; did not say so, in just so many words, but led him to believe in his conversation, and, in making the calculations, the first thing that Mr. Gelsey would agree with him; that Hodgden said he did not expect to consider the walls; that he was going to finish the balance, and leave that to the umpire. That was first mentioned when they went to the notary's office. They talked there for a while about Mr. Gelsey and about the walls, and a question came up about the walls while they sat there, and he made the remark that he would not consider them anyhow; that he would go home and submit that matter to the umpire. "Q. You stated before that you and Mr. Hodgden, after that, on the same day, went up and examined the building and the walls, and you could not agree as to the loss? A. Well, we did not try to agree. I found that his opinion was different from mine in regard to them, and we went on with the other work." Mr. Hodgden, in his testimony, flatly denies that he intimated to Mr. Davidson that he had seen Mr. Geisey and had a conversation with him, and states that he never met Mr. Geisey, and never talked with him on this business; and he also denies that he ever said that he did not expect to consider the walls, and that he was going to leave that to the umpire, and further stated that he had tried to make the loss as impartial as it was possible to do, and tried to fix the value that was right between man and man—that was his purpose; that he never asserted himself to be an appraiser in the interest of the insurance companies, and did not attempt to minimize the loss, and would have been glad to have come down and repaired the job for the money fixed by the award. He stated that Mr. Davidson assisted in making every item on that award, was there when made, and talked it over item by item; that the calculations were not made by Hickman and himself, but by Mr. Davidson when they were figuring together, and, when a difference came, they submitted to the umpire; that he and the umpire did not treat Mr. Davidson with discourtesy, and did not have an unpleasant word from the time they began until they got through. He further testified, on cross-examination, that he never saw the proofs of loss in the case, nor any part of them; that they were never shown to him, and that they would not have influenced him any way; that his business was builder and architect in Pittsburg for about 30 years, and was also engaged in the steam-heating business; that he had acted as appraiser, many times, of buildings, and had repaired many of them; that he had acted as appraiser on both sides, acting many times for the owners of buildings, but presumed he had acted oftener for insurance companies than for owners. The most of his services as such appraiser had been rendered in Pittsburg, though he had served around in many places; that he had never made appraisements on behalf of the defendant companies; that he had made appraisements for Mr. Cole, who was the agent of one of the defendants. The fact that Hodgden was an experienced appraiser by no means disqualified him. In Stemmer v. Insurance Co., supra, it is held: "The prior service of an arbitrator in a similar capacity does not render him incompetent, or invalidate an award in which he joined, in the absence of evidence showing that he was prejudiced."

The plaintiff employed W. H. Patton, an architect, of Belpre, Ohio, together with said Davidson, to make an estimate and calculation of the loss of the building after the rendering of the award, and they estimated the whole loss to be $8,013.25. Mr. Patton testifies that he and Davidson made their "measurements from the original plans and specications of the old Academy of Music, and from personal visits to the building," and he was satisfied that the statement made from the measurements and the visits to the building, and careful examination of the plans and specifications, was practically correct; that they were furnished with the memorandum of items of details that it was claimed were used by the appraisers, and which they had a part of the time when they were making the calculations; that they had calculated the cost of restoring the walls on the measurements that they had made, and the difference between the aggregate found by them, and the aggregate in the appraisers' detail, to be $337.15.

It is alleged in the bill in relation to the repairs of the brick walls, in which there was the greatest difference between the estimates made by the award and the subsequent one made by Patton and Davidson, that the appraisers did not use care and proper inspection to ascertain, or see with any certainty, the amount of brick walls that was to come down, or the estimate of the injuries thereto, inasmuch as there was no way for them, without getting on a ladder or scaffold, to examine the walls, that were 20 or 25 feet from any available point, and they did not go upon said north wall, and that plaintiff had had calculations made upon the plans as to points at which said wall should be taken down. On cross-examination, Mr. Patton stated that he had been employed by Mr. Van Winkle, in connection with Mr. Davidson, to make the examination; that he thought Mr. Van Winkle had expressed himself as being dissatisfied with the appraisal made by the appraisers, but he did not know that Mr. Davidson was dissatisfied with it; that he made personal inspection of the wall, but did not get upon it, for the reason that they could not get upon it. They went as close to it as they could get. So that it seems their examination was about after the same order as that of the appraisers. None of them got upon the walls, and the presumption is that they could sufficiently see the injury to the walls to make a fair estimate and calculation of the damages to the walls from the standpoint occupied by the appraisers. Patton further stated that he and Davidson made the examination before the building was torn down and prepared for reconstruction; that he was employed as architect by Mr. Van Winkle and Mr. Busch to reconstruct the building; that 13 items included in the estimate made by the witness and Davidson, and omitted from the estimate made by the appraisers, they got from the original drawings and specifications, and their knowledge of the building, and which all appear in the original plans and specifications, but it was possible that the electric light wire cutouts and sockets did not appear in those plans and specifications. Mr. Davidson, the appraiser chosen by Mr. Van Winkle, acted in that capacity with Hodgden as appraiser, and Hickman as umpire, and signed the award made by the three without any protest, and afterwards was appointed, with Mr. Patton, by Mr. Van Winkle, to make a second appraisal (but it does not appear that either Davidson or Patton was sworn, under that employment, to act fairly and impartially), and made an appraisal or estimate of the loss far in excess of that made by the appraisers under oath. In Campbell v. Western, 3 Paige, 124, it is held, "An arbitrator cannot contradict an award which he has signed." It would seem that the difference in the estimates and calculations between Patton and the appraisers was a mere difference in judgment. The evidence fails to support the charges of fraud and partiality or misconduct and prejudice in the discharge of their duties, either of Hodgden, as appraiser, or Hickman, as umpire. In Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 698 (Syl., point 1): "Presumptions are not to be raised for the purpose of overthrowing awards, but the awards are to be liberally construed, so as to give effect and operation to the interests of the arbitrators, where it can be done, and every reasonable intendment is to be made in their support." And point 5: "A court of equity will set aside an award for fraud, collusion, corruption, or gross misconduct in the arbitrators." The evidence in the case at bar falls far short of warranting the setting aside of the award in this cause for any such reason as therein stated. In Wheatley v. Martin, 6 Leigh, 62: "It is equally the rule of equity, as of law, that the reasons for setting aside an award must appear on its face, or there must be misbehavior in the arbitrators, or some palpable mistake." And in Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Grat. 684, the arbitrators and umpire sat together, and heard the evidence, of which a note was taken by one for the convenience of all. Upon the disagreement of the arbitrators, the umpire made his award, in which he did not refer to any of the evidence, or state the principle or facts upon which it was based; but, in sending his award to the clerk of the court in which the causes were pending, he sent with it all of the papers and the note of the evidence taken before the arbitrators. These papers and evidence were held not a part of the award, or connected with it, so that they might be considered upon a motion to set aside the award; and it was further held that an error of judgment on the part of the umpire in regard to the facts was not ground for setting aside the award. In Morris v. Ross, 2 Hen. & M. 408, it is held: "An award ought not to be set aside, either in a court of law or equity, on the ground of mistake in the judgment of the arbitrators, unless that mistake be very palpable; a mere difference of opinion between the court and the arbitrators in a doubtful case not being sufficient to authorize such interference." It is said in the brief of counsel for appellee that he "was not heard, although, on learning of the session of umpire and appraisers, he demanded opportunity to be heard and present his case." It appears from the record that, while there was no formal notice given to plaintiff of the meetings of the appraisers, he had every opportunity to have appeared before them and presented any evidence that he desired. In his testimony appellee says: "During the time that they were in session as appraisers, Mr. Davidson came to me, and wanted some bills, which I gave him." Then he further says: "Mr. Davidson came to my office several times and requested papers, which I do not recall exactly, outside of the bills mentioned; but I called his attention several times that when they were ready I wanted to insist upon my right to introduce testimony as to what had been destroyed, a great portion of which had been entirely consumed." So it appears from his own testimony that, instead of attending to his business, and presenting his claims before the arbitrators, he remained in his office, and did not pretend to present anything, except what was called for; Mr. Davidson going to his office from time to time, and getting from him only what was asked for. It is claimed by appellee that the findings as to sound value are erroneous and fraudulent. I am unable to see the materiality of the sound value. The question is, really, what would it cost to put the building in the condition in which it was before the fire? This is an independent proposition—to replace the damaged part and that which was totally destroyed. Appellee also cites Insurance Company v. Board of Education, 49 W. Va. 360, 38 S. E. 679, where the bids or proposals made to restore the building were treated as the best evidence of the amount to be recovered. In that case bids were advertised for and accepted for restoring the property to its condition prior to the fire. The bids were made by responsible parties, and made in good faith, and were the best evidence that could have been adduced of the loss. In the case at bar it never was proposed to restore the building in the same way it had been, but it was built upon a different plan, and for different purposes.

Judging from plaintiff's conduct in the matter, it would seem that his "case is plainly within the sound proposition of Judge Kent in La Guen v. Gouverneur & Kemple, 1 Johns. Cas. 502, 1 Am. Dec. 121, when he says: 'Every person is bound to take care of his own rights, and vindicate them in due season and in proper order. This is a sound and salutary principle of law. Accordingly, if a defendant having the means of defense in his favor neglects to use them, and suffers a recovery to be had against him by a complete tribunal, he is forever precluded.' And he cited 2 Burrows, 1009, 7 Term Rep. 269; 2 H. Bl. 414. He also there cites the authorities at length, showing how firmly this principle is adhered to in courts of equity as well as law." As stated in May v. Miller, 59 Vt. 577, 7 Atl. 818. The action of plaintiff in keeping aloof from the arbitrators when he had knowledge and notice of their proceedings, and furnishing items of evidence only as it was called for, would suggest the policy on his part of attempting to place himself in such position that, in case the award should be favorable to him, he could have the benefit of it, and, if it failed to meet his approval, he could contest it for want of formal notice, or other grounds.

For the reasons herein stated, the decree of the circuit court of Wood county is reversed and set aside, and the bill dismissed; reserving to plaintiff the right to prosecute any suit or proceeding he may be advised to institute, not inconsistent with the award.

BRAGG v. WISEMAN et al.

March 15, 1904.)

LIMITATIONS—DEMURRER TO BILL—SEISIN—DESCENT OF LAND—MARRIED WOMAN AS HEIR—CURTESY—COPARCENERS—POSSESSION.

1. To sustain a demurrer to a bill on the defense of the statute of limitations, the facts to warrant that defense must distinctly appear on the face of the bill.

2. When a bill alleges that a person was "seised and possessed" of land, it prima facie imports seisin in fact, not mere seisin in law.

3. If one die intestate, seised in fact of land, that seisin in fact is cast by descent on his heir, and the heir has seisin in fact without entry.

4. Where one dies intestate, seised in fact of an estate of inheritance in land, and one of his heirs is a married woman and dies, she has seisin in fact, so as to entitle her surviving husband to curtesy in her share.

5. Actual possession of land descended to several heirs by some of the coparceners gives actual possession to a married woman coparcener, so as to entitle her husband to curtesy in her share, though he or she were never in actual possession.

6. Chapter 78, § 1, Code 1899, changing the common law, passes all and whatever title, right, and interest of inheritance in land vested in an intestate to his heirs, including seisin in fact or law, whichever was vested in the intestate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Suit by W. W. Bragg against F. J. Wiseman and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dillon & Nuckalls, for appellant. Osenton & Ashby, R. J. Thrift, and A. D. Smith, Jr., for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Wiseman died seised of some land, leaving nine children, to whom it descended. One of these children, Minerva, married Wriston, and by him had four children. Her husband having died, Minerva Wriston married Bragg, and in 1891 died, leaving her husband and said four Wriston children. Bragg, under claim to curtesy in the one undivided ninth of said land, brought a suit in 1903 in the circuit court of Fayette county against the heirs of Wiseman and the heirs of Minerva Wriston, seeking partition of the land so as to have the ninth of Minerva Wriston set apart in severalty. Upon demurrer to the bill it was dismissed, and Bragg appeals.

One reason given to justify the decree on which it is said the circuit court acted is that the suit was barred by the statute of limitations. To defeat the right to partition, it must appear that there had been 10 years of hostile, adverse possession prior to the suit. We cannot find this from this bill. At once upon the death of Minerva Bragg her husband's curtesy vested, and, if any presumption is to be indulged, it is that the wife and husband were in actual possession in common with other heirs of Wiseman, and that after her death he so continued. We should presume, what seems meant by the bill, that Minerva Bragg was in actual possession, along with those heirs, of a conceded right in the undivided property, and that a husband lives with his wife. This presumption is as reasonable as the reverse, and is the one to be preferred, because the facts to apply limitation must affirmatively be stated or in this case appear. But without indulging in presumption, this bill does not state or intimate any adverse possession by other heirs against the Wriston heirs, or by them against Bragg, or that he is not in possession as tenant by the curtesy, or that his right is denied, or that actual possession is withheld from him as tenant by the curtesy. Surely something of that kind should appear from the bill to warrant the application of the statute of limitation. The same fact must appear in the bill which the defendant must state in a plea or answer setting up the statute. Not only does this bill not give such facts, but it negatives them. It avers twice that Minerva Bragg died "seised and possessed" of a one-ninth interest in the land. This imports seisin in fact. At common law livery of seisin means delivery of actual corporeal possession. There may be, it is true, seisin in law as well as in deed or fact; but where the word is used, it certainly may be taken to mean seisin in fact as well as law. If any distinction is to be drawn, it would first import actual possession. The word "possession" surely means prima facie actual possession. When, therefore, the bill says that Minerva Bragg was seised and possessed, we must say that it alleges she was in actual possession. 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 253; 2 Bouvier, Law Dic. 702, 975; 2 Blackstone, Com. 310; Tiedeman on Real Prop. § 24; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (1st Ed.) 26, note. Ooke says that seisin "in the common law signifies possession." Institutes, 153a. The wife being in actual possession, with her last breath the law cast it upon the husband, and he succeeded her therein under his curtesy estate. This suit, in fact, is not a suit for recovery of his curtesy; it is not even suggested by the bill that it is unlawfully withheld; but it is a suit for partition, and the curtesy estate is stated only as the title enabling Bragg to call for partition.

The appellees also make the point that Bragg does not show a curtesy estate vested in him, because the bill does not allege that his wife had seisin in fact during her life. This presents a question akin to that mentioned above, but somewhat different, since, to defeat a right by limitation, facts giving ground for the bar must appear, whereas, as to curtesy, the claimant must state facts giving it to him. The law requires a seisin in fact to give curtesy, seisin in law not giving it. Fulton v. Johnson, 24 W. Va. 95. The bill says that Wiseman died "seised and possessed" of the land. It does not say in words that he had seisin or possession in fact. Is it necessary to expressly aver seisin in fact? This puts the question whether, when one dies seised in fact of land, his heirs get from him that seisin in fact which he had, without entry after his death. I think we may say as to Wiseman that he had seisin in fact. Most books speak to the effect found in 1 Lomax, Dig. 5: "Where a freehold estate is conveyed to a person by feoffment, with livery of seisin, or by any of those conveyances which derive their effect from the statute of uses, he acquires a seisin in deed and a freehold in deed. But where a freehold estate comes to a person by act of law, as by descents, he only acquires a seisin in law—that is, a right to the possession—and his estate is called a freehold in law. For he must make an actual entry on the land to acquire a seisin and freehold in the deed." This seems unreasonable. Where the ancestor is not in actual possession, and thus has not seisin in fact, it is rational to say that his heir has not seisin in fact; but where the ancestor has seisin in fact, why does it not go by law to the heir? Under the doctrine given in Lomax, Coke says that "if a man dies seised of lands in fee simple or fee tail general, and they descend to his daughter, who marries, has issue, and dies before entry, the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy; yet in this case the husband had seisin in law. But if she or her husband had entered during her life, he would have been tenant by curtesy." 1 Inst. 29a; 1 Greenl. Cruise, 140. But some books do not lay down the doctrine of seisin as quoted from Lomax. 1 Washburn on R. Prop. § 97, says that, where the possession is vacant at the ancestor's death, the heir has only seisin in law; and in volume 3, § 1963, says: "There is a seisin in deed and a seisin in law, and the difference between the two is that in one case an actual possession has been taken, and in the other there is a right like that of an heir upon descent from his ancestor, while the possession is vacant, before he has made an actual entry." Coke upon Lit. (by Coventry) 266b, says that it is only where the ancestor is out of actual possession that descent cast on heirs mere seisin in law. Hilliard on R. Prop. 82, says entry by the heir is not necessary. The prevailing doctrine of the United States is that no actual entry is necessary, either by an heir or grantee, in order to give him a seisin in deed, provided the ancestor or grantor was seised at the time, or the possession was vacant (not in a disseisor), "and the ancestor or grantee had the right." Kerr on R. Prop. § 232.

There is another consideration, seemingly decisive, to show that an heir gets his ancestor's seisin in fact without entry. By common law, in order that one might as heir inherit from another, that other must have had seisin in fact, not mere seisin in law. If the ancestor had no seisin in fact, nothing could be inherited from him, but the estate went from the last person having seisin in fact, under the maxim, "Seisina facit stipitem"—seisin makes or points to the root of descent. 1 Lomax, Dig. 586; 2 Minor, Inst. 525; 4 Kent, 385. But this common-law rule was wiped away by the statute of descents of Virginia passed in 1785, saying that "henceforth, when any person having title to any real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend and pass" to certain persons. Such is our Code of 1899, c. 78. Under this statute it is not necessary that there be conjunctio seisinæ et juris—a union of seisin and title—or both possession and title in a person, to enable his heirs to take from him by descent whatever he has.

"The common-law rule, 'Seisina facit stipitem,' may now be regarded as abrogated in Virginia, and estates of intestates, whether in possession or vesting in title, whether present or reversionary, will all of them descend to the same heir, without any regard to the seisin of the ancestor." 1 Lomax, Dig. 594. See 4 Kent, § 88. So, whatever title or right a man has descends to his heir. If he has title merely, that descends. If he has title, and under it actual possession, that title and that possession both descend, as possession is a valuable element of title. Therefore, when Wiseman died, his actual possession vested in Minerva Wriston and her coparceners, and she had seisin in fact. But if this were not so, the bill saying that Minerva Bragg died "seised and possessed," it imports seisin in fact. "Seised," if it does not alone mean that the person is in possession, imports title of inheritance, and the two words combined signify that the party is in actual possession of an estate of inheritance. Seim v. O'Grady, 42 W. Va. 77, 24 S. E. 904, tends to support this decision. And if the other Wiseman heirs were in possession, their actual possession was that also of Minerva Bragg, she being a parcener, and that possession gave Bragg right to curtesy, even if she or he were not on the land. Kerr on R. Prop. § 732.

JOHN L. ROWAN & CO. v. HULL.

March 15, 1904.)

REAL ESTATE AGENT—AGENCY COUPLED WITH
—CONSIDERATION.

1. Mere commission or reward to be earned by an agent in executing the agency does not, alone, make the agency one coupled with an interest.

2. An agency uncoupled with an interest, and not for a fixed time, may be revoked by the principal at will, without liability for damages; and, though it be for a fixed time, still it may be revoked at will, but the principal will be liable to the agent for damages for wrongful revocation within such time. There is often a difference between a power to revoke and a right to revoke, as between principal and agent.

3. A written proposition to employ one as agent to sell land, signed by the proposer, accepted by the agent, though not signed by him, makes a binding contract of agency between them, and is a bilateral mutual contract, and enforceable against both.

4. A promise of remuneration for service to be performed makes a valid consideration for a contract. If one employ another as agent for remuneration on performance, the contract is based on sufficient consideration, and is mutually binding.

5. Benefit to be derived by each party to a contract furnishes a sufficient consideration for it.

6. It is for the court to determine whether there is evidence to render an instruction relevant. An instruction cannot be given, and its consideration by the jury made to depend upon whether the jury finds that there is or is not such evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Monroe County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

John Osborner and J. D. Logan, for plaintiff in error. Rowan & Boggess, R. E. L. Clarke, and J. A. Meadows, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. In the circuit court of Monroe county, in an appeal from a justice, John L. Rowan & Co. recovered against J. W. Hull a verdict and judgment for $137.50, and from this judgment Hull has brought a writ of error. The claim of Rowan & Co. is that Hull engaged them to sell for him a tract of land, and that they undertook the service, and made effort to sell to several persons; that they interested John O. Ballard in the land, and sent him to see it, but Hull informed Ballard that he had concluded not to sell, and had revoked the power of Rowan & Co. to sell. Ballard then went to Rowan & Co., and they exhibited to him the written memorandum empowering them to sell, and convinced him that they still had power to sell under it, notwithstanding the revocation of their authority to sell; and then Ballard made a writing, addressed to Rowan & Co., saying that he would give them $5,500 for the Hull farm. Before Ballard went to see the land, Hull wrote Rowan & Co., on the 12th of August, that he had concluded not to sell his farm. The memorandum putting the land in the hands of Rowan & Co. for sale is as follows: "300 acres in Sweet Spring Dist. near Gap Mills—good dwelling, fine barn and other buildings—fine orchard, well watered with running water—well timbered—one of the nicest farms in Monroe. Price $5,500. Terms easy. 5 per cent. to John L. Rowan & Co. Land to be exclusive with them 3 months and until withdrawn. This August 5th, 1902, J. W. Hull." On 5th of January, 1903, Rowan & Co. sued Hull for compensation for their service under said agreement. Hull contends that the paper given by him conferred on Rowan & Co. a naked power to sell, uncoupled with an interest, and that it was revocable at any moment he might choose to revoke it, and that, when he revoked it before sale, Rowan & Co. could not recover the agreed commission, but only, at most, compensation for what they actually did, if anything, under the power. Hull would reverse the judgment on the strength of his revocation of the authority of Rowan & Co. to sell. The summons not being before us, and no pleading to show whether Rowan & Co. claimed 5 per cent. on $5,500, or merely actual compensation for trouble as agents, we cannot say, by the record, which character of claim was made, but we assume that it was for commission. What is the effect of the revocation before Rowan & Co. found a purchaser? We have the question strictly as between those parties, not the rights of Ballard. This power was naked, coupled with no interest, as the commission to be earned is not an interest rendering the power irrevocable. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 1217; Mechem on Agency, § 207. The same book (section 209) says: "Power to Revoke—How Distinguished from the Right to Revoke. Where the authority is not coupled with an interest, the principal has power to revoke at his will at any time. But this power to revoke is not to be confounded with the right to revoke. Much uncertainty has crept into text-books and decisions from a failure to discriminate clearly between them. Except in those cases where the authority is coupled with an interest, the law compels no man to employ another against his will. The relation of agent to his principal is founded, in greater or less degree, upon trust and confidence. It is essentially a personal relation. * * *

¶ 1. See Principal and Agent, vol. 40, Cent. Dig. § 66.

It is the rule of law that contracts of agency, like those creating other personal relations, will not be specifically enforced. Nor does it make any difference, in this view, that the principal has expressly agreed that he will continue to confide in the agent for a definite period. It is no less difficult, on that account, to coerce compliance. * * *

The law therefore leaves the principal in such cases to determine for himself how long the relation shall continue. This, then, is what it meant when it is said that the principal may revoke the authority at any time. But it by no means follows that, though possessing this power, the principal has a right to exercise it without liability, regardless of his contract in the matter. It is entirely consistent with the existence of the power that the principal may agree that for a definite period he will not exercise it, and for the violation of such agreement the principal is as much liable as for the breach of any other contract. It is in this view, therefore, that the question of the right to revoke arises." Section 210: "When the Right to Revoke Exists. When no express or implied agreement exists that the agent shall be retained for a definite time, the power and the right of revocation coincide. Such employments are deemed to be at will, merely, and may be terminated at any time by either party without violating contract obligations or incurring liability. The law presumes that all general employments are thus at will, merely, and the burden of proving employment for a definite time rests upon him who alleges it." Also section 620. To like effect, see Reinhard on Agency, §§ 159, 161; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1216. Thus Rowan & Co. had a right of action for the breach of the contract in the revocation of their power within the period of three months. Authorities cited for Hull do not oppose this position, except Simpson v. Carson, 11 Or. 361—a case not well reasoned. Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589, was a power coupled with an interest—a power to sell and pay the agent a debt—and it was held irrevocable in life or by death. By no means does it touch the proposition that, where one empowers another for a given time, the power can be recalled sooner without liability. We do not deny that, even if the power says it is exclusive or irrevocable, it may be revoked, unless coupled with an interest or for a fixed term. Mechem on Agency, § 204. But here is a fixed term.

The right of action of Rowan & Co. thus being clear, what is the measure of recovery? Hull says that they have a right to recover for what service they performed, but that the recovery is beyond that. Even on that basis, we do not see that we can deny the finding of the jury. But that is not the test. "Where the parties have provided by their agreement what the agent's compensation shall be, in case the principal sees fit to revoke the authority prematurely, such agreement will form the basis of the agent's recovery." Reinhard on Agency, § 269; Mechem on Agency, § 622. Under this principle the jury could have given Rowan & Co. $275, and so Hull has no right to complain of a less verdict. They could have realized that sum, had not the agency been terminated. See Ferreira v. Sayres, 40 Am. Dec. 496.

But Hull says further that the memorandum is one-sided, imposing no duty or liability on Rowan & Co., and not binding them, because they did not sign it. A writing was not necessary, on their part, to create an agency. If they accepted the agency, that was enough. Reynolds v. Tompkins, 23 W. Va. 229; Mechem on Agency, § 271. If a principal employ the agent for pay for executing the agency, it is enough. Reinhard on Agency, § 62. The oral evidence proves that they did accept the agency. That evidence does not contradict or vary, but supplements and applies, the short memorandum, and explains the contract as consistent with it. Indeed, no oral evidence is for that necessary. Of course, oral evidence is permissible to show acceptance of the agency, as it is to show acceptance of a deed. Rowan & Co. went on to execute the agency by seeking purchasers under it, and this signifies acceptance. "This consent, of course, may be inferred from the acts of the agent. Thus, where he is found performing the agency, his acceptance of it will be presumed." Mechem on Agency, § 108. Rowan & Co. accepted the memorandum. Offer on one side accepted by the other makes a mutual contract binding both. Bishop on Contracts, § 322. The consideration is valid in law—the promise on the one side to employ, the agreement on the other side to be employed, signified by the delivery of the memorandum and its acceptance and prosecution of the agency under it. There were mutual and dependent promises—on the one side to employ, on the other to serve. In the forms of declaration touching services, we find them saying that, in consideration that one agreed and undertook to employ, the other agreed and undertook to serve in a given capacity. These are mutual promises. It is surely not true that Rowan & Co. were bound to do nothing. When they accepted that memorandum of that employment, they became liable to the duties imposed upon them by law in such cases. For breach of their duty—for negligent loss of a sale—they would be liable. 3 Minor, 329. There was benefit to be derived on each side from the contract, and that fills in the fullest the demand of the law as to consideration. Sturm v. Parish, 1 W. Va. 125. "Where mutual promises are made, the one furnishes sufficient consideration for the other." 9 Cyc. 323. Bilateral contracts furnish both the required consideration and mutuality. 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 727. This case is but an instance of the old basic rule of the law of contract—that, where an offer is made and accepted, a contract has been made.

Hull says that plaintiffs' instruction 3 is bad. It says that the consideration for a contract need not be money, but may be of an act to be performed, and, if plaintiffs agreed to sell for remuneration, that is sufficient consideration. This is sound. But it is said that it conflicts with defendant's first instruction, saying that, when Hull put his land into the hands of Rowan & Co., he could revoke at any time. Where is the conflict when one deals alone with consideration and the other with revocation? There is no inconsistency between instructions 3 and 4; the latter saying that if Rowan & Co. found a purchaser, and consummation of sale was prevented by defendant, they could recover commission. They deal with different subjects.

Fault is found with plaintiffs' instruction 5. After stating a proposition, the court stated to the jury that the instruction was to be considered, if evidence had been given to sustain it, but, if no such evidence had been given, the jury must disregard it. It is very old law that an instruction should not be given without evidence bearing upon the facts on which it rests, and whether there is such evidence the court must say. Upon this view, it would be error to give an instruction conditionally, as in this case. Reversals are innumerable for the cause that there was no evidence to render an instruction a question before the jury. When the court gives an instruction, the jury must say that, in the opinion of the court, the subject of the instruction is a proper matter for the consideration of the jury under the evidence. Though error to give the instruction, it ought not to reverse the judgment. The instruction runs that if Rowan & Co. got Ballard to view the land, with a view to buy, and Rowan & Co. did this before revocation, and afterwards Ballard made an offer to buy at the price fixed in the memorandum, and did so in pursuance of the solicitation of Rowan & Co., then they were entitled to recover the commission stipulated in the contract. It was claimed on the one side, and denied on the other, that when Rowan was on the witness stand he stated that a few days after the engagement of Rowan & Co. as agents, and before the 12th of August, the date of revocation of their authority, Rowan talked with Ballard and Mann about the land, and they agreed to examine it. The judge was sitting with his back to the witness, and could not certify that the witness had so stated, and therefore left it to the jury to say whether he had so stated. Now, the date when Rowan talked with Ballard and Mann, and requested them to examine the land, is immaterial, so it was within three months. That evidence, the existence of which was left to the jury, was immaterial. That statement of the instruction was hurtful to the plaintiffs and beneficial to the defendant. Eliminate it, and the instruction is sound law and pertinent to the case.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 15, 1904.)

INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—CHANGE OF TITLE—BREACH OF CONDITIONS—WAIVER.

1. The defendant insurance company, in consideration of $75 premium, by its agent, C., issued and delivered its policy to S. D. W. for $2,500, as follows: $1,500 thereof on a building used for a hotel, office, and other purposes, then owned by S. D. W., and $1,000, the residue, on hotel, office, and kitchen furniture; loss, if any, under the first item of the policy, payable to B., as its interest might appear at the time of fire. The property was totally destroyed by fire. Held, that B. can maintain its action in its own name upon said policy against the company for said $1,500.

2. Where an insurance policy stipulates that the entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, shall be void, if any change, other than by the death of the insured, shall take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process, judgment, or voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, and the insured, after the policy is issued and delivered to him by the company, without any agreement or consent of the company indorsed on said policy or added thereto, and without the consent of the company in any other way obtained by him, voluntarily conveys by deed the insured property to another, such conveyance and change of title of the insured property forfeits the policy, with the right to recover thereon for loss or damage to the property.

3. S. D. W., after he had received the policy sued on, conveyed the insured property by deed to E. D. W., and E. D. W., after such conveyance to him, made and delivered his notes, payable to C. (who, as the agent of the company, issued the policy to S. D. W.), in payment of the premium expressed in the policy, and afterwards E. D. W. paid the said notes to C., but without the knowledge, consent, or ratification of the company. Held, that the acts of C., in receiving said notes and collecting the same in payment of the said premium, did not constitute a waiver by the company of the forfeiture of said policy as aforesaid.

4. Chapter 83, p. 120, of the Acts of the Legislature of 1899, renders fire insurance companies doing business in this state liable, in case of total loss, by fire or otherwise, as stated in the policy, on any real estate insured by them, for the whole amount of insurance stated in the policy of insurance upon said real estate.

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by the Ritchie County Bank against the Firemen's Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Sherman Robinson and J. Newman, for plaintiff in error. Young & McWhorter, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. In an action of assumpsit, brought by the Ritchie County Bank against the Firemen's Insurance Company of Baltimore, Md., the circuit court of said county, on the 28th day of February, 1908, rendered a judgment against the plaintiff, dismissing its action and awarding costs to the defendant. To this judgment, the plaintiff bank obtained a writ of error and supersedeas. Various rulings of the court, made during the progress of the action, are assigned by petitioner as grounds of error. All of the evidence adduced on the trial is certified in bills of exception. Plaintiff's declaration is in the form prescribed by section 61 of chapter 125 of the Code of 1899. It alleges that the defendant, by virtue of the policy of insurance thereto attached and therewith filed, owes to the plaintiff the sum of $1,500 for loss in respect to the property insured by said policy, caused by fire on or about the 21st day of December, 1901, at the town of Cairo, in the said county of Ritchie. The policy sued on is in form the "standard fire insurance policy," bears date on the 8th day of March, 1901, is numbered 709,506, and, among its many provisions, contains the following:

"In consideration of the stipulations herein named and seventy-five & no/100 dollars premium, does insure S. D. Williams for the term of one year from the 9th day of March, 1901, at noon, to the 9th day of March, 1902, at noon, against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding twenty-five hundred dollars, to the following described property, while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere, to-wit: Mr. S. D. Williams, $2,500.00 as follows: $1,500.00 on the three-story frame metal-roofed building, situate on the north side of Railroad street, Cairo, Ritchie county, West Va., and occupied for hotel, office, and mercantile purpose; and $1,000.00 on hotel, office, and kitchen furniture of every description, including billiard tables, pool tables, balls, cues, and all appurtenances thereto, all while contained therein. Loss, if any, under first item of the within policy, payable to the Ritchie County Bank as its interest may appear at the time of the fire. Other insurance permitted. * * * This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void * * * if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured, * * * or if any change, other than by the death of the insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise. * * * In any matter relating to this policy, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company. * * * If, with the consent of this company, an interest under this policy shall exist in favor of a mortgagee, or of any person or corporation having an interest in the subject of the insurance other than the interest of the insured as described herein, the condition hereinbefore contained shall apply in the manner expressed in such provisions and conditions of insurance relating to such interest as shall be written upon, attached, or appended thereto. * * * If fire occur, the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company, protect the property from further damage, forthwith separate the damaged and undamaged personal property, put it in the best possible order, make a complete inventory of the same, stating the quantity and cost of each article and amount claimed thereon, and within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by the insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire, the interest of the insured and all others in the property, the cash value of each item thereof and the amount of loss thereon, all incumbrances thereon, all other insurance, whether valid or not, covering any of the said property, and a copy of all the descriptions and schedules in all policies, any change in the title, use, occupation, location, possession, or exposure of said property since the issuing of this policy, by whom and for what purpose any building herein described and the several parts thereof were occupied at time of fire, and shall furnish, if required, verified plans and specifications of any building, fixtures, or machinery destroyed or damaged, and shall also, if required, furnish a certificate of the magistrate or notary public (not interested in the claim as a creditor or otherwise, not related to the insured) living nearest to the place of fire, stating that he has examined the circumstances and believes the insured has honestly estimated the loss to the amount that such magistrate or notary public shall certify. * * * This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto, and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provisions or conditions of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto; nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached."

Attached to the printed form of the policy is the following: "Note. To secure mortgagee, if desired, the policy should be made payable on its face to such mortgagee, as follows: Loss, if any, payable to — as his interest may appear." And the "consent by company to assignment of interest": "The Firemen's Insurance Company of Baltimore, hereby consents that the interest of — as owner of the property covered by this policy be assigned to —, Agent."

The defendant interposed a demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled by the court. Defendant contends that the policy sued on is indivisible, and, being so, its said demurrer should have been sustained. The policy expressly provides that loss, if any, under the first item (the $1,500 item) of the policy shall be payable to the Ritchie County Bank as its interest may appear at the time of fire. The declaration avers that the defendant owes to the plaintiff the sum of $1,500 for loss in respect to the property insured by said policy. Under section 62 of said chapter, if good cause therefor be shown or appear, the court or judge in vacation may order the plaintiff to file a more particular statement in any respect of the nature of his claim, or the facts expected to be proved at the trial. By this section the defendant may obtain the facts which may be necessary for his defense, when they are not fully disclosed by the declaration. Kerr on Ins. p. 764, says: "The determination of the proper parties to an action upon an insurance policy must be largely governed by the law and practice of the forum regulating suits upon ordinary contracts. The policy itself designates the party to whom the proceeds are primarily payable, and a suit upon a policy must, as a general rule, except where otherwise provided by statute, be brought by the one designated in the contract as the payee, or his privies. * * * The mortgagee may sue alone, and in his own name, where the loss, if any, is payable to him as his interest may appear, when his interest equals or exceeds the full amount due under the policy." 3 Joyce on Ins. § 2305, among other things, states: "In addition to the class of assignments which we have mentioned in the preceding section, there is another species, which is similar to that of the assignment of a chose in action. We refer to those cases where the policy is issued to one person, 'loss, if any, payable to' another, or 'in case of loss pay the amount to —.' An insurance policy making loss payable to another than the assured must be regarded as having been at its inception assigned to such other person with the consent of the company, and it is not necessary for him to obtain a transfer of the policy from the assured, assented to by the company, as in ordinary cases. A provision that a loss shall be payable to a mortgagee, or his assign, as his interest may appear, operates only as a conditional appointment to pay so much of the proceeds of the policy as may be equal to the amount of the mortgage at the time of a loss under the policy." Many cases are cited by the author to sustain the principle above stated. Colby v.

Parkersburg Ins. Co., 37 W. Va. 789, 17 S. E. 303, holds that where "a policy of fire insurance insures A. in a given sum, part of it on one property, part on another, loss payable to B., 'mortgagee, as his interest may appear,' and B.'s mortgage covers only one of the properties insured, B. may sue on the policy in his own name and recover the total loss on both properties, not exceeding his debt, notwithstanding his mortgage covers only one of the properties insured." In Brown v. Insurance Co., 5 R. I. 394, it is held that a policy of fire insurance, effected by the owner and mortgagor of a stock of goods, by the terms of which the loss or damage, if any, is made payable to the mortgagee, is in legal effect assigned by the former to the latter, with the consent of the insurer, as collateral security for the mortgage debt. A policy of insurance, made payable to a third person as beneficiary, as his interest may appear at the time of fire or loss, does not, according to this view, insure such third party, or his interest in the subject of insurance. Therefore his right to sue and recover on the policy depends upon his interest in the insurance money at the time of the loss, or, more accurately speaking, at the time of the institution of his action. The court, therefore, did not err in overruling the said demurrer.

The defendant also filed its plea of res judicata, and with said plea and in support thereof vouched the record of a certain action of assumpsit, instituted in the circuit court of Ritchie county, on the 21st day of April, 1902, by S. D. Williams against said Firemen's Insurance Company for $1,000 damages. The declaration in the last-mentioned action was filed at the May rules, 1902, and alleges that the defendant, by virtue of the policy of insurance thereto attached and therewith filed, owes to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000 for loss in respect to the property insured by said policy, caused by fire, on or about the 21st day of December, 1901, at the town of Cairo, in the said county of Ritchie. Said last-named policy is also numbered 709,508, bears date on the 8th day of March, 1901, and, among other things, recites and states that: "In consideration of the stipulations herein named, and of seventy-five and no/100 dollars premium, does insure S. D. Williams for the term of one year from the 8th day of March, 1901, at noon, to the 9th day of March, 1902, at noon, against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding twenty-five hundred dollars, to the following described property, while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere, to wit: Mr. S. D. Williams. $2,500.00, as follows: $1,500.00 on the three-story frame metal-roofed building, situate on the north side of Railroad street, Cairo, Ritchie county, West Virginia, and occupied for hotel, office, and mercantile purposes, and $1,000.00 on hotel, office, and kitchen furniture of every description, including billiard table, pool tables, balls, cues, and all appurtenances thereto, all while contained therein. Loss, if any, under first item of the within policy, payable to the Ritchie County Bank as its interest may appear at time of fire. Other insurance permitted." Pleas were filed therein by the defendant, and issues made upon the demand of said Williams for said $1,000. A trial of this action was had, in which no matter was put in issue except the right of Williams to recover said $1,000, as mentioned in the second item of said policy. On the 5th day of January, 1903, after the plaintiff had introduced his evidence in chief in support of his claim, the defendant demurred to said evidence, whereupon the court sustained the demurrer, dismissed the action, and gave judgment in favor of the defendant against plaintiff, Williams, for costs, which judgment is in full force and effect, and was asserted in the circuit court and is urged here as a full and complete defense to the action before us for review. To the plea of res judicata the plaintiff filed its demurrer, which was overruled, and issue was then joined upon said plea.

While it is true that the said policy No. 709,506 was attached to the declaration in the Williams case, no averment was made in the pleadings in that case, or issue joined therein, as to said $1,500 item. Neither was any evidence offered or heard on the trial in that action in relation thereto. There are two separate and distinct items in the policy for which separate actions may be prosecuted, upon appropriate pleadings and proofs. The principle of res judicata has been so often passed upon by this court that almost every conceivable question arising thereunder has been settled. In the recent case of Waldron v. Harvey (decided at the present term) 46 S. E. 603, this court holds that where there is no pleading to warrant a decree, or part of a decree, the decree, or such part of it, is not merely voidable, but void, as it is not a matter in issue. Brannon, J., speaking for the court, says a decree is a conclusion of law from pleading and proofs, and where there is a failure of either pleading or proofs there can be no decree. A decree, or any matter of a decree, which has no matter in the pleadings to rest upon, is void, because pleadings are the very foundation of judgments and decrees. Cresap v. Cresap (decided at the present term) 46 S. E. 582; Bierne v. Ray, 49 W. Va. 129, 38 S. E. 530; Sayre v. Harpold, 33 W. Va. 553, 11 S. E. 16. There could not have been, and was not, an adjudication in the Williams case of the $1,500 item mentioned in the policy, because there was neither pleading nor proofs to warrant such adjudication. Therefore the defendant's plea of res judicata is not established by proof.

Plaintiff contends that the court erred in sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, and in its said judgment for the defendant against plaintiff for costs. The defendant, in its specification and notice of defense filed and relied on by it in said action, in part says that the interest of the insured at the time the policy was issued was other than unconditional and sole ownership; that a change, other than by the death of the insured, took place in the interest, title, and possession of the subject of insurance, in this: that after said policy was issued, and without notice to this defendant, and without its consent, the property thereby insured was assigned, transferred, and conveyed to one Edgar D. Williams, by deed from said S. D. Williams and Lilly C. Williams, his wife, bearing date on the 1st day of April, 1901; that the insured thereafter had no interest or title of any kind or character in the subject of the insurance set forth in the declaration; that after said policy of insurance was issued and delivered the hazard thereof was increased by means within the control and knowledge of the insured; and that said S. D. Williams, the party to whom the said policy was issued and delivered, transferred, sold, and conveyed the subject-matter of insurance, as above set forth, by which the hazard of said insurance was increased. Defendant also filed an amended plea, specification, and notice, wherein it averred that on the 7th day of January, 1899, said S. D. Williams and his wife executed a deed of trust, conveying said property to one E. C. Carver, trustee, in trust to secure the Bank of Cairo in the payment of a certain note for $3,000, therein fully described; that said trust deed was a lien and incumbrance upon said property at the time said policy was issued, and was unknown to said defendant, and was without its knowledge or consent, and was in violation of the warranties, provisions, and conditions in the said policy contained, in this: that said policy provides: "This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof, or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein." Defendant further averred that plaintiff had not, nor had any one for it, within the time in said policy specified, rendered a statement to the defendant, or to any one for it, signed and sworn to by said insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire, the interest of the insured and all others in the property, the cash value of each item thereof and the amount of loss thereon, all incumbrances, whether valid or not, covering any of said property, etc. The plaintiff replied generally to the pleas and specifications filed by the defendant, and denied the truth thereof, and also replied thereto specially, and says that plaintiff had nothing to do with any of the alleged changes of ownership of the subject-matter of insurance at any time, and had no notice or knowledge thereof. Plaintiff further avers that the defendant did know of said changes of ownership, and transfers in the title of the subject-matter of said insurance; that C. D. Cutright, the duly accredited general agent of the defendant, after the deed from said S. D. Williams to Edgar D. Williams for the subject-matter of said insurance had been made, with the full and complete knowledge of said deed, and in whom the title of said property was then vested thereby, accepted a premium upon said policy of insurance, and thereby waived all claim of the forfeiture of the policy sued upon, and thereby completely estopped the defendant company from setting up the same; and that, even if plaintiff had knowledge of said transfer of the title of the subject-matter of insurance as aforesaid, yet the defendant company is estopped by reason of the acceptance as aforesaid of said premium upon the policy sued on, after said transfer had been made, and at a time when said company well knew of said transfer as aforesaid.

Plaintiff's special replication, in effect, contends that the act of the insured, without its knowledge, consent, or ratification, could not prevent its recovery from the defendant upon said policy. This contention is untenable. The person named in the policy as owner, and not the mortgagee (in this case, the trust creditor) to whom the loss is payable, is the insured, within the purview of a condition of forfeiture. Kerr on Ins. 429. The authorities examined upon this question hold that, no matter to whom the loss may be made payable, it cannot be recovered by any one, if, by the terms explicitly set forth in the policy, no right of action can accrue at all upon the violation of some specific condition, whose observance by the insured is made necessary to fix the insurer's liability. Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton (Me.) 38 Atl. 429, 30 L. R. A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457; Kabrich v. State Ins. Co., 48 Mo. App. 393; Oakland Home Ins. Co. v. Bank of Commerce (Neb.) 66 N. W. 646, 36 L. R. A. 673, 58 Am. St. Rep. 663; Bently v. Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 738, 23 S. E. 584. In this case the plaintiff has no better right than the insured would have had, so far as the question of the forfeiture of the policy is involved. It is shown by the evidence that the building insured by the defendant and described in the policy as aforesaid was totally destroyed by fire on the 21st day of December, 1901; that at the date of the policy, and at the time of said fire and loss of the insured property, and at the time of the institution of plaintiff's action, the said S. D. Williams was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, evidenced by his note, which had, before the date of said policy, come into the hands of the plaintiff bank, in the regular course of business; and that the payment of said note was secured by said deed of trust made by said S. D. Williams and wife, bearing date on the 7th day of January, 1899, which conveyed said property to E. C. Carver, trustee, for that purpose. The deed of S. D. Williams and wife, bearing date on the 1st day of April, 1901, to Edgar

D. Williams, for said insured property, was also put in evidence, and is part of the record. It is also proved that, at the time the policy was issued, one Hoff occupied the property and controlled it as the tenant of S. D. Williams; that Edgar D. Williams took possession of it, under his deed, about May 12, 1901, and, together with his mother and sister, occupied it until about the 12th day of November next following, when they left it, one Forward being then put in possession of it by Edgar D. Williams, who then left and went to Moore, in Tucker county, W. Va., where he remained until about the 30th day of December, 1901; that neither Edgar D. Williams, his mother, sister, nor father, S. D. Williams, was in possession of the property from the 12th day of November, 1901, up to the time of the fire; that Mr. Forward was not in possession thereof at the date of the policy; and that Edgar D. Williams had no communication with the company or with Cutright from the 12th day of November, 1901, the day on which said Forward was put in possession of the property, until after the said fire. It is further shown by the evidence that the policy in question was issued and delivered to S. D. Williams by C. B. Cutright, whose name appears thereon, as follows: "Countersigned by C. B. Cutright, Agent"; that Edgar D. Williams took charge of the property after its conveyance to him, and conducted a hotel therein; that Cutright first knew of the conveyance of the property to Edgar D. Williams on or about the 29th day of May, 1901; that there was no incumbence on the property at the date of the policy, except the said trust deed to secure the $3,000 note, which deed of trust was contemplated and indirectly referred to in the said provision of the policy relating to payment of loss, if any, to the Ritchie County Bank, as its interest might appear at the time of fire; that there had never been any other suit brought against defendant for said $1,500 item; that the policy was not at any time presented by S. D. Williams, or any person for him, to the company, or its agent, with a demand or request for its consent to the conveyance or transfer of said property to said Edgar D. Williams; that no transfer of the policy by the company was ever made to Edgar D. Williams; and that no request was ever made to the company for such transfer. Edgar D. Williams swears that he paid the premium on the policy in suit; that it was paid in and by two notes, which he gave to the insurance agent, C. B. Cutright, the same person whose name appears on the policy; and that there were two other policies by different companies on the property, issued by said Cutright as their agent. Several notes were given in evidence, all signed by Edgar D. Williams, and each payable to the order of C. B. Cutright, at the Bank of Cairo, W. Va., one for $70 at 60 days, and another for $65 at 90 days, both bearing date on the 13th day of April, 1901; another for $70, dated June 12, 1901, payable in 90 days, a renewal of the above-mentioned $70 note; one for $40, dated July 12, 1901, at 90 days; another one for $40.60, dated October 12, 1901, at 90 days; and a check for $25.60, dated July 12, 1901, made and payable as aforesaid—which notes first given, and the renewals thereof, and said check, were made and delivered to Cutright, and paid by Edgar D. Williams, as he states, for said three premiums. It is claimed that said notes, some being renewals of the others, and said check, were given to and collected by said Cutright, as the agent of the defendant company; but it will be observed that said notes and check, and each of them, are on the face thereof payable to Cutright individually, and not as "agent." There is no proof in the record showing or attempting to show that he was authorized by the company to receive notes or checks for premium due to it, or that it ever had any notice at any time of said transactions, or any of them. It is also apparent that the notes and check, and each of them, were made and delivered by Edgar D. Williams to Cutright after the conveyance of the insured property to Edgar D. Williams by S. D. Williams.

The plaintiff, moreover, contends that Cutright wrote the other insurance on the property, after the change in its ownership, occupancy, and conveyance thereof as aforesaid; that he accepted payment of premiums on the policy sued on after the said conveyance, with full knowledge of the facts aforesaid; that he thereby waived any forfeiture of the policy; and that, by reason of the acts and conduct of Cutright, the defendant is estopped from claiming a forfeiture of the policy by Williams, and from denying a waiver of such forfeiture by Cutright, as agent of defendant. The evidence proves that, after the policy sued on had been issued by the company and delivered to S. D. Williams, a change of title, occupancy, and possession of the insured property took place, by reason of the voluntary act of the insured, to wit, by the deed from Williams and wife to Edgar D. Williams, without the knowledge or consent of the company; that another change of occupancy and possession of said property took place about six weeks before its destruction by fire; and that when the said fire occurred neither S. D. Williams nor any member of his family, nor said Edgar D. Williams, was in possession thereof—all of which was without the knowledge or consent of the company, unless the acts and knowledge of Cutright aforesaid be taken and held as the acts and knowledge of the company, and in legal effect a waiver by it of the conditions in the policy contained. The insurer undertakes to guaranty the insured against loss or damage, and to make certain payments upon the terms and conditions agreed upon and specified in the policy, which embodies the agreement of the parties, and upon no other, and, when called upon to pay in case of loss, the insurer may justly insist upon the fulfillment of those terms. The terms of the policy constitute the measure of the insurer's liability, and, if it appears that the contract has been terminated by the violation on the part of the assured of its conditions, there can be no recovery. Kerr on Ins. 430. The company assumed the risk of the insurance under the conditions existing at the time of the completion of the contract. It contracted with reference to the title to and occupancy of the property, and provided that no change should thereafter, during the life of the policy, be made therein without its consent, given in a specified manner. Such provisions are a guard against the diminution in the strength of the motive which the insured may have to be vigilant in the care of his property, and the substantial diminution of interest in the property insured has been suggested as a test of the kind of transfer or change of title which will avoid the policy. In the case of Ayres v. Hartford Ins. Co., 17 Iowa, 176, 85 Am. Dec. 553, it is said: "The object of the insurance company, by this clause, is that the interest shall not change, so that the assured shall have a greater temptation or motive to burn the property, or lose interest or watchfulness in guarding and preserving it from destruction by fire; and any change or transfer of the interest of the insured in the property, of a nature calculated to have this effect, is a violation of the policy." In the case of Northern Assurance Co. v. Grand View Building Association, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213, it is said "that contracts in writing, if in unambiguous terms, must be permitted to speak for themselves, and cannot, by the courts, at the instance of one of the parties, be altered or contradicted by parol evidence, unless in cases of fraud or mutual mistake of facts; that this principle is applicable to cases of insurance contracts as fully as to contracts on other subjects; * * * that it is competent and reasonable for insurance companies to make it a matter of condition in their policies that their agents shall not be deemed to have authority to alter or contradict the express terms of the policies as executed and delivered; * * * that insurance companies may waive forfeiture caused by nonobservance of such conditions; that, where waiver is relied on, the plaintiff must show that the company, with knowledge of the facts that occasioned the forfeiture, dispensed with the observance of the condition; that, where the waiver relied on is the act of an agent, it must be shown either that the agent had express authority from the company to make the waiver, or that the company subsequently, with full knowledge of the facts, ratified the action of the agent." Three of the Justices of the Supreme Court in the case cited dissented from the opinion of Mr. Justice Shiras, but upon what point or points therein does not appear.

Whatever difference of opinion there may be among judges as to the legal effect of the acts of agents, during the negotiations of the parties, in the inception of the contract, there can be no room for difference as to the law governing the acts of agents and the parties to the contract, after its completion and delivery. All of the acts of S. D. Williams relied on by the defendant as a forfeiture of the policy, and all of the acts and transactions of Cutright relied upon by the plaintiff as in legal effect a waiver of the forfeiture, if any, by the defendant, were after the delivery of the policy to the insured. There is no proof that, at the time of the execution and delivery of the aforesaid notes and check by Edgar D. Williams, Cutright was yet the agent of defendant. But, if we may presume that he continued to be such agent until that time, it is not shown that his acts in receiving the notes and check were authorized by the defendant, in the manner above stated, or otherwise, or that such acts, or any of them, ever came to the knowledge of the defendant. In the case of Maupin v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co., 53 W. Va. 557, 45 S. E. 1003, the following expressions are cited with approval by Brannon, J.: "If one who is dealing with an agent knows that he is acting under circumscribed and limited authority, and that his act is outside of and transcends the power conferred, the principal is not bound, whether the agent is general or special, because principals may limit the power of one as well as the other. If a policy of insurance declares that no officer or agent has power to waive any provision or condition embraced in a printed or authorized policy, but may waive certain added conditions, provided such waiver is written on or attached to the policy, an attempted waiver by an agent of one of the conditions, which the policy declares he shall not have power to waive, is inoperative and void." Quinlan v. Providence Ins. Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 81 N. E. 81, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645: "Where a policy of insurance itself contains an express limitation upon the power of the agent, he has no right to contract, as against the company, with the party to whom the policy has been issued, so as to change its terms, or dispense with the performance of any part of the consideration, either by parol or in writing, and the insured is estopped by accepting the policy from setting up powers in the agent at the time in opposition to the conditions in the policy." Weldert v. State Ins. Co., 19 Or. 261 [24 Pac. 242] 20 Am. St. Rep. 809. To the same effect Cleaver v. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 32 N. W. 660, 8 Am. St. Rep. 908; German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 30 Neb. 288 [46 N. W. 481] 27 Am. St. Rep. 402. "We must take the contracts [policies] as we find them and enforce them as they read," says the late case of Rohrback v. Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451." It seems very plain that there was a forfeiture of the policy by reason of the conveyance of the insured property by said S. D. Williams and wife to Edgar D. Williams as aforesaid, and that the acts of Cutright above stated did not amount to a waiver of such forfeiture on behalf of the defendant.

Plaintiff also complains that the circuit court erred in rejecting the proof of loss of the insured building offered by it in evidence, and contends that said proof was and is sufficient. The statement or proof of loss is signed and sworn to by said S. D. Williams, bears date on the 11th day of February, 1902, and, among other things, says that on the afternoon of Sunday, December 22, 1901, from a gas stove in a bedroom, as he is informed and believes, a fire originated that totally destroyed the three-story metal-roofed building and its contents, insured by him, situate in Cairo, Ritchie county, W. Va., and occupied for a hotel, mercantile, and office purpose. It then states the interest of the plaintiff by reason of its deed of trust, the conveyance of the property to said Edgar D. Williams, the other insurance thereon, and by whom and for what purpose the building was occupied and used at the time of the fire. The sufficiency or insufficiency of the proof of loss depends upon the construction which we may give to our statute relating to insurance and insurance companies. Chapter 33, p. 120, of the Acts of the Legislature of 1899 is entitled: "An act fixing the liability of fire insurance companies." It was passed February 21, 1899, and took effect 90 days thereafter. It was therefore in force and effect at the time the policy in question was issued and delivered to S. D. Williams. The language of the act is: "All fire insurance companies doing business in this state shall be liable, in case of total loss, by fire or otherwise, as stated in the policy, on any real estate insured, for the whole amount of insurance stated in the policy of insurance upon said real estate; and in case of partial loss by fire or otherwise, as aforesaid, of the real estate insured, the basis upon which said loss shall be computed shall be the amount stated in the policy of insurance effected upon said real estate, and the insured shall have the right to enforce his claim for said loss in any court having jurisdiction." Valued policy laws are now in force in many of the states of the Union, besides West Virginia. These statutes vary somewhat in phraseology, but all have the same purpose. In Wisconsin, which enacted the first of such statutes, it is provided that "whenever any policy of insurance shall be written to insure any real property, and if the property insured shall be wholly destroyed without criminal fault on the part of the insured or his assigns, the amount of insurance written in such policy shall be taken conclusively to be the true value of the property when insured, and the true amount of loss and the measure of damages when destroyed." In Oshkosh Gaslight Co. v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 71 Wis. 454, 87 N. W.

§19, 5 Am. St. Rep. 233, the court says, after quoting the law: "Under this statute, it is settled by frequent adjudications that the actual value of such real estate when insured is wholly immaterial. * * * The statute must be regarded as a part of the contract of insurance, and the amount written in the policy, as liquidated damages as agreed upon by the parties, is conclusive as to the amount of the damage, if any, for which the insurer is liable by reason of the loss." In Relly v. Franklin Ins. Co., 43 Wis. 449, 28 Am. Rep. 552, it is held that, "as the statute rests upon grounds of public policy, the conclusive effect of the amount of insurance written in the policy upon the measure of damages is not altered by a stipulation in the same instrument that the damages should be established 'according to the true and actual cash marketable value' of the property when the loss happened." Thompson et al. v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 45 Wis. 388; Seyk et al. v. Millers' Nat. Ins. Co., 74 Wis. 87, 41 N. W. 443, 3 L. R. A. 523. In Caledonian Ins. Co. v. Cooke, 101 Ky. 412, 418, 41 S. W. 279, 280, the court says: "It is perfectly evident that the Legislature intended to remedy the evil of overvaluation in insurance, and in doing so followed the example of many other states of the Union by making the insurer responsible for overvaluation, and to do this the remedy was and is to compel the insurer to pay the full amount (in case of total loss) for which it writes the policy, and on which the premium is calculated and collected, subject only to be diminished by any deterioration in value between the dates of the policy and the loss, and providing, further, for relief for fraud on the part of the insured, where the insurer is deceived thereby. In other words, the law says to insurance companies: 'If you want to pay only a fair price for property that may be destroyed, you must adjust that matter before the policy is issued, and, if you fail to do so, you will be the loser, as the law fixes the amount you are to pay by the amount you collect premium on, subject to deterioration in value after the date of the policy.' As to whether this is right we do not say. It is the law, and, if recognized and obeyed in spirit, would no doubt remedy a great and growing evil in the country. From what we have said, it is manifest that we are of opinion that the appellant was bound to pay the appellee the full face of his policy, as the case is presented. As to the arbitration alleged, there was nothing to arbitrate."

We adopt the language of the court in the last case cited as peculiarly appropriate in explanation of the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of our insurance law above quoted. The language of the act is broad and unambiguous. Under it, the insurance company shall be liable, in case of total loss, by fire or otherwise, as stated in the policy, on any real estate insured, for the whole amount of insurance upon said real estate, any provisions in the policy to the contrary notwithstanding. All provisions in a policy in conflict with a valued policy statute are void, and hence a provision for the appointment of arbitrators in case of loss is ineffective where the property is wholly destroyed. Elliott on Ins. § 318. The proof of loss informed the defendant of the total loss of the insured property, and of the liability of the company under the policy and the statute, as claimed by the plaintiff. The reasons for the insertion of the many statements in the proof of loss, where the policy is not issued under and governed by a valued policy statute, having ceased in this case, we hold that the proof of loss offered in evidence by the plaintiff, but rejected by the court, was and is sufficient.

But, upon the whole case, we find no reversible error. We therefore affirm the judgment.

MEDLEY v. GERMAN ALLIANCE INS. CO.

March 15, 1904.)

INSURANCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—LIABILITY OF COMPANY—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—WAIVER—NOTICE TO INSURED—LACHES—REFORMATION OF POLICY—LIMITATIONS OF AGENT'S AUTHORITY—FORFEITURE—PROOFS OF LOSS—FALSE SWEARING.

1. An insurance company establishing a local agency is responsible to the parties with whom its agent transacts business for his acts and declarations within the scope of his employment, and to the extent of the authority apparently conferred upon him by the company; and a limitation upon such apparent authority, not communicated to the insured before he acted upon the representations or conduct of the agent, will not relieve the company from liability, unless, after discovery of the want of authority in the agent, the insured has precluded himself from the assertion of his rights by laches. (By three Judges.)

2. When an insurance agent, intrusted with blank policies, and authorized to fill up, countersign, and deliver them, is correctly informed, by the person whose property he undertakes to insure, as to the state of the title, and other facts material to and affecting the inception of the contract, so far as inquiry is made respecting them, and takes no written application for the insurance, and then issues a policy embodying, as warranties therein, facts different from those which were given to him by the insured, the company is estopped from defending a claim for loss under the policy on the ground of such false recitals, unless it is shown that the insured had prior or contemporaneous notice of want of authority in the agent to waive conditions. (By three Judges.)

3. A contract in writing is presumed to be the embodiment of an antecedent verbal agreement, and upon clear and full proof that the person who undertook the preparation of it has, by mistake or fraud, written the contract different from what it was as made by the parties, it may be reformed in equity; and, where such departure occurs in a policy of insurance prepared by an agent of the company, it raises an equitable estoppel against the company, which may be effectually asserted by the insured in a court of law, unless he had notice of

want of authority in the agent to waive the conditions at all, or except in a specific manner. (By three Judges.)

4. A clause in a policy of insurance so limiting the authority of the agent is not notice to the insured of the agent's want of power to bind his principal in respect to transactions had between them before the policy was delivered, such as will prevent a reformation of the contract at the instance of the insured, or preclude him from relying upon a waiver of conditions by the agent made prior to the issuance of the policy. (By three Judges.)

5. Failure to read a policy of insurance within a short time after its delivery is not such neglect or laches as will preclude the insured from having a reformation of it, or deprive him of the benefit of a waiver by the company through its agent, unless some fact was known to him sufficient to put him on inquiry as to whether it had been correctly written, or contained a limitation upon the powers of the agent. (By three Judges.)

6. Restrictions inserted in a policy of insurance upon the power of the agent to waive any conditions, except in a particular manner, as by indorsing the waiver on the policy, do not apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract. (By three Judges.)

7. As to promissory warranties, conditions for the violation of which the policy is rendered noneffective after it has become effective and operative, such limitation clause is not only notice to the insured of want of authority in the agent to waive them, but also a stipulation between the parties that the agent has not, and shall not have, any such power.

8. Notice of sale of the insured property under a deed of trust, served upon the insured before the occurrence of the loss, precludes recovery, when the policy contains a stipulation that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, it shall be void, "if, with the knowledge of the insured, foreclosure proceedings be commenced or notice given of sale of any property covered by this policy by virtue of any mortgage or trust deed," together with a clause inhibiting the agent from waiving such condition otherwise than by an agreement so indorsed or added, and no agreement waiving the condition as to commencement of foreclosure proceedings and notice of sale is so indorsed or added unless the forfeiture is waived by the company, or the agent under authority therefor conferred by the company.

9. Forfeiture for breach of a promissory warranty is not waived by retention of the premium after notice thereof.

10. Under such a policy, having a slip attached thereto by the agent saying, among other things, "§ ——— Other Concurrent Insurance permitted," additional insurance on the property will not prevent recovery for loss on the policy.

11. Denial by an insurance company of its liability on other grounds, within the time allowed for furnishing preliminary proofs of loss, is, in law, a waiver of the conditions of the policy requiring such proofs.

12. When, by the provisions of a policy, it shall be void in case of fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, false swearing, in order to defeat recovery, must be intentional, and done for the purpose of defrauding the insurer.

Brannon, J., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County;
F. A. Guthrie, Judge.

Action by Lucy A. Medley against the German Alliance Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Watts & Ashby and Ohlilton, MacCorkle & Chilton, for plaintiff in error. A. W. McDonauld, Brown, Jackson & Knight, Linn, Byrne & Cato, and A. B. Littlepage, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. The German Alliance Insurance Company complains of a judgment of the circuit court of Kanawha county rendered against it, and in favor of Lucy A. Medley, for the sum of $1,782, in an action of assumpsit upon a policy of insurance upon a dwelling house, and personal property therein, for the sum of $1,500; alleging that the court erred in overruling its motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, made at the conclusion thereof; and its motion to exclude all the evidence and direct a verdict, made after all the evidence had been introduced; in giving to the jury five several instructions, and each of them; in refusing to set aside the verdict; and in entering judgment thereon.

One of the principal defenses to the action, raised by a proper plea, and which forms the subject-matter of instructions given and refused, is the alleged breach of a condition of the policy which reads as follows: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon or added hereto shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." No such provision was indorsed on the policy. Mrs. Medley's title to the land on which the building stood is evidenced by a deed by which the Kanawha Valley Bank, a corporation, "doth grant and convey unto" her the lot (describing it), and which contains, in the habendum clause thereof, the following: "And it is fully understood and agreed between all of the parties herein interested that the said lot of land is hereby conveyed by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part for and during her lifetime and at and after her death the title to the said lot is to pass unto and vest in her children born and unborn." No written application for the policy was made. The contract of insurance was effected by Thomas Popp, on behalf of the company, as its agent and G. W. Medley, the husband of the plaintiff, as her agent. The insurance was solicited by the company through Popp, who inquired of Medley, before issuing the policy, as to the person in whose name the deed was, in response to which Medley said: "The deed is deeded to my wife and her heirs, born and unborn." George Medley, a son of the insured, says his father told Popp the property was deeded to his mother and her heirs, and also that there was a lien upon it by deed of trust for $300 in favor of Ben Baer. Both father and son say the agent inquired, not as to the estate or interest of Mrs. Medley in the property, but as to the name of the person to whom it was deeded. Popp's testimony was not taken.

The policy contained the following additional clause, limiting the authority of the agent: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements or conditions as may be endorsed hereon or added hereto, and no officer, agent or other representative of these companies shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement endorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached."

In Wolpert v. Northern Assur. Co., 44 W. Va. 734, 29 S. E. 1024, this court held that "if an insurance company elects to issue its policy of insurance against a loss by fire without any regular application, or without any representation in regard to the title to the property to be insured, it cannot complain, after a loss has occurred, that the interest of the insured was not correctly stated in the policy, or that an existing incumbrance was not disclosed." Said case follows the decision in Insurance Co. v. Rodefer, 92 Va. 747, 24 S. E. 393, 53 Am. St. Rep. 846. The principle was again applied in Cleavenger v. Franklin Insurance Co., 47 W. Va. 595, 35 S. E. 998. In that case, at page 608, 47 W. Va., page 1003, 35 S. E., Judge English, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "This policy, then, was issued by the Franklin Company without any application therefor signed by the assured. In such cases the law is thus laid down in Insurance Company v. Rodefer"—and then quotes the syllabus in that case as above given. This is consistent with, and logically results from, other principles of insurance law several times announced by this court, one of which is that the agent of an insurance company, in preparing, or directing the preparation of, an application for insurance, acts for his company, and not for the applicant. He is the agent of the company, and not the agent of the applicant, and, in what he does, binds the company, and not the applicant, if he acts improperly. "Though the weight of the modern authorities, as well as reason, in my judgment, leads to the conclusion that where an application for a policy, which is filled up by an agent of an insurance company, and signed by the insured on the faith that it has been properly filled up, who has not read the application, though he had an opportunity to do so, if none of the false answers were given by him, but were inserted either fraudulently or by mistake, where the mistake was not the result of anything said or done by the insured, the insured or assured is not bound by such false answers inserted in the application, but these answers should be regarded as the act of the insurance company, by its agent, and not as the act of the insured. It is true, this position is still controverted by respectable authorities. * * * But outside of Massachusetts the weight of authority now seems to be in favor of the position that, under circumstances above stated, false answers in the application for an insurance will not forfeit the policy, and I concur in this view." Green, J., in Schwarzbach v. Insurance Co., 25 W. Va. 622, 663, 52 Am. Rep. 227. This view is embodied in point 12 of the syllabus of said case. The same doctrine is reiterated in Deitz v. Insurance Co., 31 W. Va. 851, 8 S. E. 616, 13 Am. St. Rep. 909, and it is incorporated in point 3 of the syllabus of that case, together with the further declaration that "this rule is not changed by a stipulation inserted in the policy, subsequently issued, that the acts of such agent in making out the application shall be deemed the acts of the insured."

It is denied, however, that this law is applicable to the case in hand, for the reason that the policy contains a clause limiting the power of the company's agent to waive conditions of the policy. As the policy was delivered into the hands of the insured with this clause plainly printed in it, it is said that she had notice of it, and was bound to know, whether she read the policy or not, that the agent had no power to issue a policy upon any other conditions than those stated in it. It is difficult to see any solid ground for this distinction. In the Deitz Case, the policy, when put in the hands of the insured, said that, if the property was held in trust or on commission or by leasehold or other interest not amounting to absolute and sole ownership, it must be so represented to the company, and expressed in the policy in writing, else the insurance as to such property should be void, and that if, through the agent, any misrepresentation as to the title to the property or any other matter had been made, the agent should be deemed to be the agent of the insured, and not of the company, and, further, that the company should "not be bound by any act of, or statement made to or by, any agent or other person," which was not contained either in the policy, or in the written application upon which the insurance, or any renewal thereof, was based. How could the company have chosen and put into its policy words more emphatically denying to its agent the power to bind it by any word or act outside of the written matter contained in the application for the policy? For the very reason that the company had so attempted to limit the authority of its agent in respect to matters preceding the issuance of the policy in the negotiation of the contract, this court virtually declared that clause of the policy void, or at least that the clause in the policy subsequently issued was not notice to the insured of the limitation of the agent's authority. In that case the policy was issued to a husband, on a building belonging to his wife; and the court held the insurance company bound to pay the loss, notice of want of authority apparent on the face of the policy (if it be notice) to the contrary notwithstanding. In Cleavenger v. Franklin Insurance Co., 47 W. Va. 595, 35 S. E. 998, the interest of the insured was different from that stated in the policy, and the policy declared that if it were different the policy should be void. Whether it contained any clause concerning the authority of the agent, does not appear. In Wolpert v. Northern Assur. Co., Judge English said: "It appears that the plaintiff in this case is illiterate, cannot read a word of English, and had to rely on the insurance agents in taking out the policy. No questions appear to have been asked him in regard to the deed of trust, and it does not appear that the conditions of the policy were read or made known to him, and no concealment appears to have been made by the plaintiff. It was simply an omission by the agent to inquire in reference to liens on the property, which was not the fault of the plaintiff; and, looking at the entire case as presented by the record, I do not think the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict and award a new trial, and in entering judgment." This doctrine was applied, also, in the case of Coles v. Jefferson Insurance Co., 41 W. Va. 261, 23 S. E. 732, the syllabus in which says: "A provision in the application or in the policy making him the agent of the insured, and not of the company, cannot change his legal status as agent of the company, or the law of agency, if he is in fact the agent of the latter." This seems to be an extension of the principle, and to hold that a limitation of authority in the printed application is not binding upon the insured. In the opinion, Judge Holt says: "This rule is not affected or changed by a stipulation inserted in the policy subsequently issued that the acts of such agent in making out the application shall be deemed the acts of the insured, unless written in the application or expressed in the policy."

These decisions are founded largely upon that of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. Ed. 617, in which Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion, said: "If, however, we suppose the party making the insurance to have been an individual, and to have been present when the application was signed, and soliciting the assured to make the contract of insurance, and that the insurer himself wrote out all these representations, and was told by the plaintiff and his wife that they knew nothing at all of this particular subject of inquiry, and that they refused to make any statement about it, and yet, knowing all this, wrote the representation to suit himself, it is equally clear that for the insurer to insist that the policy is void because it contains this statement would be an act of bad faith, and of the grossest injustice and dishonesty. And the reason for this is that the representation was not the statement of the plaintiff, and that the defendant knew it was not when he made the contract, and that it was made by the defendant, who procured the plaintiff's signature thereto. * * * It is quite true that the reports of judicial decisions are filled with the efforts of these companies, by their counsel, to establish the doctrine that they can do all this, and yet limit their responsibility for the acts of these agents to the simple receipt of the premium and delivery of the policy; the argument being that, as to all other acts of the agent, he is the agent of the assured. This proposition is not without support in some of the earlier decisions on the subject, and, at a time when insurance companies waited for parties to come to them to seek assurance, or to forward applications on their own motion, the doctrine had a reasonable foundation to rest upon. But to apply such a doctrine, in its full force, to the system of selling policies through agents, which we have described, would be a snare and a delusion, leading, as it has done in numerous instances, to the grossest frauds, of which the insurance corporations receive the benefits, and the parties supposing themselves insured are the victims. The tendency of the modern decisions in this country is steadily in the opposite direction. The powers of the agent are prima facie coextensive with the business intrusted to his care, and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals. An insurance company establishing a local agency must be held responsible to the parties with whom they transact business for the acts and declarations of the agent within the scope of his employment, as if they proceeded from the principal."

But this is said not to be applicable to the case in hand, for the reason that notice of the agent's want of authority to waive conditions was not brought home to the applicant in that case. It is also said that a limitation in the policy is notice, although the policy is prepared by the insurance company alone in pursuance of a prior verbal agreement to which it ought to correspond, and to which it will be made to conform, in equity, upon proof of the fraud or mistake on the part of the agent of the company which resulted in the incorrect preparation of the policy. It is further said that subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as some prior to that of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, are authority for the position that the limitation clause in the policy is notice. One of these is Carpenter

v. Providence Washington Insurance Co., 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. Ed. 1044, but it is to be noted that the statement of that case contains this recital: "Annexed to the policy are the proposals and conditions on which the policy is asserted to be made, and among them is the following: 'Notice of all previous insurances upon property insured by this company shall be given to them, and endorsed on the policy, or otherwise acknowledged by the company in writing, at or before the time of their making insurance thereon, otherwise the policy made by this company shall be of no effect.'" That was a paper exhibited to the insured by the company before the policy was issued, imparting to him information of the only conditions upon which a contract could be made, and was therefore direct and positive previous notice. Moreover, it was, in legal effect, notice of want of authority of the agent to make any other kind of a contract. Another is Insurance Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 6 Sup. Ct. 837, 29 L. Ed. 934, which the court distinguished from the case of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, saying: "Here the power of the agent was limited, and notice of such limitation given by being embodied in the application, which the assured was required to make and sign, and which, as we have stated, he must be presumed to have read. He is therefore bound by its statements." Observe that this was prior, not subsequent, notice. Another is Insurance Co. v. Wolff, 95 U. S. 326, 24 L. Ed. 387. The condition for the breach of which the policy in that case was forfeited was a subsequent one, and notice in the policy of the limitation of the agent's authority was prior notice. It provided that removal to and residence in certain prohibited sections of the country by the insured should forfeit the policy. Another is Insurance Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 234, 24 L. Ed. 689, but the condition violated in that case was one subsequent, and not prior, in its nature. Another one is Assurance Co. v. Building Ass'n, 183 U. S. 808, 22 Sup. Ct. 123, 46 L. Ed. 213, relied upon by this court as authority for the decision in Maupin v. Insurance Co. 45 S. E. 1008, and it does actually decide as follows: "Where fire insurance policies contain provisions whereby agents may, by writing indorsed upon the policy or by writing attached thereto, express the company's assent to other insurance, such limited grant of authority is the measure of the agent's power. Where such limitation is expressed in the policy, the assured is presumed to be aware of such limitation." This much of the decision is based upon the prior decisions of that court hereinbefore referred to and explained, all of which are cases showing either that there was notice in the application prior to the issuance of the policy, or that the principle had only been applied to conditions in the policy, the violation of which subsequent to its issuance rendered it invalid and non-effective. Hence it is clear that the doctrine has been extended in this last case to limits beyond those theretofore defining its application. This court has said that subsequent notice of the agent's want of authority, contained in the policy, is not binding upon the insured as to representations made at the inception of the contract, and in the verbal negotiations preceding the issuance of the policy. Moreover, at best, it is only presumptive, not conclusive or actual, notice. In the case last cited, the court says the assured is presumed to be aware of such limitation. And in Insurance Co. v. Fletcher, cited, Mr. Justice Field said only that the insured "must be presumed to have read" the limitation clause in the application. "In regard to waivers before issued, it is by no means clear that the constructive notice supplied by provisions of a policy not yet in the hands of the applicant should be binding upon him. Prudent men are accustomed to rely upon the acts and statements of the agent, and they should be protected in so doing. Busy men have not time to study the interminable provisions of insurance policies. Only when the custom of limiting the authority of a general agent in the policy has become so general that it is a part of the ordinary business knowledge of the world that such provisions exist and are to be examined will it be proper to hold the applicant bound by them in respect to negotiations prior to the issue of the policy." May on Insur. § 137a.

A large number of the states hold, for one reason or another, that the limitation, expressed in the policy, of the authority of the agent, or prohibition of his authority to waive conditions, has no application to those conditions which relate to the making or inception of the contract, but only to conditions inserted in the contract as actually made, and to be thereafter observed. "It seems to be the prevailing doctrine that the rule holding the company chargeable with the acts, declarations, or knowledge of facts of a general soliciting agent at or before the issuance of the policy is not affected by clauses in the policy prohibiting waivers by agents, or stipulating that the agent shall be the agent of the assured, where it is not shown that such limitations were brought to the knowledge of the assured." 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 948. "The restrictions inserted in the policy upon the power of the agent to waive any condition, unless in a particular manner, as by indorsing the waiver on the policy, cannot be deemed to apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract, when it appears that the agent has delivered it and received the premium with full knowledge of the actual situation. This doctrine has been applied to both general and soliciting agents." Id. 949. For this position, decisions by the courts of Georgia, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, and West Virginia are cited, and there are others. It is the well-settled law of Maryland, and it is apprehended that it is the law of New Jersey, if resort be had to a court of equity instead of a court of law. In the opinion in Insurance Co. v. Martin, 40 N. J. Law, 568, 29 Am. Rep. 271, from which Mr. Justice Shiras, in Assurance Co. v. Building Ass'n, cited, quotes at great length, it is said: "The cases usually cited for the proposition that a contract of insurance is excepted out of the class of written contracts with respect to the admissibility of parol evidence to vary or control the written contract will be found, on examination, to be, to a large extent, those in which the proof has been received with a view to a reformation of the policy in equity, or to meet the defense that the contract was induced by false and fraudulent representations not embodied in the contract, or are the decisions of courts in which the legal and equitable jurisdictions are so blended that the functions of a court of equity have been transferred to the jury box." So, in Deweese v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 35 N. J. Law, 866, from which Mr. Justice Shiras quotes also at considerable length, the court say: "But it is said the agents of the defendants who procured this contract were aware that the real contract designed to be made was that the plaintiff might apply the premises to this use. This knowledge of the agent of the defendants, and which, it is contended, will bind the defendants, is to have the effect to vary the obligations of the written contract. Upon what principle can this be done? There is no pretense of any fraud in the procurement of this policy. The only ground that can be taken is that the agent, knowing that the premises were to be, in part, used as a stable, should have so described the use in the policy. The assumption is, and must be, that the warranty, in its present form, was a mistake in the agent. But a mistake cannot be corrected, in conformity with our judicial system, in a court of law. No one can doubt that in a proper case of this kind an equitable remedy exists." So it appears that the only trouble in New Jersey as to this power of waiver is the selection of the proper forum in which to assert it. You cannot have it in a court of law, but you may have it in a court of equity. In this state no such difficulty exists. This court has not been turning the assured round to a suit in equity to have reformation of his contract. Travis v. Insurance Co., 28 W. Va. 583; Deitz v. Insurance Co., 33 W. Va. 526, 11 S. E. 50, 25 Am. St. Rep. 908; Coles v. Insurance Co., 41 W. Va. 261, 23 S. E. 732; Woolpert v. Insurance Co., 42 W. Va., 647, 23 S. E. 521; Woolpert v. Insurance Co., 44 W. Va. 734, 29 S. E. 1024. These cases were in assumpsit, which is held to be an equitable action at law, and in them the principle of equitable estoppel was applied, and the same result speedily and inexpensively reached that would have been attained by a suit in equity to reform and enforce the contract. Croft v. Hanover Insur. Co., 40 W. Va. 508, 21 S. E. 854, 52

Am. St. Rep. 902; Cleavenger v. Insurance Co., 47 W. Va. 595, 35 S. E. 998. Even in Massachusetts, where conditions and warranties in policies of insurance are enforced to the very letter, the jurisdiction in equity to reform a policy on the ground of mistake or fraud is admitted. Washburn v. Insurance Co., 144 Mass. 175.

The following illustrations of the exercise of equity jurisdiction are given by May on Insur. (4th Ed.) § 566a: "An error in a policy may be corrected by the memorandum of the agreement or by the application marked 'Accepted,' over the initials of an officer of the company. If by mistake of the agent a policy is issued in wrong form or with errors, equity will reform it, even after a loss. A mistake brought about by wrong information given by the agent of the company, he being a lawyer, by which the policy was issued in the name of the mortgagor, instead of the mortgagee, will ground a bill for reformation. Where the agent fails to state the interest that is intended to be insured, the policy will be reformed. If a policy differs from the memorandum, the policy will, by equity, be made agreeable to the memorandum. Where the policy omits the name of the insured, and states sixty days as the term of insurance, instead of a year, as agreed upon by the parties in the verbal contract which the policy was intended to embody, the policy will be reformed. Upon 'clear and convincing' evidence of mistake by one party and fraud by the other, or of mutual mistake, so that the writing does not carry out the intention of either, equity will reform. When the insured by mistake inserted the name of another vessel than the one intended to be insured, the policy was reformed after loss. A policy issued in the wrong name by mistake of the company's agent may be rectified after loss, although the said agent signed the application with his own name for the applicant. When the insurer by mistake indorsed 'eight boxes,' etc., on the policy, from a bill of lading given by the insured of a shipment, when in fact it was eighteen, which was not discovered until after loss, the policy was reformed. The rule that mistake must be mutual does not prevail where there is bad faith on the part of the defendant, or where confidence was reposed in him, and he was intrusted with and assumed the preparation or completion of the instrument, in which willfully or negligently he has omitted what had been clearly stated to him as the intent of the plaintiff, who relies on the defendant in the matter. When the insurance company was told that no charter of the ship was at hand, and the insured did not know just where she would touch, but wanted a policy for the round trip, which would cover everything, and when the company purported to give such a policy, but in fact limited it in opposition to the charter, when found, equity ordered a reformation of the contract. When circumstances indicate that a policy was intended to be issued for two months, and the premium was paid for that time only, and the policy was written for a longer time, equity will reform the policy on the company's request. If a certificate for two thousand dollars is by mistake issued upon an agreement for a one thousand dollar policy, the company is entitled to have the document reformed."

If the terms of a policy are so unalterably and absolutely binding upon the assured, after its acceptance, upon the theory of notice, how is it possible that such jurisdiction exists and may be exercised in one forum or another in all the states? If that be true of policies of insurance, how is it possible that deeds and other instruments may be reformed and made to express the true verbal contract which it is supposed to embody, upon the application of the party into whose hands they have been placed? The description in the deed may be altered and reformed so as to speak the truth upon the application of the grantee therein. Bieler v. Dreher, 129 Ala. 384, 30 South. 22. So a mortgage will be reformed in like manner upon the application of the mortgagee. Houston v. Faul, 86 Ala. 232, 5 South. 433. And the holder of a title bond is not precluded from having a rescission of his contract in equity for misdescription of the land. Reese v. Kirk, 29 Ala. 406. The only ground upon which this right of reformation can be denied is laches. How is the person into whose hands the policy of insurance is placed to know whether it has been drawn according to the verbal understanding of the parties, until after he has read it? Is he to reject it upon suspicion? Has he not the right to assume for the time being that it has been properly drawn? As a matter of fact, is it not common knowledge that agents are relied upon to properly prepare the policies, and that they are scarcely ever critically examined before acceptance? There can be no notice until after the reading, and, after the acceptance of the policy, there can be nothing more than a sort of implied notice; and a court of equity will not hold the party guilty of laches for mere negligence to actually read the policy, any more than it will in the case of a deed. Compare the case of a misdescription of a tract of land with the insertion of the complex and artificial terms of insurance policies, such as "unconditional and sole ownership," "fee-simple title," and say whether a layman, especially an illiterate person, can be rightfully or legally subjected to a stricter rule in respect to them than he is in respect to a description of a thing with which he is perfectly familiar, or which he is obviously capable of fully comprehending.

"Where the plaintiff applied for a renewal on the same terms as the old policy, and the defendant promised to give it, and the plaintiff did not examine the new policy until after loss, when he found it different from the old one in a matter materially affecting his rights of recovery, it was held that he was not guilty of laches—having a right to presume the new policy to be like the old, according to promise—and that the policy should be reformed. The length of time before the assured discovers the mistake in the policy is only important as evidence of the existence of such a mistake. There is no period short of the statute of limitations within which a man must discover such error. A plaintiff is not, by neglecting to read his policy, guilty of such laches as to bar him from seeking to have the policy reformed to agree with the contract he made. Where a suit on the policy has been brought within the period of limitation agreed on, a bill for reformation in aid thereof may be brought after the limit." May on Ins. (4th Ed.) § 566.

It is upon these principles, well settled and fundamental in their nature, and not because of the desire to treat insurance companies different from other litigants, that the courts have enforced their contracts under the conditions of this case. Bearing them in mind, and applying them to the facts, the following language from the New York Court of Appeals has nothing of harshness or irregularity in it: "The restrictions inserted in the contract upon the power of the agent to waive any condition, unless done in a particular manner, cannot be deemed to apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract, when it appears that the agent has delivered it and received the premium with full knowledge of the actual situation. To take the benefit of a contract, with full knowledge of all the facts, and attempt afterwards to defeat it, when called upon to perform, by asserting conditions relating to those facts, would be to claim that no contract was made, and thus operate as a fraud upon the other party." Wood v. Fire Ins. Co., 149 N. Y. 382, 44 N. E. 80, 52 Am. St. Rep. 733. Nor has this language any strange or unusual sound to one who has had his mind fixed upon those principles: "The rule that an insurance company will not be permitted to defeat a recovery upon a policy issued by it by proving the existence of facts which would render it void, where it had full knowledge of them when the policy was issued, is too well established by the authorities in this state to require further discussion. It is manifest that the facts in this case bring it clearly within the principle of the cases cited. Whether the decisions of this class of cases proceed upon the charitable theory that the insurance company by mistake omitted to make the required indorsement, or intended to waive the provision regarding it, or upon the idea that its purpose was to defraud the insured, and is for that reason estopped, is of but little consequence, as any one of those theories is sufficient to avoid the defense relied upon in this case." Robbins v. Insurance Co., 149 N. Y. 477, 44 N. E. 159. Nor does the following stand upon a different principle, except in degree: "Where, upon an application for a fire insurance policy upon property covered by a chattel mortgage, a representative of the plaintiff disclaimed any knowledge of claims against the property, but stated that, if there were any, defendant's agents could ascertain by inquiry of the plaintiff, which the agent voluntarily agreed to do, but failed to do, that the policy is subsequently issued with no reference to the chattel mortgage indorsed thereon or added thereto, as required by one of its conditions, is no defense to an action upon it for a loss, since, while the agent was ignorant of the existence of the incumbrance, under the circumstances he was chargeable with knowledge of it, and, having issued the policy, it was a waiver of the condition requiring the indorsement, and the defendant is bound thereby." Skinner v. Norman, 165 N. Y. 565, 59 N. E. 309, 80 Am. St. Rep. 776. In the opinion, the court says such is the law, "notwithstanding a provision in the policy that no agent of the company shall have power to waive any such condition, except by written indorsement, though a different rule prevails where a change in the title or occupation of the property occurs subsequent to the issue of the policy."

Nor, it is humbly and deferentially submitted, does the following extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Shiras, the only portion of it bearing directly upon this question, either answer this reasoning in the language of the law, or cover the principles upon which this doctrine stands: "The fallacy of this view is disclosed in the phrases we have italicized. It was thereby assumed that the agent had full knowledge of all the facts, that such knowledge must be deemed to have been disclosed by the agent to his principal, and that consequently it would operate as a fraud upon the assured to plead a breach of the conditions. This mode of reasoning overlooks both the general principle that a written contract cannot be varied or defeated by parol evidence, and the express provisions that no waiver shall be made by the agent except in writing, indorsed on the policy. As we shall hereafter show when we come to consider the meaning and legal purport of the contract in suit, such express provision was intended to protect both parties from the dangers involved in disregarding the rule of evidence. The mischief is the same whether the condition turned upon the facts existing at and before the time when the contract was made, or upon the facts subsequently taking place."

To say there is no difference between prior and subsequent presumptive notice, with reference to the powers of the agent in respect to a condition or matter, and that a limitation in the policy upon the powers of the agent, which the assured has never seen, and could not have seen until after the acceptance of the policy, which he had the right to presume would conform in every respect to the verbal contract which it was designed and intended to embody, shall have the same effect, as to representations and transactions preceding the preparation of the contract which the insurer undertook to write up, as it has in respect to matters solemnly agreed upon to be done and observed after the contract has been written up and completed, and form parts of the completed contract itself, and after the insured has had presumptive notice of the want of power in the agent, is to overlook and lay aside that distinction upon which a court of equity has always permitted the introduction of parol evidence for the purpose of canceling or reforming a written instrument, and refused to admit it for the purpose of altering, contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from a written agreement after it has been written in strict conformity with the verbal agreement which it was designed to embody. This ignores the entire doctrine of rescission, cancellation, and reformation of written contracts, or else it asserts that no such doctrine applies when the contract is made on one side through an agent of limited authority, while the other party was absolutely ignorant of the limitation until after he was irrevocably and unalterably bound. "In an action upon a policy of fire insurance, it appeared that no written application for insurance was made, and that the policy was written by defendant's agent, and accepted in good faith without examination, and not read by the insured until after the fire. The building insured was built for and used as a boarding house, and was erroneously described in the policy as 'occupied by the insured as a dwelling only.' The plaintiff fully and accurately described the property to the agent as a boarding house, and it was seen and examined by the agent, and the misdescription was his act alone. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover." Dowling v. Insurance Co., 168 Pa. 234, 31 Atl. 1087. In that case the court said, without dissent:

"The fraud or mistake of an insurance agent, within the scope of his authority, will not enable his principal to avoid a contract of insurance to the injury of the insured who acted in good faith, and the fraud or mistake of the agent may be proved by parol evidence, notwithstanding it is provided in the policy that the description of the property shall be a part of the contract and a warranty by the insured. This is clear upon principle, and it is abundantly sustained by authority. Smith v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 89 Pa. 287; Ellenberger v. Protective Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 89 Pa. 464; Susquehanna Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Cusick, 109 Pa. 157; Klister v. Lebanon Mutual Ins. Co., 128 Pa. 553 [18 Atl. 447, 5 L. R. A. 646, 15 Am. St. Rep. 696]; Meyers v. Ins. Co., 156 Pa. 420 [27 Atl. 39].

"This case is much stronger for the plaintiff than those above cited. In all of these, written applications had been signed by the insured, and in each case the application was made a part of the contract. In this case no written application was made, and the policy was written by the agent, and not read by the insured until after the fire. The building insured was built for and used as a boarding house, and was erroneously described in the policy as 'occupied by the insured as a dwelling only.' The testimony was clear and uncontradicted that there was no mistake or deception on the part of the plaintiff, who fully and accurately described the property to the agent as a boarding house, and spoke to him of its capacity and use. It was seen and examined by the agent, and its use, which was apparent, was fully known to him. The misdescription was his act alone, in the face of light and knowledge, and was unknown to the insured until after the loss occurred. The defendant cannot be released from its contract because the plaintiff, acting in good faith, accepted without examination the policy written by its agent.

"In Swan v. Watertown Ins. Co., 96 Pa. 37, the insured signed an application which had not been finished. He directed another to fill it up, and expressed a doubt as to the manner in which it should be done. It was held that he knew facts to incite him to read the policy, and was charged with knowledge of its contents, and should, under the circumstances, be presumed to have accepted it as written. No such presumption arose in this case. Having made a full and frank disclosure of the facts to the company's agent, who was empowered to write the policy, and who, from observation, knew the character and use of the building, there was nothing to induce or warn the insured to read the policy, unless it was the anticipation of fraud or mistake, and this could impose no duty in protection of the rights of the defendant."

Church, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court in Hay v. Star Fire Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 235, 33 Am. Rep. 607, says: "It was bad faith on the part of the defendant to change so radically the terms of the policy, and deliver it as a policy simply renewing the old one, without notice of the change. A party whose duty it is to prepare a written contract, in pursuance of a previous agreement, who prepares one materially changing the terms of such previous agreement, and delivers it as in accordance therewith, commits a fraud which entitles the other party to relief, according to the circumstances presented. Equity will reform a written instrument in cases of mutual mistake, and also in cases of fraud, and also where there is a mistake on one side and fraud on the other. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525; Rider v. Powell, 28 N. Y. 310, and cases cited. The negligence of the plaintiff in not discovering the change and laches, in not sooner seeking relief, are questions which make the propriety of granting relief in a given case discretionary. The court below, upon the findings of fact, we think properly exercised its discretion in this case in granting relief. Policies of fire insurance are rarely examined by the insured.

The same degree of vigilance and critical examination would not be expected or demanded as in the case of some other instruments. It is found that the plaintiff did not in fact examine the policy until after the fire, when for the first time he was informed of the peculiar terms of this provision." See, also, Broadhead v. Insurance Co., 23 Hun, 397, and Miaghan v. Insurance Co., 24 Hun, 58, in the syllabus of which the following is found: "The plaintiff was, against the defendant's objection and exception, allowed to testify that he did not read the policy when it was delivered to him. Held no error; that it tended to show that he relied on the agent's acts."

The only new element in this case which could possibly distinguish it from the decisions made by this court, to which reference has been made, as holding that where the agent of the company issues a policy without having taken any written application therefor, or, having taken one, has incorrectly stated therein the information given to him by the applicant, the company is estopped from relying upon facts, existing at the time the contract was made, differing from those incorrectly stated in the application for the policy, is the alleged notice of want of authority in the agent, conveyed by incorporating the limitation clause in the policy. If this is not notice, there is nothing else in the case which forms the basis of even a pretense that it is to be distinguished from the other cases. Nothing more need be said to show that it is not conclusive, actual notice, irrevocably and unalterably binding the insured. To say so would be to take a position inconsistent with the law relating not only to insurance contracts, but all other kinds of contracts.

The courts, with few, if any, exceptions, say that, in the absence of any collusion between the agent and the insurer, where the latter has no knowledge of a limitation upon the authority of the former, the company is bound by the knowledge of the agent; and that if the applicant for insurance has truthfully answered the questions propounded to him, and put the agent in possession of all the material facts necessary to the preparation of a valid contract of insurance, and the agent, in writing up the contract, incorrectly states the facts, or, in other words, writes the contract as if the facts were different from those given to him, or, having knowledge of the facts himself, without any representation from the applicant, writes a policy containing false recitals of the facts, whether the departure be due to an innocent mistake or to actual and willful fraud on his part, not participated in by the applicant, the company is estopped from making defense to an action on the policy on the ground of such departure or misrecital. Some of the cases decided by this court and the Court of Appeals of Virginia, already cited, go further than this, and hold that if the agent, without any representation whatever from the applicant, writes up the policy, stating the facts upon his own responsibility, the company is likewise bound by his act, and estopped from disputing the truth of the recitals in the policy. Why should not the company be bound under such circumstances, as well as when the agent has made the inquiries and obtained correct information and then put false recitals in the policy? As has been shown, the company is bound, because the contract would otherwise operate as a fraud upon the insurer. Would it not be an equally rank fraud to permit the company to take the premium and give no insurance in exchange therefor, when the agent foregoes any inquiries whatever and assumes to write the policy himself? Authority other than our cases and the Virginia cases says the company is bound under such circumstances. "When the defendant's agent issued the policy without ascertaining from the owner whether the property was incumbered, he in effect determined that the existence of incumbrances was immaterial, and the defendant agreed to insure the property incumbered or unincumbered. It was the agent's failure to comply with his agreement which led the plaintiff into what was practically a trap, and the defendant should not be allowed to plead its ignorance of a fact as to which it has agreed to obtain knowledge. I know that it has been said by a distinguished judge 'that illustration is not argument,' but at times it is at least a very convenient substitute for it. If in the case of distant property the owner should state to the insurance company that he did not know whether the premises were occupied or vacant at the time, I assume no one would deny that he might, by agreement with the company, obtain a valid policy of insurance if the indorsement 'occupied or unoccupied' was made on the policy." Cullen, J., in Skinner v. Norman, 165 N. Y. 585, 571, 59 N. E. 309, 310, 80 Am. St. Rep. 776. But if the applicant, undertaking to state the material facts to the agent, has, by mistake or with fraudulent intent, misstated them, the agent may rely upon his statement and issue the policy in accordance therewith, and is not bound to inquire further as to the truth of the facts, and, if the statements be untrue, the company may defend and be relieved from the contract, on the ground of the falsity of the representations made by the insured. This is the class of cases in which the courts say that the agent need not examine the records as to the title of the insured and incumbrances upon the property, and that the company is not bound by constructive notice. Here the applicant himself is at fault.

In this case the agent of the insured, when solicited to take insurance upon the property, did not say that the title of the insured was the fee-simple estate in the property. He said either "the deed is deeded to my wife and her heirs born and unborn," or that "the property was deeded to Mrs. Medley and her heirs." To any one but a person learned in the law, this would hardly be taken to mean the fee-simple title. To the layman it imports an estate in the heirs. Under the rule in Shelley's Case, the word "heirs" in such deed is a word of limitation, and not of purchase; and the rule involves intricate and fine distinctions, incomprehensible to any person except those who have studied the law. Upon this information, the agent assumed to write in the policy that Mrs. Medley owned the fee-simple title to the lot on which the building stood. Had he put upon that policy the words actually used by the agent of the insured, the company would, no doubt, have made inquiries which would have disclosed the actual state of the title. If the company has been prejudiced, the fault rests with its own agent. Upon the principles hereinbefore referred to, it is clear that no advantage of it can be taken by the company.

It is also urged that the clause providing for unconditional and sole ownership has been violated, because the insured had only a life estate, and it was incumbered by a deed of trust. Though only a life estate, it was an unconditional estate, and she was the sole owner of it. A life estate is a freehold of uncertain duration, but, if it is free from any condition working a forfeiture of it before the death of the life tenant, it is absolutely unconditional. As she did not own that estate jointly with any other person, and it had not been divided or segregated by any lease or in any other mode, it was sole ownership. It has been held over and over by this and other courts that the warranty of sole and unconditional, or absolute and sole, ownership is not broken by the existence of an incumbrance on the land. Wolpert v. Assur. Co., 44 W. Va. 734, 29 S. E. 1024; Insurance Co. v. Weill, 28 Grat. 389, 26 Am. Rep. 304; Quarrier v. Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 507, 27 Am. Rep. 582. A mortgagor in possession, being the owner of the incumbered fee-simple title, has sole, entire, and unconditional ownership within the meaning of the policy. Dolliver v. Ins. Co., 128 Mass. 315, 35 Am. Rep. 378; Insurance Co. v. Beck, 43 Md. 358; Insurance Co. v. Barker, 7 Helsk. 508; Insurance Co. v. Haven, 95 U. S. 242, 24 L. Ed. 473.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that before the issuance of the policy read in evidence the duly authorized agent of the defendant who took the said policy and represented the defendant in procuring the same was fully informed of the facts of and concerning the plaintiff's title and ownership of the real estate referred to in said policy, and was informed of the provisions of the deed conveying said property to the plaintiff, and that he, the said agent, then and there informed the representative of the plaintiff that the policy should be taken in the name of the plaintiff as the owner of said property, and that the representative of the plaintiff, relying upon said representative and agent of the defendant, assented to such suggestion, and that the policy was accordingly so written by the representative of the defendant and delivered to the plaintiff, and the representative of the defendant then and there accepted and received the premium for the said policy, then the defendant would not be relieved from liability under said policy, even if the deed referred to only vested a life estate in the plaintiff."

It is equally apparent that the court did not err in refusing to give defendant's instructions Nos. 3, 4, and 9, which read as follows:

"(3) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the agent, Thos. Popp, who solicited said insurance, inquired of the agent and husband of the plaintiff as to who owned the property to be insured, and said agent stated to said Popp, in answer to said inquiry, that the deed to said real property was to his wife and her heirs, born and unborn, or to her and her heirs, then the plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict in this case.

"(4) The jury are instructed that if after said fire the plaintiff, in her additional statement of proof of loss sent to the defendant, stated that said real estate so insured in said policy belonged to her and her heirs, then she is not entitled to recover as to said insurance on said building in this case."

"(9) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was not the unconditional and sole owner of the house described in the policy of insurance in this case at the date of the loss of said house, the jury cannot find any damages against the defendant by reason of the destruction of said house by fire, unless the jury further find from the evidence that the true title of the plaintiff to said property was made known to the defendant, or its agent, prior to said fire."

Another clause of the policy said that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, it should be void, "if, with the knowledge of the insured, foreclosure proceedings be commenced or notice given of sale of any property covered by this policy by virtue of any mortgage or deed of trust." It may be very well doubted whether, if this clause had been brought to the attention of the insured at the time of the making of the contract, any policy would have been issued without an indorsement thereon waiving this condition; but it is in the policy, and relates to something which will occur, if at all, subsequent to the time of the making thereof. It is a part of the contract as made, and that contract further stipulates that no agent shall have power to waive any of its conditions. As to these subsequent conditions or warranties, this non-waiver clause is effective. As to them, it is not mere notice of want of authority. It rises to the dignity of an agreement that there is not, and shall not be, any power in the agent to waive. Quinlan v. Ins. Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 365, 31 N. E. 31, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645. "A provision that a policy shall be void in case of foreclosure proceedings is common in insurance policies, and we must assume that experience has shown to the underwriters that such proceedings increase the risk to the insurer. The defendant might have been willing, for the premium charged, to insure this barn with the mortgage upon it, and yet not willing to insure it in case of proceedings to foreclose the mortgage. It did assent to the mortgage, and agree that loss, if any, should be paid to the mortgagee, but it did not assent to continue the insurance in case the risk was increased by proceedings to foreclose the mortgage. Before commencing the foreclosure, the plaintiff should have obtained the assent of the defendant. It might have examined the circumstances and granted such assent without any conditions, or it might have required additional premium for the increased risk. It might have refused altogether, and in that case the plaintiff could have delayed his foreclosure until the end of the year, or surrendered the policy and procured insurance elsewhere. Even if the provision were found to be very inconvenient and embarrassing, there is no help for it. There it is, and we cannot take it out of the policy by construction." Titus v. Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 410. See, also, Quinlan v. Ins. Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645.

Notwithstanding this clause, and the fact that notice of sale under the deed of trust was given and served upon Mrs. Medley, it is urged that the policy was not thereby avoided, for the reason that she brought a suit in equity and enjoined the sale, and, after dissolution of her injunction by the court below, took time for an appeal to this court, and thereby defeated the sale until after the loss by fire occurred. The condition does not say that if sale is made the policy shall become noneffective, but that notice of sale shall avoid it. This clause is inserted by insurance companies for their protection, because it is said that when foreclosure proceedings are commenced with the knowledge of the insured the risk is thereby increased, as under such conditions the temptation to burn the property and thereby procure money to discharge the lien may be very great, according to the exigencies of the situation. It is therefore considered a reasonable and prudent condition, and though, in some cases, it may work great hardship, the courts can do nothing but enforce it.

The forfeiture thus effected could have been waived by the company, or by the agent acting under enlarged powers, but not under his authority as limited by the policy, and there is some evidence tending to show an offer by the local agent to pay $1,000 in satisfaction of the claim. If this could operate as a waiver, there is no evidence of the authority of this agent to waive. Nor is there any evidence of waiver on the part of the company, unless its failure, or offer, to return the premium could so operate, but it cannot. As to this condition, violated after the policy became effective and operative, the return of the premium is not a prerequisite to an assertion of the forfeiture. It does not render the policy void ab initio. It is not cause for rescission, in the execution of which the parties must be put in statu quo; nor is it a case of the ratification of an unauthorized contract, made by an agent, by retention of benefits thereunder. If it were not a breach of a promissory warranty, but a violation of a stipulation as to a fact relating to title or condition of the property, or to some other matter affecting the inception of the contract, retention of the premium might, on sound principle, amount to a waiver of the breach, for the ground of defense there would be the want of a valid contract to start with, and not the cessation of a contract, in the manner therein appointed by the parties for putting an end to it, after it has gone into effect.

This conclusion makes apparent the error of the court in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 5, which reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that before the time of the alleged fire a notice of sale was given under the deed of trust to secure Ben Baer, read in evidence after the issuance of the policy of insurance declared on, but that said notice was given without the procurement or knowledge of the plaintiff, and that she had no notice of the fact that it was intended to give notice of such sale until she was served with such notice, and that no sale was ever made under the said notice or under the said trust deed, then the defendant would not be relieved from liability on account of said policy by reason of the issuance of such notice of sale."

The policy provides that it shall be void in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after loss; and the court is said to have erred in refusing to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff, in her proof of loss, verified by her oath, and transmitted to the company, "stated that the building covered by said policy, and for the loss of which she was seeking pay from the defendant under said policy, belonged to her at the time said insurance was effected and procured, then the jury must find for the defendant." The instruction was fatally defective in omitting to say the false swearing must have been done knowingly and with fraudulent intent. May, Ins. § 477. For a similar reason, the objection to plaintiff's instruction No. 3 is unsound. The inclusion of property in the proof of loss, which did not belong to the insured, could not defeat her claim, unless it was fraudulent.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 1, saying the failure of the insured to furnish sufficient proofs of loss would not preclude recovery, provided the jury should find the defendant, within the time allowed for proof of loss, denied liability on grounds other than failure to furnish such proofs, was proper, as there was evidence tending to prove such denial, and the court did not err in refusing defendant's instruction No. 16, because it ignored this evidence and might have misled the jury, if it had been given. "A denial by an insurance company of its liability on other grounds, before any preliminary proofs are made, and before the time within which such proofs are to be made by the terms of the policy, is in law a waiver of the conditions of a policy requiring such proofs." Sheppard v. Ins. Co., 21 W. Va., 368 (Syl., point 14).

Whether any demand was made for the certificate of the disinterested magistrate or notary public, living nearest the place of the fire, as to the amount of the loss, is a question of fact, calling for no decision or expression of opinion here.

Benj. Baer, holding a lien on the property by deed of trust, took out additional insurance on the property. Whether, if the plaintiff had knowledge of this, it would have avoided the policy, need not be decided, for a slip was attached to the policy, saying, among other things, "$—— other concurrent insurance permitted," and the policy on its face gave the agent authority to consent to additional insurance. It is urged that, as no amount was stated, it must be presumed that this slip was left on inadvertently, and should not be treated as a part of the contract, but contracts of insurance are construed most strongly against the company. Bryan v. Ins. Co., 8 W. Va. 605; Quarrier v. Ins. Co., 10 W. Va., 507, 27 Am. Rep. 582; Miller v. Ins. Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 29 Am. Rep. 452. For the same reason, any doubt as to whether a paper attached to the policy is a part of it ought to be resolved against the company. It prepares the policy.

Whether the principles here announced are inconsistent with the application of the law in Maupin v. Insurance Co., 53 W. Va. 557, 45 S. E. 1003, depends upon the determination of a question of fact involved in that case. If the attempted waiver is regarded as having been made at the time the contract was made and without notice to the insured of the limitation upon the agent's authority, according to my view of the case, some conclusions announced here are inconsistent with that decision; but if it was an attempted waiver after the policy became effective, as seems to have been the finding by the majority of the court, there is no such inconsistency. As abstract law, however, point 3 of the syllabus in Maupin v. Insurance Co. is not in accord with the views here expressed, in so far as it asserts that there can be no waiver of the "iron safe," or a similar clause "before the time of the issuance of the policy."

For the error above noted, as well as for insufficiency of evidence to support the verdict, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, a new trial granted, and the case will be remanded.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). I agree to the judgment. I do not agree to the opinion excusing one from reading a policy before he accepts, and excusing him from its conditions because he did not read or understand it. I think that when a man accepts a deed he is bound by its terms. If it departs from the agreement, and he accepts, he waives the points of departure. The agreement is merged. The deed is a contract; so is a policy of insurance. Weidert v. State Ins. Co. (Or.) 24 Pac. 242, 20 Am. St. Rep. 809. I do not agree to take from the company the condition that the policy should be void if the insured owned less than a fee. A company would be willing to take a risk if the insured owned a fee, but not if he owned only a life estate. A person owning a life estate could make money by burning or by being careless. This company never agreed to insure a life estate. It had a right to put that condition in the policy. It is advisable and prudent for its safety; but reasonable or unreasonable, it had right to fix any terms it pleased, and the other party had right to accept or reject the policy. The insured is bound to know the meaning of the policy, and cannot plead ignorance of law.

I do not agree to allow oral evidence, preliminary to the contract, to change its terms. The authorities given in Maupin v. Scottish Union National Ins. Co., 45 S. E. 1003, 53 W. Va. 557, will sustain this view. That oral evidence is that the agent was told that the deed was to Mrs. Medley and heirs—that in law meant a fee simple, just as the policy says. So the agent did not write the policy different from the statement, in the eye of the law.

I do not agree that the disability of the agent to waive vital conditions extends only to things occurring subsequent to the issue of the policy. It is agreed that an agent may not, after the policy issues, waive conditions; but, it is said, before it issues he may waive the duty of the insured to conform thereafter to its requirements, and may waive the presence or existence of essential facts at the date of issue; for instance, that the party has a fee simple. That is, though the company is willing to risk only on the basis of a certain state of things, yet the agent in every place can waive them, and accept another basis, and this in the face of the policy, which says that it is issued on the faith of a certain specified basis, and, further, that no agent can dispense with that basis. This seems to deny right of contract, and to be hard and unjust to insurance companies, which are valuable institutions to the country. Their dangers are great enough, contract as carefully as they may; but to take from them the right to protect themselves against their agent's wrongful acts imposes unjust burdens, and exposes their written contracts to defeat from perjured oral evidence. An insurance company has right to defend itself against fraud and falsehood, to put in conditions as to the title of the property, the duration of the estate, and other matters as they exist at the date of the policy, and make the policy conditional upon them, and it has right to warn the other party that no agent can waive such conditions. It does this by the very letter of its policy. The insured accepts upon such condition, including the statement that no agent can dispense with such conditions. I have always understood that a purchaser of land is bound to know, whether in fact he does or not, clauses, conditions, and limitations, not only in the last instrument in the chain of title, the deed to him, but also away back in any deed in the chain; but here it is proposed to release a party from a condition set before his eyes in the very deed to him. Waldron v. Harvey (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 608. An insurance company deals with persons far off, and has to do so by agents. If bound by their waivers, by agreements between the insured and the agents, it would be ruined. It would be subject to oral evidence, sometimes true, oftener false. It is absolutely necessary that it put its terms and conditions in its policy, and if you nullify these, it has no protection. You impair, destroy its contracts. I assert that any man may limit the power of his agent. Any one dealing with him must inquire as to his power. But, plainer yet, the principal can limit his agent's authority, and notify those dealing through him, as in this case. The policy holder or acceptor is told by his policy of the limitation. That limitation of power is general, and applies to any and every condition, prior or subsequent.

As to the argument that the agent was told one thing as to the title and wrote another in the policy, and therefore the policy can be reformed so as to conform to the statement, that makes it conform to what the one side agreed to, but what the other side never agreed to. That forces on the company a contract it never made. Equity never reforms a deed except to correct mutual mistake. Where both sides do agree to the same particular thing, and agree to have an instrument drawn to do that thing, and the scrivener fails to make the document accomplish what both parties intended it to do, equity will reform, but not where both sides never agreed to do that same thing. In the one case you carry out the intention of both sides, in the others you carry out the intention of one side, but defeat the intention of the other, and make for him a new agreement. In such case equity will rescind, but not reform. Ferrell v. Ferrell, 53 W. Va. 515, 44 S. E. 187.

Some of our decisions may seem in contrast with the view above expressed, and if it were not for the recent labored consideration of the whole question by the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern Co. v. Grand View, 188 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213, I should not be so insistent upon the matters above discussed. I referred to that case at length in Maupin v. Ins. Co., 53 W. Va. 557, 45 S. E. 1003, and now cite the latter case for fuller views. On a question of insurance, I think the decision of the Supreme Court ought to govern. See Ritchie Co. Bank v. Ins. Co. (decided this term) 47 S. E. 94, for views touching this question.

CANDLER et al. v. ASHEVILLE ELECTRIC CO.

JUDGMENTS—DAMAGES FROM DAM—RES JUDICATA—PURCHASE OF EASEMENT—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.

1. Code, § 1859, provides that, when damages are recovered in an action for injuries from the building of a mill, and execution is returned unsatisfied, the judge shall order the dam or other cause of injury abated as a nuisance. An action to abate a dam and for damages to land caused by the ponding back of water was submitted to arbitrators to find whether plaintiffs were entitled to damages, and, if so, distinguishing in finding the same between those from permanent injuries and annual damages for five years from a certain date. The arbitrators assessed "the permanent damage of the plaintiffs to this date to their lands" at a certain sum, and also awarded a certain annual damage for each of the five years. Judgment was entered on the award, the judgment providing that the execution should be subject to the provisions of Code, § 1859, and for that purpose the cause was retained on the docket, etc. The judgment was paid in full by the successor in title of defendant. Held, that the judgment was not res judicata of plaintiff's right to recover damages after the termination of the five-year period for all except a fresh injury, since the judgment contemplated the removal of the dam at the end of the five years.

2. The payment of the judgment did not amount to the purchase by defendant's successor in title of an easement to pond back water on plaintiffs' land.

3. Nor did the award and judgment and the payment thereof amount to condemnation proceedings to secure plaintiffs' land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Hoke, Judge.

J. C. Martin, for appellant. F. A. Sondley, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was brought for the abatement of an alleged nuisance, viz., a dam maintained by the defendant company across a stream below the land of the feme plaintiff, and to recover damages for alleged injuries done to the land through the ponding of water on the same, caused by the dam. The defendant, in its answer, denied that any injury had been done to the land by means of the dam, and also pleaded as an estoppel the award and judgment made in a certain action between the present plaintiffs, who were also plaintiffs there, and the West Asheville Improvement Company and J. E. Rankin and J. E. Cutler, receivers of the West Asheville Improvement Company, defendants, made at the August term, 1898, of Buncombe superior court. In that action the plaintiffs brought suit against the West Asheville Improvement Company for the abatement of the same dam as a nuisance, and for the recovery of damages for injury to the same tract of land of the feme plaintiff, caused by the ponding of water on the land. The complaint in that action was filed at the December term, 1895, of Buncombe superior court, and after the charter of the West Asheville Improvement Company had been repealed by the General Assembly, and after Rankin and Cutler had been appointed receivers of the company. At the December term, 1897, of that court, by consent of all the parties, it was ordered that the issues arising upon the pleadings be submitted to the arbitrators and award of A. H. Felmont and Geo. S. Powell as arbitrators, who should, as such arbitrators, hear the cause, and examine into the matters therein involved, and determine the same; that they should find and award whether or not the plaintiffs, or either one of them, were entitled to any damages from the defendants, or any of them, and, if so, what damages, distinguishing in so doing between damages by reason of permanent injuries to the land described in the complaint, if any such they should find, and annual damages, if any such they should find, for the period of five years from and after the 1st day of September, 1893; and it was further ordered that the award of the arbitrators should be the rule of the court, and that judgment should be rendered thereon for said permauent damages and as under the milldam act for said annual damages for five years as aforesaid. At the August term, 1898, of the superior court the arbitrators reported an award in the following words: "(1) They assess the permanent damage of the plaintiffs to this date to their lands described and referred to in the complaint in this cause at the sum of $500, including interest. (2) They find and award that the plaintiffs have suffered an annual damage of $235.20 per annum, including interest, for five years beginning September 1, 1893; making a total damage for said period of five years on account of loss of crops on said lands the sum of $1,176. This makes the total damages assessed by us herein $1,676. And your arbitrators further award that said sums are to bear interest from the filing of this award until paid." And at the same term judgment was rendered upon the award for the sum of $1,676, the amount of the damages aforesaid so sustained by the plaintiffs as above set forth, with interest on the same at the rate of 6 per centum per annum from August 17, 1898, until paid, the said sum being the damages so sustained by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, the sum of $500 as permanent damages up to August 17, 1898, sustained by the plaintiffs to their lands described in the complaint in this action by reason of the matters therein complained of, and the additional sum of $1,176, the total of the annual damages sustained additional to said permanent damages by the plaintiffs to their said lands by reason of the matters so complained of during said five years commencing September 1, 1893, which said annual damages amount to the sum of $235.20 per year for every year of the said period of five years beginning September 1, 1893, and continuing until the expiration of five years. The judgment contained this further provision: "And it is further ordered and adjudged that execution issue upon this judgment, and this judgment shall be and is subject to the provisions of chapter 43 of the first volume of the Code of North Carolina, and in particular to the provisions of section 1859 of said Code of North Carolina, and for that purpose this cause is retained upon the docket for further proceedings, orders, judgments, and decrees, and the question of the abatement of the dam mentioned in the pleadings in this action as a nuisance and of injunction in regard thereto is accordingly hereby reserved until return of execution hereon to be determined upon the pleadings in this action, and the record herein, the admissions and allegations in them contained, the orders herein, said award, this judgment, and the matters determined or found, or both, by or in it, and upon such further evidence as may be hereinafter adduced and finding as may be hereafter in this action had, in accordance with the law and course of practice of this court, and consistent with them."

The judgment record in that case showed that the judgment was paid off in full on the 19th of September, 1898, by the Asheville Electric Company, the defendant in the present action. In the present action two issues were submitted to the jury by the court; the first one in these words: "Has there heretofore been an arbitration and award and satisfaction concerning the dam and injuries caused thereby between the parties to this action, and on what terms?" and the second was, "What is the entire damage, permanent and prospective, wrongfully done to plaintiffs' land by defendant's dam occurring since September, 1898, the dam to remain out or reduced to the height of original Shuford or Stephens dam?" The jury answered the first issue "Yes; and the terms are as shown in the record presented." And they answered the second issue, "Permanent $100, rental $600, total $700," and judgment was rendered accordingly against the defendant. The record referred to in the verdict of the jury was the record in the case of the plaintiffs against the West End Asheville Improvement Company and Rankin and Cutler, receivers, and which record we have referred to sufficiently already for the purposes of this opinion. That the second issue may be understood, it is necessary for us to state that the Shuford or Stephens dam was erected over 40 years ago on the same spot where stood the dam which was erected by the West End Improvement Company of Asheville in 1892, and which the defendant in this action maintained after August, 1898. The Stephens or Shuford dam was 14 feet high, and was used to store water for an ordinary country gristmill, and the dam maintained by the defendant and as it was erected by the West End Asheville Improvement Company was 80 feet high, used for the purposes of storing water to furnish an electric plant.

The defendant appealed from the judgment. Its main contention is that the award and judgment in the action which was commenced by the plaintiffs against the West End Asheville Improvement Company and Rankin and Cutler, receivers, were in meaning and effect an award and judgment for permanent damages—damages for past, present, and prospective injury—and equivalent to a purchase of the easement to pond water on the plaintiffs' land; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs are estopped from claiming damages of any nature against the defendant in this action because of the purchase by the defendant from Cutler and Rankin, receivers of the West End Asheville Improvement Company, of all the property of that company, including the dam and site of the mill. The other contention of the defendant is that, if the judgment in this action is not a complete bar to the plaintiffs' right of recovery, it is a bar to the recovery of all damages except such as were suffered by the plaintiffs on account of additional injuries or injurious to additional lands of the plaintiffs after September 1, 1898; or, to put it in other words, if there had been no increased injury to the plaintiffs' land after the award, the plaintiffs could recover nothing in this action, because the former award and judgment gave the right to the defendant, as purchaser from the receivers, to maintain the dam as it was at the time of the award without being liable to any further damages. In the trial below the court was of the opinion that neither of the defendant's contentions could be upheld. His honor instructed the jury, in substance, that the award and judgment did not amount to the purchase of the easement to pond the water, nor to a condemnation of the land; that the award having provided for all present and current damages to the land up to September 1, 1898, would preclude all damages to that date on the assumption that the defendant would then remove the dam or reduce it to the height of the old Stephens dam; and the true rule of damage was for the jury to assess all damages, past, present, and prospective, which had occurred since the 1st day of September, 1898, comparing the land not with the condition it was in originally, but with the condition it would have been in had the defendant taken out the dam, or reduced it to 14 feet, the height of the original Stephens dam.

The court further instructed the jury on the rule of damages applicable to the case as follows: "Award both permanent damage, if any occurred since September 1, 1898, permanent destruction of the land or injury to it causing loss of productive capacity, and also current damages, loss of rents and profits, if any, caused by any increase in area injuriously effected and by delay in reclaiming the land because dam was not lowered or removed on September 1, 1898. Language of issue is both present and prospective, and the jury will award damages if they find such, of both kinds, that may have accrued since September 1, 1898, or which will accrue from the dam or delay in taking it out." We find no error in the view which his honor took of the case, or in the instructions which he gave to the jury. It is clear from the language of the award and the judgment which followed thereon in the suit of the plaintiffs against the West End Asheville Improvement Company that "permanent damages," in the sense in which that term is used in Ridley v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 998, 24 S. E. 730, 32 L. R. A. 708, and in Parker v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 677, 25 S. E. 722, were not meant to be fixed or allowed in that action. In the two just above mentioned cases permanent damages meant such damages as were apparently to be continuous and prospective, because being permanent, and likely to continue indefinitely as the natural effect of that cause. But there is another kind of permanent damage referred to in Beach v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 498, 26 S. E. 703, as damage done by one act, or all at once, such as the destruction of forests or an orchard, or the demolition of a house; and such must have been the damages assessed as permanent under the arbitration referred to. Anyway it did not embrace permanent damages in the sense that those words were used in Ridley's and Parker's Cases, supra, because they were assessed not for prospective damages, but up to a specified period, to wit, the 1st of September, 1898. The assessment of the annual damages under the arbitration for the five years preceding the 1st of September, 1898, was, according to the award and judgment, to be treated as assessed under the milldam act (chapter 43 of the Code); and the damages sought to be recovered in the present action were therefore to be considered in connection with the condition of the land as it would have been in case the defendant had removed the dam at the time of the award, or reduced it to the height of the Stephens dam, according to the instructions of his honor. The defendant acquired no easement to pond the water on the plaintiffs' land under the award of 1898, and there was no purpose to condemn the land under that arbitration and award. It is not necessary, from the view we have taken of the case, to discuss the other questions raised by the appeal.

Affirmed.

INDIAN MOUNTAIN JELICO COAL CO.
v. ASHEVILLE ICE & COAL CO.

SALES—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—RECOVERY—BREACH—EFFECT—DAMAGES—TRIAL—ISSUES.

1. An answer in an action to recover for goods sold which admits that defendant promised to pay the sum sued for, "except as stated in its further defense and counterclaim," in which it admits that it has not paid the sum sued for, but denies that it is due, because it has been damaged in a greater sum (specifying it) by reason of plaintiff's breach of contract, a request by defendant to submit as issues to the jury the question whether he is indebted to plaintiff, and, if so, in what sum, and to assess defendant's damages on the counterclaim in excess of the amount due plaintiff, is satisfied by submitting the questions as to whether defendant is indebted to plaintiff, and in what sum, and what damage defendant is entitled to recover for plaintiff's breach.

2. A contract binding plaintiff to sell to defendant all the coal it may require during a specified period at a fixed price per ton, stipulating that shipments shall be promptly made when ordered, and that payments therefor are due in the next succeeding month, is not an entire, but a divisible, contract.

3. A recovery for coal delivered under a divisible contract, binding the seller to sell to the buyer all the coal it may require during a specified period, and providing for payment the month next succeeding the delivery, is not barred by a breach of contract on the seller's part occurring either before the month during which the coal sued for was delivered, and accepted and used by the buyer, or during such month.

causes beyond its control, cannot be construed so as to compel defendant to submit to a reduction of coal to which it is entitled by prorating with other patrons of plaintiff.

5. The rule that, when a seller fails to comply with his contract, the buyer is entitled to recover the difference between the contract and market price at the time of the breach, is subject to the qualification that the buyer must use reasonable diligence to mitigate the damages.

Clark, C. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by the Indian Mountain Jellico Coal Company against the Asheville Ice & Coal Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

This action was brought to recover the sum of $361.54, alleged by the plaintiff to be due from the defendant for coal sold and delivered to it in the months of February and March, 1899. The coal was delivered under a contract between the parties, of which the following is a copy: "Jellico, Tenn., Apr. 12, 1898. This agreement, entered into this day by and between Indian Mountain Jellico Coal Co., of Jellico, Tenn., and Asheville Ice & Coal Co., of Asheville, N. C., witnesseth: Party of the first part hereby agrees to sell party of the second part all the coal that may be required by said second party between this date and May 1, 1899, at the following price per ton of two thousand pounds f. o. b. mines. [Description of coal, with prices per ton.] Shipments to be made promptly when ordered unless prevented by strikes or other causes beyond the control of the party of the first part. It is further agreed that the party of the second part has the exclusive agency for the sale of Indian Mountain Coal in Asheville market. Payments due succeeding month's shipment from September 1, 1898. In consideration of the foregoing the party of the second part agrees to handle no first-class coal except such as it may purchase from the party of the first part." The plaintiff, in its complaint, alleged (1) that it had sold and delivered the coal under the contract; (2) that it was reasonably worth $361.54; and (3) that the defendant promised to pay that price for it. The defendant, in its answer, admits the truth of the first two allegations of the complaint, and also admits the third allegation, "except as stated in its further defense and counterclaim," in which it admits that it has not paid the said sum to the plaintiff, but denies that it is due and owing, because, as it avers, by reason of plaintiff's failure to comply with its part of the contract, the defendant has been damaged "in a sum far greater than the said sum of $361.54, to wit, in the sum of $1,000, and that the defendant does not now, nor did at the commencement of the action, owe the plaintiff any sum whatever because of the damage aforesaid, as the defendant is advised and believes." There was a denial of this counterclaim in the reply. The issues submitted, with the answers thereto, were as follows: "(1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff for coal sold and delivered, and in what sum? Ans. Yes; $361.54 and interest from March 31, 1899. (2) Did plaintiff and defendant enter into the contract set out and described in defendant's counterclaim? Ans. Yes; September 2, 1898. (3) Did the plaintiff wrongfully and in a breach of its contract fail or refuse to deliver defendant's coal as therein required? Ans. Yes. (4) What damage is defendant entitled to recover of plaintiff for such wrong and injury? Ans. $150." The other facts appear in the opinion. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Moore & Rollins and H. B. Lindsay, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). The defendant insisted that it was entitled to rely upon its counterclaim in bar of any recovery by the plaintiff, and that the issue should be, "Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what sum?" and also that there should be issues on the counterclaim as to the surplus. We do not think the defendant has pleaded the matters set forth in the counterclaim strictly in defense as a bar to the plaintiff's recovery, and the court so held. The counterclaim would, of course, have operated as a bar if the jury had found that defendant's damages for the breach of the contract by the plaintiff equaled or exceeded the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and in that event it would have been a bar in fact, though not in law; that is, it would not have been a bar within the technical meaning of that word. The court held at the outset, and "at the request of the defendant," as the court recalled, "and certainly without objection by the defendant to the ruling," that the burden of proof was on the defendant. If the defendant's present contention as to the proper issues and as to the state of the pleadings is correct, and the plaintiff was required to show performance of the contract on its part before it could recover, the burden was on the plaintiff, and not on the defendant, as ruled by the court. We understand from the record (and by that we must be governed) the defendant insisted at the trial that, upon the answer as drawn, the issues should be so framed as to require the jury, in response to the fourth issue, to assess the defendant's damages in excess of the amount due the plaintiff for the February and March deliveries. While the form of the answer did not entitle the defendant to such an issue, we think the issues as framed enabled the defendant, by a proper prayer for instructions, to present this view to the jury; and it is not required that issues should be submitted in any particular form, provided the parties have the opportunity of presenting their case fully to the jury upon the law and the evidence applicable thereto. Patterson v. Mills, 121 N. C. 258, 28 S. E. 368. We have been unable to perceive what legal or practical difference there is between assessing the full amount of damages under the fourth issue, as was done in this case, and confining the assessment to the excess of damages, or the difference between the plaintiff's claim and the full amount of the defendant's damages. The usual and the better practice is that which was adopted by the court, and, under the clear and explicit instructions to the jury, we do not see how they could possibly have been misled as to the true nature of the controversy. The plaintiff, as we will show hereafter, was entitled to recover the value of the coal sold and delivered to the defendant, or the price agreed to be paid therefor, which in this case is the same in amount; and the defendant was entitled to have assessed by the jury the full amount of the damages arising out of the breach of the contract by the plaintiff, if any; and the difference between these two amounts, whether in favor of the plaintiff or defendant, is, of course, the amount of the judgment to be rendered against the party recovering the smaller sum. There is no error in this ruling of the court.

It was contended in the argument before us, by the defendant's counsel, that, as the jury had found there was a breach of the contract by the plaintiff, its right to recover anything is wholly barred, and we were asked, "Can one who has wrongfully refused to do what he contracted to do, recover for a part performance?" Our answer to this question is that, under the circumstances of this case, he can. In the first place, this is not an entire contract. The shipments made in any one month were to be paid for in the next succeeding month, and the price per ton of the coal was fixed. It appears from the testimony that the breach of the contract, or the failure to make deliveries under it, upon orders from the defendant, occurred prior to February. Mr. Collins, who was the president and manager of the defendant company, and a witness for it, testified that "between September 20th to February and March" the defendant ordered, and the plaintiff failed to deliver, about 307 cars of coal. The case shows that it is not meant by this testimony that there was any failure to deliver in February and March, and, even if that had been the case, we do not think it would make any material difference, in the view we take of the law. It would be manifestly unjust, treating the contract as divisible, to permit the defendant to receive and use the coal delivered in February and March, and refuse to pay for it, merely because the plaintiff had failed to fill orders for any one or more of the preceding months; and especially so when the defendant, at the time he received the coal in February and March, well knew of the prior breaches. Tipton v. Feit- ner, 20 N. Y. 423; Ming v. Corbin, 142 N. Y. 334, 37 N. E. 105. We will go further, and declare the law to be that if the breach by the plaintiff had occurred in the same month when the coal, for the price of which this action is brought, was delivered, the defendant could not defeat a recovery by the plaintiff, provided he received the coal and had the full benefit of it. Where the agreements go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, the promises are dependent, and one of them is a condition precedent to the other, and full performance is required before there can be any recovery, as in the case of Lawing v. Rintles, 97 N. C. 350, 2 S. E. 252. But this rule does not apply if, for instance, work has not been done or materials furnished in strict accordance with the contract, provided one of the parties has received and enjoyed any benefit from the contract, and certainly not unless full performance is made a condition precedent to payment. The law implies a promise by the party to pay for what has been thus received, and allows him to recover any damages he has sustained by reason of the breach, for this is exact justice. The language of the court in Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 492, 26 Am. Dec. 718, seems to fit this case: "If, where a contract is made of such a character, a party actually receives labor or materials, and thereby derives a benefit and advantage over and above the damage which has resulted from the breach of the contract by the other party, the labor actually done and the value received furnish a new consideration, and the law thereupon raises a promise to pay to the extent of the reasonable worth of such excess. This may be considered as making a new case—one not within the original agreement—and the party is entitled to 'recover on his new case' for the work done, not as agreed, but yet accepted by the defendant." In McClay v. Hedge, 18 Iowa, 66, the court, by Dillon, J., referring to Britton v. Turner, says: "That celebrated case has been criticised, doubted, and denied to be sound, yet its principles have been gradually winning their way into professional and judicial favor. It is bottomed on justice and is right upon principle, however it may be upon the technical and more illiberal rules as found in the older cases." And the same court, in Wolf v. Gerr, 43 Iowa, 339, states it to be the settled doctrine "that a party who has failed to perform in full his contract may recover compensation for the part performed, less the damages occasioned by his failure." This principle is fully sanctioned by the authorities. Chamblee v. Baker, 95 N. C. 98; Simpson v. Railroad, 112 N. C. 701, 16 S. E. 853; Gorman v. Bellamy, 82 N. C. 496. In the case last cited this court said: "The inclination of the courts is to relax the stringent rules of the common law, which allows no recovery upon a special unperformed contract itself, nor for the value of the work done, because the special excludes an implied contract to pay. In such a case, if the party has derived any benefit from the labor done, it would be unjust to allow him to retain that without paying anything. The law therefore implies a promise to pay such remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth." The court also said in Brown v. Morris, 83 N. C., at page 257: "If there had been delivered a smaller number of bricks, and they had been received and used by the defendant without objection, we see no reason why the plaintiff would not be entitled to compensation for such as were delivered; and we are not disposed to carry the doctrine, that a partial delivery under an agreement to deliver a definite quantity or number of goods leaves the purchaser the possession and use of such as are delivered without liability to the seller, beyond the decided cases, and as operating only when the failure to deliver is willful and without legal excuse." Monroe v. Phelps, 8 Bl. & B. 739; Reade v. Rann, 10 B. & C. 438; Leonard v. Dyer, 26 Conn. 172, 68 Am. Dec. 382; Horn v. Batchelder, 41 N. H. 86; Bush v. Jones, 2 Tenn. Ch. 190; Duncan v. Baker, 21 Kan. 99; Lamb v. Brolaski, 38 Mo. App. 51; Myer v. Wheeler, 65 Iowa, 390, 21 N. W. 692; Hansen v. C. S. H. Co., 73 Iowa, 77, 34 N. W. 495; Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Coal Co., 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529. The doctrine is well stated and supported by the citation of numerous authorities in 9 Cyc. of Law & Pro. pp. 686, 687, note 15.

The defendant excepted to an instruction in regard to the date of the contract, but we cannot see how the date is material, as the parties, according to the very terms of the contract, agreed that shipments should be made from September 1, 1898, and this is the construction placed upon the contract by defendant in its first prayer for instructions.

The remaining exceptions relate to the judge's charge upon the counterclaim, and especially to the measure of damages. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was bound to supply it with coal, under the contract, unless prevented from doing so by strikes or other causes beyond the plaintiff's control, even though it had other customers at the time who had entered into similar contracts with the plaintiff, and that this is so because the defendant had shown by the testimony that the plaintiff had represented, when the contract with the defendant was made, that it had no other outstanding contract, and would make no other. It is sufficient to say in regard to this matter that it was fairly submitted to the jury, and found against the defendant, or the latter had at least the full benefit of the point under the charge of the court. But it becomes immaterial, in the view we take of the case, as will appear hereafter. The court charged the jury, substantially, that if the plaintiff failed to ship the coal to the defendant upon its orders, according to its agreement, and was not prevented from doing so by strikes or other causes beyond its control, and which it could not have avoided by the exercise of ordinary care, it would be liable to the defendant for such damages as the latter sustained by reason of the breach, and that if at the time the plaintiff had other customers similarly situated with the defendant in respect to contracts with the plaintiff of the same character, and the plaintiff, by reason of causes beyond its control, could not fully supply all, the latter had the right, and it was its duty, under the law, to apportion its shipments pro rata among its said customers, provided it did so in good faith and with perfect fairness to each, and provided it had not represented that there were no contracts other than the defendant's, and had not agreed that it would make no other contract. If, in fact, there were no other contracts, then this instruction would not apply, and plaintiff would be liable in damages, unless the jury found, under the charge of the court, that the plaintiff was protected by the clause of dispensation in regard to strikes and other causes beyond the plaintiff's control. The plaintiff says that this instruction is sustained by the cases in which it has been held that a railroad company should not discriminate against any of its customers in the transportation of freight. It is true, it has been held that it is no proper business of a railroad company, as a common carrier, to foster particular enterprises or to build up new industries, but deriving, as it does, its franchises from the Legislature, and depending upon the will of the people for its very existence, it is bound to deal fairly with the public, and to provide reasonable facilities for transportation of persons and property, and in this respect to put all its patrons upon an absolute equality. Railroad v. Goodridge, 149 U. S. 680, 13 Sup. Ct. 970, 37 L. Ed. 986; U. S. v. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 109 Fed. 831. In the latter case it is held that, while the capacity of a shipper of coal may be greater than his allotment of cars, yet, when such is also the case with every other operator, similarly situated, in the coal fields, it is the duty of the railroad company, when the supply of coal cars is short, to prorate the supply on hand, without unjust discrimination, among all the operators, including the shipper in question. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1468 et seq.; Root v. Railroad, 114 N. Y. 300, 21 N. E. 403, 4 L. R. A. 331, 11 Am. St. Rep. 643. But those cases were decided under the provisions of the interstate commerce act and upon the principles of the common law forbidding discrimination, and the doctrine is confined to cases where the party from whom the particular duty is owing is a common carrier, or is operating under a public franchise which imposes upon it certain obligations and responsibilities with respect to the public and to those who deal with it in its capacity as a quasi public corporation. We are unable to see that they have any application to the facts of this case, nor did the learned counsel refer us to any authority for the principle upon which the court directed the jury to assess the defendant's damages, nor have we been able to find any. The question, therefore, must be decided according to the ordinary rule in the law of contracts. It is a well-settled principle of law that if a party, by his contract, charges himself with an obligation possible to be performed, he must make it good, unless its performance is rendered impossible by the act of God, the law, or the other party. Unforeseen difficulties, however great, will not excuse him. The law regards the sanctity of contracts, and requires parties to do what they have agreed to do. If unexpected impediments lie in the way, and a loss must ensue, it leaves the loss where the contract places it. If the parties have no provision for a dispensation, the rule of law gives none. It does not allow a contract fairly made to be annulled, and it does not permit to be interpolated what the parties have not stipulated. Ingle v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. Ed. 762. The courts will not make an agreement for the parties, but will ascertain what they have agreed by what they have said, and by the meaning of the words used to express their intention. Where the intention clearly appears from the words used, there is no need to go further, for in such a case the words must govern, or, as it is sometimes said, where there is no doubt there is no room for construction. Clark on Contracts, p. 591. We must assume that the parties have fully and clearly expressed their agreement in the instrument which is the evidence of it, and to add to or take from it by construction would, under the circumstances, be the same as if we should arbitrarily give to it a meaning they did not intend it should have. We must therefore ascertain and enforce their intention as they have expressed it. "Where parties have entered into written engagements with express stipulations, it is manifestly not desirable to extend them by implications. The presumption is that, having expressed some, they have expressed all the conditions by which they intend to be bound under that instrument." Broom's Legal Maxims (8th Am. Ed.) p. *652; Bishop on Contracts (Ed. 1887) §§ 380, 381; 2 Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) p. *515. In Aspdin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. p. 683 (18 L. J. 155), Lord Denman says: "It is one thing for the court to effect the intention of parties to the extent to which they may have even imperfectly expressed themselves, and another thing to add to an instrument all such covenants as on a full consideration may seem to the court to have been the complete intention of the parties, but which they either purposely or by inattention omitted. It would be but a bad application of the rule of construction of written instruments to add to the obligation by which the parties have bound themselves. This would be quite unauthorized, as well as liable to create particular injustice in the application." By the contract in question, the plaintiff was bound to sell and deliver to the defendant all the coal that should be required by the latter between the dates mentioned in the writing. Nothing else appearing, this was an absolute promise on the part of the plaintiff, based upon a sufficient consideration, to furnish the coal; and nothing, as we have already seen, would excuse its performance, except the act of God, the law, or the act or conduct of the defendant. But there was one, and only one, limitation upon this otherwise absolute undertaking; and that limitation is found in the clause of dispensation, as it may be called, which exempted the plaintiff from liability for non-performance if by strikes or other uncontrolled causes it should become unable to comply with its contract. This being the case, what right have we to add a further clause of exemption, and provide that the plaintiff should not only be excused from full performance by strikes and other causes beyond its control, but that the defendant should be required to submit to a reduction of the quantity of coal to which it was entitled under the contract, by prorating with other patrons of the plaintiff company, when there is no such stipulation in the contract, and nothing from which it can be clearly inferred that the parties intended such a settlement under it. If the defendant's rights can be impaired by the fact that the plaintiff has entered into other contracts of the same kind, why could they not as well be affected by any other contractual relation the plaintiff may have assumed? The plaintiff's contract was not, as to its customers, a joint one, but must be treated and dealt with as several; and the rights of each customer are to be determined solely with reference to the contract made with him, and it was the duty of the plaintiff to take care that it did not go beyond its ability to perform, and to provide against any and all contingencies in the contract itself. We cannot release the plaintiff from any part of its liability because it has failed to do so in this case, but must leave the loss where the contract places it. To do otherwise would be to make the contract, and not to construe it.

We are not permitted to interpret a contract according to our notion of what may be fair and just, unless, perhaps, in a case where the terms of the contract are in themselves ambiguous. In this case they are not so. The contract is plainly one to furnish a stipulated quantity of coal at a fixed price, without any reference to other contracts made or to be made by the plaintiff, and subject only, in the ultimate settlement between the parties under its provisions, to any failure by the plaintiff to perform its undertaking which it could show to be the result of the causes beyond its control specified in the contract. It was not the duty of the defendant to protect itself against other contracts made by the plaintiff, but it was the latter's duty to make suitable provision in the contract for his own protection in respect to them. If the rule laid down by the court below is adopted, any reduction in the quantity of coal to be delivered under the contract will be made to depend, not upon causes beyond the control of the plaintiff, but upon causes of his own creation. The reduction will be in proportion to the number of contracts that its interest or cupidity might lead it to make. When the question is properly considered, there is no more reason for applying the pro rata rule in a case where the coal dealer is protected by a clause of exemption against any failure which results from causes beyond his control, than there would be for enforcing it when there is no such clause of exemption in the contract. We must remember that a contract is to be construed according to the intention of the parties as expressed in it, upon the principle that every one of age and discretion, and qualified to do so, can make any contract he pleases, and we have no right to give the contract a meaning based upon any idea or consideration of abstract justice. When there is no allegation of fraud or undue influence, or of any other circumstance which can form the basis of an equity for setting aside the contract, we must assume that the parties understood what was fair and right when they entered into it, and were fully mindful of its obligations. If the capacity of the plaintiff's mine was so reduced "by causes beyond its control" that it could not furnish the quantity of coal agreed to be furnished, it was entitled to the benefit of the clause of exemption; but if, by reason of our construction, which we think is in accordance with the plain words of its agreement, it suffers any loss, or will be made to respond in damages to this defendant or any of its other customers, it will be the result of its own folly in making a contract which, as it turns out, cannot be performed. This does not present an unusual case in the enforcement of contracts. It is a mistake to suppose that, by construing the contract according to the ordinary and well-settled rules, the clause of exemption will be rendered nugatory. It may not have the meaning or effect that the plaintiff now thinks it ought to have, but it will have full operation in accordance with the intention as expressed in it, and that intention must be our only guide in ascertaining the rights and liabilities of the parties.

We have discovered no error in the other instructions given by the court to the jury. We do not think that the plaintiff was required, under the circumstances, to buy any coal from other miners, in order to fill the contract which was made with reference to its own mine in Jellico; that is, in so far as the plaintiff was prevented from delivering upon orders by causes beyond its control.

The ordinary rule as to damages undoubtedly is that, when a vendor fails to comply with his contract, the vendee is entitled to recover the difference between the contract and market price at the time of the breach. Spiers v. Halsted, 74 N. C. 620; Holmesley v. Elias, 75 N. C. 564; Oldham v. Kerchner, 79 N. C. 106, 28 Am. Rep. 302; McHose v. Fulmer, 73 Pa. 365; 8 Ad. & El. 604; Gravel Tower Co. v. Phillips, 23 Wall. 471, 23 L. Ed. 71. But the general rule is subject to the qualification that a party to a contract is required to use reasonable diligence to mitigate the damages caused by the breach, and in contracts of this kind the vendee should provide himself as cheaply as he conveniently can, from the most accessible sources, and thus lighten the loss, and his recovery will be curtailed by the sum which thus might have been saved. Oldham v. Kerchner, supra; C. C. L. Ice Co. v. Tamm, 90 Mo. App. 189; Warren v. Stoddart, 105 U. S. 224, 26 L. Ed. 1117. It is true that the injured party is to be placed, as near as may be, in the situation he would have occupied if the wrong or breach had not been committed, and that when a wrong has been done, and the law gives a remedy, the compensation should be equal to the injury; but this is only another way of stating the same rule of damages, and it is therefore subject to the same qualification. Wicker v. Hoppock, 6 Wall. 94, 18 L. Ed. 752; Hazzard-Short v. Hardison, 114 N. C. 482, 19 S. E. 232; 1 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 89. There must, of course, be evidence to which the rule can be applied.

While it is not necessary to consider the other exceptions, we have examined them, and think that they are without merit.

The error in the charge of the court above indicated entitles the defendant to a new trial, but it will be restricted to the fourth issue. New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting as to measure of damages). The contract provides for an exemption from liability for failure of the plaintiff to ship if "prevented by strikes or other causes beyond the control" of the plaintiff. The judge charged, in substance, that if the plaintiff had contracts with the defendant and others of like purport, covering the same period of time, and there was no contract with the defendant that such contracts should not be made with others, then, if there was a failure to ship to the defendant the quantity required, the plaintiff would be liable only to the extent that it was not prevented from shipping by such strikes or other causes beyond its control; i. e. that the defendant in such case could only claim loss on its pro rata part of what the plaintiff was permitted by the "strike or other causes beyond its control" to mine and ship. This instruction was eminently fair and just. The defendant knew that the plaintiff was not running its mine solely to fill the defendant's contract, and that the plaintiff had insisted on protecting itself by a provision in the contract for exemption from liability for failure to ship when caused by "strikes or other causes beyond its control." If the defendant wished to get the coal anyhow, if mined, it should have stipulated that its contract should be filled, regardless of the plaintiff's contract obligation to others. It is quite certain that the plaintiff would not have made such contract with the defendant. Suppose, for argument's sake, the plaintiff was prevented "by strikes or other causes beyond its control" from shipping one-half the quantity stipulated by its several contracts, then, clearly, its duty to each of its contractees was to ship them one-half the quantity contracted for. The failure to ship any one such half would not be caused by "the strike or other causes beyond the plaintiff's control," but by the plaintiff's own volition in preferring other contractees; and the plaintiff would be liable to each for its shortage in not shipping the one-half, which upon a pro rata it could have shipped. If the plaintiff should have shipped the full quantity to the defendant, and is liable for the difference, then the plaintiff should have shipped the full quantity to every other one of its contractees, and is liable for failure to do so; and the provision in its contracts for exemption from liability for any failure to ship, "caused by strikes or other causes beyond its control," would be a nullity, and the plaintiff would be liable, just as if that important provision had been left out. No one or more contractees can be selected to bear the total failure to ship. If so, why should it not be the defendant, who in that event would recover nothing? Knowing that the mine owners were not shipping exclusively to itself, the defendant, by agreeing to the usual clause of exemption from liability for failure to ship, caused by "strikes or other causes beyond the shipper's control," must have understood that it had no right to complain if the plaintiff abated the contract quantity pro rata according to the quantity it was prevented from shipping by such strikes or other causes beyond its control. This is the ruling always made as to shipments by common carriers, which is justified upon the above reason, arising out of the contract, as well as upon public policy, which forbids discrimination by quasi public corporations. This is not the case of an unqualified agreement to ship a certain quantity of coal, but there is an agreement for an exemption if prevented by certain causes, and the defendant should bear its pro rata part of the failure to ship caused by the happening of such stipulated contingency.

No precedent either way has been presented to us, but this is a reasonable and just construction of the clause in the contract, which otherwise is nugatory as a protection to the shipper for whose benefit it was inserted. It happens, it would seem, that this court is the first to construe such contract, and there is every reason we should make a just and proper construction.

GWALTNEY et ux. v. PROVIDENT SAV. LIFE ASSUR. SOC.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1904.)

On petition for rehearing. Petition dismissed.

For former opinion, see 44 S. E. 659.

CLARK, C. J. This is a petition to rehear the former decision in this case. 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659. The same propositions of law as now were presented and argued on the former hearing. No material point of law or fact has been shown to have been overlooked, and our opinion would be simply a reiteration, substantially, of what was written on the former hearing. Whatever difference of view there may be as to the facts, the jury, in their province, have determined the truth or falsity of the averment on both sides, and we cannot disturb their finding. The case had been previously before this court (130 N. C. 629, 41 S. E. 795), and has been heretofore fully considered.

It is now ordered: Petition dismissed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). The defendant company canceled the plaintiff's policy of insurance because of a refusal on the part of the plaintiff to pay premiums which the defendant averred that the plaintiff owed, and this action was brought to recover the amount paid by the plaintiff as premiums before the cancellation of the policy. The complaint embraces two causes of action utterly antagonistic to each other, and, in my opinion, cannot be properly joined in the same action. The gravamen of the first cause of action is that the defendant, through one of its general agents, by means of false representations, induced the plaintiff to accept a policy of insurance unlike the one which the defendant, through its agent, verbally agreed to issue and deliver to him.

The particulars of the first cause of action appear substantially in the following allegations: That the plaintiff told the agent that he desired a policy, and would accept none other, based upon a level premium from year to year, and which would not increase with advancing age; that the agent promised to deliver to the plaintiff such a policy, and that upon that representation the plaintiff made application in writing for the policy; that shortly thereafter the agent delivered to the plaintiff a policy in accordance with the application, which did not provide for the payment of a level rate pre-mum until the death of the plaintiff, but did provide for an increase in the rate of the premiums due on the policy with the yearly advance in the plaintiff's age; that the agent (in the language of the complaint) represented to the plaintiff and assured him that the policy so presented was such a policy as the plaintiff had, in his former conversation, stated that he (plaintiff) would accept, and that the policy so presented by him provided for the rate of a level rate premium, to wit, $22.40 per quarter, and that the insurance provided in said policy would be extended during the life of the plaintiff upon the payment of a regular premium of $22.41 per quarter. There was another allegation that those representations were false, and that the agent knew they were false. As bearing more particularly upon the alleged fraudulent intent of the agent, we quote the eighth and ninth allegations of the first cause of action: "(8) That Jones, the general agent of defendant, made the said false, deceitful, and fraudulent representation wickedly and fraudulently, scheming and contriving, designing and intending, as plaintiff believes and alleges, to prevent the plaintiff from examining the policy and investigating the terms thereof, he (the said general agent), well knowing that the plaintiff would refuse to accept the policy if he (plaintiff) should learn its terms, conditions, stipulations, and provisions; and the plaintiff explicitly alleges that he would have refused finally and peremptorily to accept the policy if he (plaintiff) had known the terms, conditions, stipulations, and provisions of the policy tendered him by Jones, the general agent as aforesaid. (9) That the plaintiff, knowing said Jones to be the general agent of the defendant, being not at all familiar with the terms, conditions, stipulations, provisions, or language of insurance policies, and being totally unskilled in interpreting the same, relied upon and believed the said wicked, false, deceitful, and fraudulent representations of the said Jones, hereinafter set forth, and was by the said wicked, false, deceitful, and fraudulent representations misled, deceived, and prevented from investigating the terms, conditions, stipulations, and provisions of the said policy, and finding out for himself and by the aid of friends or counsel what said terms, conditions, stipulations, and provisions really were, and in consequence thereof accepted the said policy." The plaintiff further alleges that, believing for nine years these fraudulent representations, he paid during that time $22.41 per quarter, and that only at the beginning of the tenth year was any demand made for an increased premium; that for two years he paid the increased premium, but refused after that time to pay any further increase. The plaintiff has paid $1,030.84 as premiums to the defendant. The second cause of action has its foundation in an allegation that the plaintiff took out the policy just as it read when delivered to him by the agent; that is, a policy providing for an increase in the rate of the premium due on the policy with the yearly advance in the plaintiff's age; but that before the second annual premium in quarterly equivalents became due, to wit, in December, 1890, the defendant, through its general agent, verbally agreed to renew and extend said policy for the plaintiff during each successive year of his life, upon the payment of a level annual premium in quarterly equivalents of $22.41 each, and to waive the conditions of said policy providing for an increase of the rate of premium for the actual age attained. The complaint was duly verified by the plaintiff.

A few words will be sufficient to dispose of the matters pertaining to the second cause of action. His honor submitted this issue (seventh) raised by the second cause of action in the complaint: "Did the defendant, through its general agent, some time after the execution and delivery of the policy, waive the provisions in the policy permitting an increase of the premiums, and agree to continue the policy upon payment of $22.41 per quarter during the life of the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint?" Upon that issue his honor told the jury that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to go further, and establish the affirmative of the same to their satisfaction by proof clear, strong, and convincing. The jury responded to that issue under that instruction "Yes." I have examined carefully every word of the evidence bearing on that issue, and there is not a scintilla, even, to support it. The allegation in the second cause of action is that the agent, in December, 1890, waived the conditions of the policy providing for an increase of the rate of premium for the actual age attained, and agreed that he (plaintiff) should pay $22.41 quarterly as a level rate until his death, instead of increased premiums as he advanced in age, as the policy provided. In his examination in chief he testified that: "Jones came to Wake Forest in November, I think, and stayed several days, and insured several parties. After he returned to Greensboro, I had a conversation with a Mr. Powell, in consequence of which I told Jones that Mr. Powell told me that he had examined a policy like mine at my request, and he said there was some doubt as to its running level in all the premiums till my death. I told him that Mr. Powell said he was not satisfied, as he had not examined it carefully, and there might be a rising premium in it. I said I told Powell that there was no possibility that there was a rising premium on it, for I had been assured there would be none. I said: 'Now, Mr. Jones, my people live to be very old. Suppose I live beyond 75. Is there any possibility of a rise in that premium?' He told me emphatically that I need give myself no uneasiness. I went back home thoroughly satisfied that it never would rise on me.

Q. Did he say anything more that you recollect? A. I thoroughly impressed upon him the fact. I went away assured." On his cross-examination he was asked: "I believe you stated that you never examined this policy, and never knew that it was not a level rate policy, till 1898, when they made a demand on you? A. That is right. Q. You allege here that heretofore in the second year you knew it was a level rate policy? A. Exactly as it was issued. Q. But that this company, acting through its general agent, made a verbal agreement with you to extend this policy? A. I thought that was the policy. Q. What you say in this complaint is correct, is it not? A. It is, as I understand it. Q. You have sworn to the complaint, have you not? A. Yes. Q. Did you not say in your answer a while ago that about November, 1890, you had a conversation with Jones, and he said you need not be uneasy about your policy? A. Yes. In 1890 he came to where I was living, and in consequence of Powell's statement I went there again in January. He came in November to the college, and went back before Christmas. Q. Then the only conversation you had with Jones some time in the second year caused him, in reply to something you said, to say that you need not give yourself any uneasiness about the policy? A. Yes. Q. So that, if this allegation means that you knew what the policy was at the end of the second year, it is a mistake, is it not? A. I did not come to that knowledge, I am sure, at the end of the second year, that it was not a level rate." The defendant denied the allegations of fraud, and averred that the plaintiff received a policy of the nature applied for, and in accordance with the application signed by the plaintiff; that all verbal understandings or negotiations entered into between the plaintiff and Jones during the consultation about the policy were merged in the written policy when it was issued by the company and delivered; that no attempt was made by the agent to prevent the plaintiff from reading the policy when it was delivered, and that the plaintiff should have read it, and, if he had read it, he would have understood from reading it that it did not provide for a level rate; that the plaintiff kept the policy for years without reading it; that he knew that the agent did not issue the policy, but that the same was issued in New York, the home office of the company, and sent to the agent at Greensboro for delivery to the plaintiff; and that the agent had no power to change the terms of the policy; and that the plaintiff is estopped by his conduct from rescinding the contract and demanding a return of the fees. The defendant denied also that the agent, Jones, was a general agent of the defendant.

It is to be seen from a reading of the complaint that the fraud charged upon the agent is in reference to the assurances and representations made by him at the time of the delivery of the policy. Allegations 8 and 9 of the complaint on that point have been quoted in this opinion, and sections 6 and 7 of the complaint specifically refer to the fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by the agent as confined to the delivery of the policy. Nowhere in the complaint is it alleged that the agent practiced any fraud upon the plaintiff in the procuring of his signature to the application. The allegation of the fraud practiced upon the plaintiff by the agent, to which we have already called attention, was that the agent "represented to the plaintiff and assured him that the policy so presented was such a policy as the plaintiff had, in his former conversation, stated that he (plaintiff) would accept, and that the said policy so presented by Jones provided for the rate of a level rate premium, to wit, $22.41 per quarter, and that the insurance provided in said policy would be extended during the life of the plaintiff upon the payment of a regular premium of $22.41 per quarter." The evidence did not measure up to the allegation. The plaintiff testified that when the agent delivered the policy to him, he said, "Here is your policy," or "This is your policy," and nothing more. It was not contested that the policy was strictly in accordance with the application; that the application was not for a level rate policy, but called for one upon the annual renewal term plan, with surplus applied to keeping premiums level; that attached to and forming a part of the policy was a schedule of rates showing exact premiums to be paid with advancing age, and also providing that the surplus was to be applied to keeping premiums level; and that the defendant issued the policy and sent it to Jones to be delivered by him to the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that he neither read the application at the time he signed it nor did he read the policy and copy of the application attached thereto until about nine years after the issuance of the policy, although it was in his possession all that time; and that no one attempted to prevent him from reading the policy or application, and he could have read and understood the contract as to increasing premiums if he had examined it. Witness further stated that he knew nothing about the insurance business, and relied entirely upon the agent in the matter; that he had great faith in him. He was asked on cross-examination: "The clause in that policy about the several premiums for each successive year or each year that you should live is perfectly plain, is it not?" His answer was, "Yes, I suppose it is plain enough, if I had not had the confidence that blinded me." And further he was asked: "There is a schedule of rates in the policy setting forth the amount for each year. If you had read that policy, you could have understood it, could you not?" He answered, "Yes." There is no evidence whatever in the case that the plaintiff asked a single question of the agent about the policy at the time of its delivery, nor did the agent express any opinion or make any assurance or representation about it. In my opinion, the plaintiff should have read the policy under the circumstances of its delivery. The agent, Jones, was the agent of the defendant, and did not occupy any relation of trust or confidence as to the plaintiff. They were engaged in a business transaction, in which the plaintiff was acting for himself and the agent for the defendant. It appears from all the evidence that the plaintiff had ample opportunity to read the policy before he paid the first premium, for he gave his note for that premium, payable more than a month after the policy was delivered; and there is no evidence that the defendant at any time afterwards did anything to induce him not to read it, and if he did not read it he can blame himself alone. There is not a particle of evidence of fraud at the time of the delivery of the policy or afterwards, and the contention of the plaintiff that his implicit and blind confidence in the agent warranted him in trusting that the policy was what he had verbally and previously contracted for is met by the safe and general rule that, where there is no fraud, parol negotiations leading up to a written contract are merged in the subsequent written contract; such written contract being presumed to embrace the whole, the final agreement of the parties, and to embody their intentions. When, therefore, one of the parties to an agreement delivers to the other a contract in writing, and that other party, when he receives the paper, understands that it is handed to him as a contract between them, then the one accepting the document and keeping it assents to its terms, conditions, and stipulations as they are therein expressed, although he does not read it, and even be ignorant of the contents. This view of the law is well expressed in the case of this same defendant against Mowatt, 32 Canada Supreme Court Report, 147, in a quotation from Parker v. Railroad, 2 C. P. D. 416. It was there said that when the company handeth the respondent the policy, the law said for them: "Read, examine, be careful, for never mind what we or you may have said previously, we accept your application to insure you, but we cannot give you any other policy but this one, and in that document alone is contained the contract between us. Pay the first premium only if you are satisfied with it. If you accept it without reading it, you will not be allowed to contend hereafter that it does not correctly express the contract between us. Whatever is not found therein will be understood to have been reciprocally waived and abandoned." The contract was formed between the plaintiff only when the policy was delivered. All that had gone before was only preliminary. In Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. Ed. 203, it was said: "That the defendant did not read the charter and by-laws, if such were the fact, was his own fault. It will not do for a man to enter into a contract, and, when called upon to respond to its obligations, to say that he did not read it when he signed it. If this were permitted, contracts would not be worth the paper on which they are written. But such is not the law. A contractor must stand by the words of his contract, and if he will not read what he signs he alone is responsible for his omission." In Re Greenfield's Estate, 14 Pa. 489, Gibson, C. J., for the court, said: "If a party who can read will not read a deed put before him for execution, he is guilty of supine negligence, which, I take it, is not the subject for protection either in equity or in law." In Dellinger v. Gillespie, 118 N. C. 737, 24 S. E. 538, the plaintiff handed the defendant a written contract, making no attempt to conceal any of its provisions, and practiced no trick to induce him to execute it. This court there said: "It is plain that no deceit was practiced here. It was pure negligence in the defendant not to have read the contract. There it was before him, and there was no trick or device resorted to by the plaintiff to keep him from reading it." The defendant's negligence was held inexcusable, and the court said that the introduction of parol evidence in the court below to show that there was a verbal contract before the execution of the written one was erroneous, and that it was nothing but an attempt to contradict the written instrument executed by the defendant concerning the same matter. The same principle was held in Benedict v. Jones, 129 N. C. 470, 40 S. E. 221, where a married woman undertook to avoid the legal sufficiency of the probate of a deed executed by herself and her husband, because she did not read it, and was ignorant of its contents. The court said there that "it makes no difference that she said she did not know what the paper contained, that she did not understand its contents, and, if she had, she would not have signed it. She could read and write. The paper was before her, and she was under no coercion." The same view is also expressed in Dorsett v. Mfg. Co., 131 N. C. 254, 42 S. E. 612: "And that where a party can read, and has the opportunity and does not do so, no other circumstances occurring or connected therewith, the party signing cannot have the instrument set aside upon the ground that he was deceived as to its contents." In Leigh v. Brown (Ga.) 25 S. E. 621, it was held that it was the duty of the insured, when he found that his policy differed in a material respect from the kind of policy for which he had contracted, if he did not desire to retain and accept the policy received by him, to return or offer to return the same within a reasonable time to the company. The case of Bostwick v. M. Life Ins. Co. (Wis.) 92 N. W. 246, is a most interesting case, and the main facts very much like the one before us. The defendant there induced the plaintiff to sign an application for a policy of life insurance by representing to him that he called for one that would be fully paid in ten annual payments of a specified amount. He signed and gave to the agent the application, relying on the truth of such representations. During the negotiations between the plaintiff and the agent of the company, with the result above stated, the agent urged the plaintiff to take out what was called a "five per cent. debenture policy," while the plaintiff all the time insisted that he wanted and would purchase only a contract that would be fully performed on his part by ten annual payments. In good time a policy was sent to the plaintiff by mail, ostensibly responsive to his application, accompanied by a letter from the agent to the effect that it was a 5 per cent. debenture policy issued pursuant to the application. The plaintiff put the policy away among his papers without reading it, relying upon its being what the agent assured him the application called for. He paid the first premium, but upon examining the policy about 4½ months after it was delivered to him, he discovered that it was an annual life policy, requiring him to pay the premiums each year during his life. The same plaintiff bought a policy from one Parker and one from A. H. Barrington, issued by the same company in which the insured claimed that he had contracted with the agent for a different policy from the ones they received. However, when the policies were delivered to them, there was no assurance that the policies were in accordance with the understanding between them, but simply a letter advising inclosure of policies. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover on the assigned policies, for the reason that there was no evidence of any assurance on the part of the agent, at the time of the delivery of the policies to the parties, that the policies were in accordance with the agreement. But because the plaintiff, Bostwick, was assured by the letter from the agent accompanying the delivery of the policy that the policy was in accordance with the agreement, the court held that his claim on his own policy should be submitted to the jury to say whether, under all the circumstances, the letter of the agent prevented him from examining the policy at the time of the delivery. In the case before us there were no representations made by the agent when the policy was delivered, and no questions asked by the plaintiff. The agent simply said, "Here is your policy," or, "This is your policy," which was just the same thing as if it had been inclosed with a letter. In the much litigated case of McMaster v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 99 Fed. 856, 40 C. C. A. 119, the fact was that the agent of an insurance company had told the insured, when the application for the policy was made, that the policy itself would give him 13 months' insurance upon the payment of the first annual premium, but the policy, when afterwards issued by the company, did not contain that provision. Upon an action to reform the policy so as to make it conform to the agreement with the agent, it was proved that the insured had accepted it without reading it. The court there said: "Customary negotiations for insurance do not constitute a contract where there is no intention to contract otherwise than by a policy made and delivered upon payment of the first premium. * * * It was his duty to read and know the contents of the policies when he accepted them. It is true that the evidence is that he did not read them, but the legal effect of his acceptance is the same as if he had read them. He had the opportunity to read, and to learn their contents, and, if he did not, it was his own gross negligence, and no act of the insurance company or of its agent that concealed them, and misled him as to their effect. The statement of the agent, 14 days before the deceased received the policies, that they would insure him for 13 months from the payment of the first premium, was not a statement of an existing fact. It was not calculated to impose upon him, or to prevent him from reading his policies, and learning for himself whether this promise had been kept or broken. It was not a fraudulent representation, because fraud never can be predicated of a promise or a prophecy. Neither the company nor its agent therefore made any representation or promise, or used any artifice or deceit, to prevent the insured from learning the terms of his policies. Their contents were not concealed. They were not misrepresented. The deceased must accordingly be conclusively presumed to have known their terms when he accepted them. If one can read his contract, his failure to do so is such gross negligence that it conclusively estops him from denying knowledge of its contents, unless he was dissuaded from reading it by some trick, artifice, or fraud of the other party to the agreement." That case was afterwards reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States (183 U. S. 25, 22 Sup. Ct. 10, 48 L. Ed. 64), and the result of that decision was that the plaintiffs were allowed to recover. The principle of law, however, announced by the Circuit Court, which we have quoted, was not overruled.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in Mowatt's Case, supra, referred to the case of McMaster v. N. Y. Life, supra, as it was reported both in the Federal Reporter and in the United States Reports, and in reference to the effect of the opinion of the Supreme Court upon that of the Circuit Court his honor who wrote the opinion of the court said: "Since the argument I have noticed that the United States Supreme Court has reversed the decision of McMaster's Case. But the court exclusively based its conclusions first upon the fact that the agent of the company had inserted material words in the application after it had been signed, without the applicant's knowledge; secondly, upon the fact that the agent of the company, when delivering the policy, had deliberately put the insured off his guard, and induced him not to read it, by the express assertion in answer to the insured that the policy was in the terms agreed upon. Had it not been for these two facts, to which sufficient weight had not been given in the lower courts, their judgment against the plaintiff's contentions, as I read Chief Justice Fuller's opinion, would have been sustained by the Supreme Court." In Bostwick's Case the Supreme Court of Wisconsin took the same view of the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in McMaster's Case. That court, referring to that matter, said: "Returning to McMaster's Case, we will say and endeavor to demonstrate that counsel is in error in his view that the Supreme Court, in reversing the decision of the Court of Appeals, 99 Fed. 856, 40 C. C. A. 119, held that possession of a policy of insurance does not impute knowledge of its contents, in the absence of any deception practiced upon the possessor subsequent to his making the application therefor, reasonably calculated to deter him from examining such policy at the time of its receipt. The court, as it seems to us, held directly to the contrary." These analyses, in our judgment, are correct expositions of the decisions of the two courts, the United States Supreme Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals. From the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States we will make the following quotations in verification of these analyses: "But the company says that McMaster requested that the policy should go into effect on December 12, 1893, and that his representative is estopped from denying that that is the operation of the policies as framed and accepted, or that the second premiums matured December 12, 1894. It was found from the evidence that, after McMaster had signed the applications, and without his knowledge or consent, the agent of the company inserted therein, 'Please date policy same as application,' and it was further found that the policies were returned to Sioux City, and were taken by the company's agent to McMaster, he 'asking agent if the policies were as represented, and if they would insure him for the period of thirteen months, to which the agent replied that they did so insure him,' and thereupon McMaster paid the agent the full annual premium, of the sum of $21, on each policy, and without reading the policies he received them, and placed them away. We think the evidence of this unauthorized insertion and of what passed between the agent and McMaster when the policies were delivered, taken together, was admissible on the question whether McMaster was bound by the provision that subsequent payments should be made on December 12th, commencing with December 12, 1894, because requested by him, or because of negligence on his part in not reading the policies." So we see that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in its reversal of the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, did so solely on the ground that the assurance and representations made by the agent to McMaster, when he delivered the policies, rendered the question whether keeping them, as he did, without reading them and rejecting them, constituted an acceptance in satisfaction of what was bargained for, one of fact for the jury. The general principles of law decided in both courts were, as we have set them forth in this opinion, approved; but in the Supreme Court it was held that the false representations made at the time of the delivery of the policies had a tendency to throw McMaster off his guard, and that the court below ought not to have held as a matter of law that he was inexcusably negligent. In my opinion the court below ought to have granted the motion made by the defendant for a judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff.

WALKER, J., concurs in the dissenting opinion.

F. S. ROYSTER GUANO CO. v. MARKS.

NOTES—ACTION—PAYMENT—EVIDENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Where, in an action on notes, their execution is admitted, the burden of showing payment is on defendant.

2. In an action on three notes, each for $100, defendant offered in evidence receipts, dated after the maturity of the notes, but which did not show what the payments were for. There was no evidence of any other indebtedness between the parties. Held that, as they tended to show payment upon the notes, they should have been admitted, without putting the defendant on further proof that the credits were not made as part payments on other debts of the defendant, if such existed.

3. In an action on notes, where defendant introduced receipts in evidence given by plaintiff after maturity of the notes, the question whether the evidence showed a mutilation of the receipts should have been submitted to the jury, that they might pass upon the fact whether the amounts mentioned in the receipts should have been credited on the notes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanly County; Neal, Judge.

Suit by the F. S. Royster Guano Company against W. A. Marks. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Z. B. Sanders, for appellant. R. L. Smith and R. E. Austin, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was a consolidation of two appeals by the plaintiff from two judgments of a justice of the peace. On the trial below, the plaintiff introduced in evidence three promissory notes executed by the defendant to the plaintiff on the 10th April, 1900, each in the sum of $100, and payable one day after date. The defendant admitted the execution of the notes, and offered in evidence a receipt in the nature of a letter written from Norfolk, Va., to him by the plaintiff, dated on the 19th November, 1900, in the following words and figures: "We beg to acknowledge the receipt of yours of 19th enclosing check for $103 for which you will please accept our thanks"—and also another receipt by way of letter in the precise words and figures of the first, except that it was dated November 28th, and referred to the receipt of the $100 check as having been sent by the defendant on the 24th. It appears from the record that the plaintiff objected to those receipts, but it does not appear upon what grounds; and his honor then remarked that he would permit the defendant to tender these receipts, and see if he would make them competent later on by showing what debts those remittances were to be applied to by agreement of the parties. The defendant thereupon closed his case. His honor then intimated that he would charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they would allow the plaintiff the full amount demanded, according to the face of the notes. Upon that intimation the defendant moved to reopen the case, the motion was overruled, and the court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the first issue, "Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff?" should be answered, "Yes;" and the second, "If so, in what amount?" "$325.55, with interest."

We think there was error in the proceedings. There was no evidence of any transaction between the parties, except the indebtedness above set forth, and the receipts bear dates subsequent to the maturity of the notes sued upon. Those receipts, therefore, in our opinion, furnish some evidence tending to show payment upon the indebtedness, and they were competent for that purpose. They should have been admitted without putting the defendant upon the further proof that the credits were not made as part payments on other indebtedness of the defendant, if such existed. When the defendant admitted the execution of the notes, the onus of proving payment was put upon the defendant. The evidence offered by him for that purpose was sufficient to have been submitted to the jury, to show that the amounts mentioned in the receipts had been applied to the payment of the notes. In his instructions to the jury, his honor considered that the receipts furnished no evidence of payment, but we are not of that opinion. In a memorandum attached to the statement of the case on appeal, his honor, in explanation of his ruling on the question of evidence, stated that he would, in his discretion, have reopened the case, but, upon an investigation of the facts, he was of the opinion that the receipts tendered had been mutilated, that they were to be applied to other indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff, and that those parts of the receipts showing that fact had been detached from the receipts. Those facts which his honor found upon investigation, showing a mutilation of the receipts, ought to have been submitted to the jury, in order that they might pass upon the fact as to whether the amounts mentioned in the receipt should have been credited upon the debts sued upon.

BROWN et al. v. HAMILTON et al.

WILLS—STATUTES—DEVISE OF LAND—LANDS INCLUDED.

1. Code, § 2141, declares that a will shall be construed to speak as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appears. Held, that where testator's will devised all his property, and gave one daughter the lands lying south of a specified line, and thereafter, and two years before his death, he purchased other lands south of that line, such lands were included in the devise to the daughter.

2. Where testator's will devised to a daughter a tract of land south of a certain line—the land south of that line, as a matter of fact, consisting of three contiguous tracts—and subsequently he purchased other lands south of the line, the phrase in the will, "all that tract south of said line," furnished no ground for a contention that the land subsequently purchased should not be included in the devise.

3. Where testator devised his lands south of a certain line, "containing by estimation 200 acres," and subsequently he purchased other lands south of the line, the reference to the number of acres did not prevent the latter lands being included in the devise; the reference to the number of acres not controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Partition by Thomas Brown and others against Caroline Hamilton and another. From a judgment in favor of petitioners, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Oscar L. Sapp, for appellants. Hammer & Spence, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The testator devised to the defendant, his daughter, "all that tract or parcel of land which lies south of the line beginning at the northeast corner of K. L. Winningham's land and running thence east to the Wiley Cox line, containing by estimation 200 acres." In his will he divided and devised the rest of his land—marking it out by boundaries in the same way—to his other three children. The will was executed May 14, 1897, at which time the testator owned three contiguous tracts south of said line, aggregating about 250 acres. On 9th September, 1898, the testator acquired 66½ acres more, touching in its whole length the said 250 acres, and on the south thereof, and died 25th September, 1900. This is a petition by the other children, alleging that the testator died intestate as to said 66½ acres, and asking that it be sold for partition.

It is provided by Code, § 2141, that a will shall speak as of the death of the testator. It is also well settled that the presumption is against one's dying intestate as to any part of his estate. Of course, these rules are subject to the stronger rule that the intent of the testator, clearly expressed, shall govern. But here the will shows an intent on its face to specifically dispose of all the testator's property. The testator knew that he had given by his will all his land south of a designated line to his daughter, and, when he bought this land south of said line the following year, he also knew that it fell within the devise to his daughter (the defendant); and, if he had wished it to be taken out of such devise, he would have added a codicil. On the contrary, though he lived more than two years after the purchase of said land, he made no change in his will. We attach no importance to the argument that these words were used, "all that tract south of said line," for, when the 66¼ acres adjoining were bought, it became a part of the land south of the line. The said tract at the date of the will consisted of three contiguous tracts, but were treated as one. Laws 1844-45, p. 126, c. 88, § 3, now Code, § 2141, requires that the will shall be construed "to speak and take effect, as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator unless a contrary intent shall appear by the will," and none here appears. A case very much in point is In re Champion, 45 N. C. 246. Hines v. Mercer, 125 N. C. 71, 34 S. E. 106, is not in point, for there the subsequently acquired land did not come within the terms of the specific devise, and, besides, there was a residuary clause. The reference to the number of acres—200 acres—cannot control the boundaries described in the deed. Lyon v. Lyon, 96 N. C. 439, 2 S. E. 41. There is no doubtful boundary, to render the number of acres material to be considered, as in Cox v. Cox, 91 N. C. 256.

STATE et al. v. COOPER.

LIVERY STABLE KEEPERS—LICENSES—POWER OF MUNICIPALITY—REASONABLENESS.

1. A municipal ordinance requiring a license of liverymen, and providing that it shall include any persons making contract for hire in town, "or carrying any person with a vehicle out of the town for hire," is void, as unreasonable.

2. Const. art. 5, § 3, provides that the General Assembly may tax trades, professions, franchises and incomes. Code 1883, § 3800, authorizes municipalities to lay taxes for municipal purposes on all persons, property, privileges, and subjects within the corporate limits "which are liable to taxation for state and county purposes." Held, that the city had no authority to require a license for the single act of carrying a person out of the town in a vehicle for hire, pursuant to a contract made elsewhere; such transaction not amounting to the conducting of a livery business within the town.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Council, Judge.

W. D. Cooper was convicted or carrying, on a livery business without a license, in violation of a city ordinance, and appeals. Reversed.

This action comes upon a special verdict, of which the following are the material parts: "That on July 20, 1903, and for many years prior thereto, the defendant was, and had been, and still is, a resident of Roper, N. C., a village nine miles from Plymouth, N. C. That said defendant was on said July 20, 1903, engaged in livery business at Roper, N. C.; having obtained from the county and state the license required by law. That several days prior to July 20, 1903, the defendant, while at Roper, N. C., received a letter from Chas. Balfour, a traveling salesman for J. H. Le Roy Company, at Elizabeth City, N. C., asking defendant to meet him at Plymouth, N. C., and convey him to Roper, and thence to Creswell and Columbia, on said 20th July, which the defendant wrote him he would do, and did do so; charging the said Balfour for said services his customary price. That on June 1, 1903, the commissioners of Plymouth passed the following ordinance, among others, in reference to taxation: 'On livery stables and persons keeping a horse or horses for hire, or doing any livery business or hiring of horses in the town, $7.50. This shall include any persons making contract for hire in town, or carrying any person with a vehicle out of the town for hire.' This ordinance was in force on July 20, 1903, if said commissioners had authority under the law to pass it. The defendant has never paid said tax." Under the instruction of the court, the jury thereupon returned a verdict of guilty, and the defendant was fined $25, in accordance with the ordinance.

A. O. Gaylord, for appellant. The Attorney General and Bragaw & Ward, for appellees.

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the case). We are of opinion that upon the special verdict the defendant was entitled to a judgment of not guilty, inasmuch as the town commissioners did not have the power to pass the ordinance, and that the ordinance is unreasonable. We refer to that part of the ordinance under which the defendant is convicted, and which includes among those taxed for the privilege of doing a livery business "any person * * * carrying any person with a vehicle out of the town for hire." This is the only question before us. It is found that the defendant is a resident of the village of Roper, N. C., where he is carrying on the livery business; having paid both the state and county tax. There is no allegation that he is carrying on the livery business at Plymouth, or that he is in the habit of taking people out of Plymouth. As far as we can see, this is his first passenger, and he was carrying him under a contract made at Roper or at Elizabeth City—certainly while neither of the parties were at Plymouth. It seems there is no harm in taking people into Plymouth in a vehicle, provided you put them out and leave them there. People may pay a man to bring them into town, but must walk home, unless they conclude to make the town their permanent residence, or can get some local inhabitant to take them away. This may sound like a reductio ad absurdum, but it is a plain statement of the possible operation of the ordinance if sustained and carried to its legitimate result. Suppose a man living in Roper were compelled to visit Plymouth for an hour or two on some business. He could hire the defendant to carry him into the town, but he could not return by the same vehicle. Again, a man might hire a conveyance to take him from Roper to some place beyond Plymouth. If Plymouth lay directly in the way, he would have to go out of his way to drive around the town, or get out and hire a Plymouth man to take him the rest of the way. Surely the Legislature never intended any such result, nor should the courts place such a construction upon the law as to legalize such action. It would require a liveryman who had paid all the taxes at his home to pay an additional tax in every town to which he happened to send a vehicle, even if only once a year.

The ordinance is not only unreasonable, but, in our opinion, is clearly unlawful.

The question of the general power of the town to tax trades, occupations, and professions is not before us, and we therefore confine ourselves to that part of the ordinance under which the defendant was convicted.

It seems to be assumed in behalf of the town that the numerous class of cases holding invalid certain forms of municipal taxation have in some way been done away with by the change in the law. We do not so understand it. The principle of those cases remains in full force, to the effect that "the authorities of a town can impose no taxes except as authorized by its charter," or general laws applicable thereto. Section 3800 of the Code of 1883 says nothing to the contrary, but simply specifies what may be taxed. It says, "They may also lay taxes for municipal purposes on all persons, property, privileges and subjects within the corporate limits, which are liable to taxation for state and county purposes." This section requires two prerequisites. The subject of taxation must be within the corporate limits, and must be identically liable to state and county taxes. Is the act of "carrying any person with a vehicle out of the town [of Plymouth] for hire" liable to state and county taxes? If not, then it is not liable to town taxes. It is evident that the permissive taxation extends only to a trade, profession, or ordinary occupation, and not to a single act. It is intended to comply with article 5, § 3, of the Constitution, which reads in part as follows: "The General Assembly may also tax trades, professions, franchises and incomes." We are referred to the reasoning in Winston v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 210,

6 S. E. 114, but we must not overlook the facts of that case. There the jury found that the defendants "made a business of purchasing their stock of leaf on the floors of the tobacco warehouses in the town of Winston, and carrying the same on drays to their factory in Salem," and that "they attended the auction sales of leaf tobacco regularly for the purpose above indicated." If the defendant had made a business of sending his hacks regularly into the town of Plymouth, the case would be different, but there is neither evidence nor suggestion of such a fact. Neither a municipal corporation, nor even the Legislature, can change the meaning of words so as to make that a crime which would not be a crime if called by its proper name. In the case at bar the town could tax the livery business, and could define the business, provided it did not carry the definition beyond the limits of its taxing power. When it said that the livery business should include the single act of carrying a passenger out of town for hire, it simply said, in legal effect, that such an act should be taxed to the same extent as the livery business. If the town had the right to tax that single act, then the ordinance was valid; but calling that single act a "business" did not make it so, nor did it create the right to tax where it did not already exist. This is clearly laid down in State v. Ninestein, 132 N. C. 1039, 43 S. E. 936, where the court says on page 1042, 132 N. C., page 938, 43 S. E.: "Ordinarily the General Assembly has no power to construe an act, but when it imposes a tax upon peddlers, and in the same act defines who are peddlers, it is equivalent to imposing a tax upon all persons engaged in the occupations therein specified." In that case the definition was legal, because the state had the right to tax the occupations it construed to be peddling. But suppose the act had declared that all foreign drummers should be peddlers, and should be taxed accordingly; it would not have made them peddlers, nor would it have legalized their taxation. The power of taxation cannot rest upon legal fictions or irrebuttable presumptions. Moreover, all municipal powers are strictly construed, and especially those relating to taxation. In Latta v. Williams, 87 N. C. 126, Ashe, J., speaking for the court, says: "In the construction of municipal powers, it is held to be a general rule that the powers of a municipal corporation are to be construed with strictness; and Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation (page 387), says this rule is peculiarly applicable to taxes on occupations. 'It is presumed,' he adds, 'the Legislature has granted in plain terms all it has intended to grant at all. If it is not manifest that there has been a purpose by the Legislature to give authority for collecting a revenue by taxes on specified occupations, any exaction for that purpose will be illegal.'"

We think that upon the special verdict the defendant is entitled to a judgment of not guilty. Reversed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). For a violation of an ordinance of the town of Plymouth, the defendant was convicted in the mayor's court, sentenced to pay the fine imposed by the ordinance, and appealed to the superior court of Washington county. In that court the jury rendered a special verdict, the material facts found being as follows: That on June 1, 1903, the town commissioners passed an ordinance as follows: "On livery stables and persons keeping a horse or horses for hire, or doing any livery business or hiring of horses in the town, $7.50. This shall include any person making contract for hire in town, or carrying any person with a vehicle out of the town for hire." That the defendant was a resident on July 20, 1903, of Roper, N. C., a village nine miles from Plymouth, and was engaged in the livery business at that time at Roper, having obtained license from the county and state to engage in the business, and that the defendant received a letter at Roper from a Mr. Balfour, posted at Elizabeth City, in which letter the defendant was asked to meet Balfour at Plymouth, and convey him thence to Roper, and thence to other places, which the defendant did, making his customary charge for such service. Judgment of guilty was rendered upon the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

The defendant, in this court, through his counsel, rested his defense on the grounds, first, that the town commissioners did not have the power to pass the ordinance; and, second, that it was unreasonable and oppressive. Under the first line of defense the contention was that in the articles of incorporation of Plymouth (chapter 213, p. 477, of the Private Laws of 1903) there was no specific power granted to the town to levy such a privilege tax as that mentioned in the ordinance, and that, as that power was not specifically granted in the charter, the act of the commissioners in enacting the ordinance was ultra vires, and therefore null and void. And numerous cases, like Pullen v. Raleigh, 68 N. C. 451, and Latta v. Williams, 87 N. C. 128, were cited in support of the position. But at the time those decisions were made the power to levy such a tax as that imposed by the ordinance was not authorized by the general law, as it was when the commissioners in the case before us passed the ordinance. In the last-mentioned case, Judge Ashe, for the court, said: "The construction we have given to the charter of the town of Davidson College is in consonance with the policy of the Legislature in regard to powers of taxation by municipal corporations, as indicated in the act entitled 'Towns.' Bat. Rev. c. 111, § 16. There it declares that towns may lay a tax on real estate situated within the corporation; on such polls as are taxed by the General Assembly for public purposes; on all persons (apothecaries and druggists excepted) retailing or selling liquors or wines of the measure of a quart or less; a tax not exceeding $25 on such shows and exhibitors for reward as are taxed by the General Assembly; on all dogs; and on swine, horses, and cattle running at large within the town. There is nothing in the act to authorize the right to tax trades or occupations, and, when the Legislature has refrained from granting such power in a general law, it would not be reasonable to presume, in the absence of any express declaration to that effect, it intended to do so when it was granting special power of taxation." Section 16 of chapter 111 of Battle's Revisal was brought forward in the Code, and, with an addition thereto made by the Code commissioners, is now section 3800 of the Code of 1883, and that addition made by the Code commissioners confers on the town authorities the power to levy such privilege taxes. The language is: "They may also lay taxes for municipal purposes on all persons, property, privileges and subjects within the corporate limits, which are liable to taxation for state and county purposes." Under Schedule B of the revenue act of 1903 (Pub. Acts 1903, p. 331, c. 247), the imposition of a license tax on the livery business was provided for; and, besides, in the act of incorporation of the town of Plymouth (chapter 213, p. 477, Private Acts of 1903), by section 10, it is specially declared that section 3800 of the Code shall apply to the town of Plymouth. In Guano Co. v. Tarboro, 126 N. C. 68, 35 S. E. 231, and State v. Irwin, 126 N. C. 989, 35 S. E. 430, this court has held that, under section 3800 of the Code, although such a power may not exist in the subjects of taxation enumerated in their charters, towns and cities may tax trades and professions and other privileges.

The second ground of defense (that is, that the tax is void on the ground that it is unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable) cannot, in my opinion, be maintained. The fact that the defendant is a nonresident of Plymouth cannot relieve him from liability to pay the tax prescribed by the ordinance, if he undertakes to do the livery business in Plymouth by carrying passengers out of the town. If so, he might keep his vehicles and stables just outside the town limits, and thereby escape the privilege tax, as well as by competition injure or destroy the business of other liverymen who live inside the town and pay the tax. "The Legislature may authorize municipal corporations to impose taxes upon persons whose ordinary avocations are pursued within the corporate limits, although residing beyond those limits, the same as upon residents." 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 791. And the same principle is decided in City of Memphis v. Battelle & Co., 55 Tenn. 524, 24 Am. Rep. 285. In Winston v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 210, 6 S. E. 114, Judge Davis, for the court, in illustrating the decision in that case, said: "If a liveryman or drayman, resident in Greensboro, should send his omnibus and hacks or drays into the town of Winston, and claim and be allowed the privilege of doing business there without the payment of taxes because he was a nonresident, it would be deemed a very unjust discrimination by the resident liverymen and draymen." And we adopt his reasoning on that point in the case before us.

MILLIKEN v. DENNY.

STREETS AND ALLEYS—ADJOINING PROPERTY OWNERS—RIGHTS—INJUNCTION OF OBSTRUCTIONS—PLEADINGS—SUFFICIENCY—JUDGMENT—CONFORMITY TO PLEADING.

1. An "alley" is not necessarily a street, and the public have not necessarily a right to its use.

2. An allegation in a complaint that a deed called for a "stone, thence north * * * along the south side of the ten-foot alley," in the absence of an averment that an alley of that width had been opened and dedicated for the use of the owners of the property conveyed, is not sufficient to show an easement in the grantee in such deed, or to entitle him to enjoin the obstruction of the alley.

3. Where a lot conveyed fronts on two streets, no implied easement by necessity in an alley connecting the streets arises in favor of the grantee.

4. A judgment enjoining the obstruction of an alley at suit of an adjoining property owner cannot be sustained on the theory of public rights in the alley, where the complaint contains no allegation that the alley was dedicated to a public use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. M. Milliken against G. W. Denny. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Scales, Taylor & Scales and R. D. Douglas, for appellant. E. J. Justice and King & Kimball, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiff alleged: That on the 14th day of August, 1890, George A. Dick, trustee, and Mary E. Dick, by and with the consent of her husband, R. P. Dick, executed to Julia P. Dick a deed for about three acres of land, in the city of Greensboro, "which said land was bounded on the north by a ten-foot alley, connecting Percy street and Chestnut street, on the east by Percy street, and on the west by Chestnut street; more particularly described in said deed as beginning at a stone on Chestnut street ten feet south of the southwest corner of George A. Dick's home lot; running thence along Chestnut street south, 3 degrees and 45 minutes west, 378½ feet, to a stone; thence south, 84 degrees and 22 minutes east, 316½ feet, to a stone on Percy street; thence north, 6 degrees and 39 minutes east, 383½ feet to a stone; thence north, 84 degrees and 22 minutes west, 340 feet, along the south side of a ten-foot alley—containing three acres," etc. Said deed was duly recorded. That subsequently the said Julia P. Dick conveyed the said land by deed containing like calls to those above set out to George A. Dick, which said deed was duly recorded. That thereafter George A. Dick, by deed containing a like description to that set out in the two deeds above mentioned, conveyed said land to Caesar Cone, which deed was duly recorded. That subsequently Caesar Cone and wife conveyed a part of said land to the plaintiff by deed containing the following description: "Beginning at a stone in the north side of Summit avenue and 75 feet westerly from a stone in the northwest intersection of Summit avenue and Percy street, running thence north, 36 degrees and 56 minutes west, 66.25 feet, to a stone on the north side of a ten-foot alley; thence north with the south side of said alley, 84 degrees and 49 minutes west, 80 feet to a stone," etc. "That the ten-foot alley called for in the description in the said deed to the plaintiff is the same alley running between Percy and Chestnut streets north, 84 degrees and 49 minutes west, which is established, called for and set out in each of the deeds above referred to, prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff of the land described in said deed to him. That subsequent to the execution and registration of the first three above-mentioned deeds Mary E. Dick and George A. Dick, trustees, who were the grantors in the deed first above mentioned to Julia P. Dick, executed to the defendant, G. W. Denny, a quitclaim deed for the alley above referred to, describing the land thereby conveyed as beginning on the east side of Chestnut street at the southwest corner of the home place formerly owned by George A. Dick, and running about 350 feet to Percy street; thence southerly with Percy street ten feet to the corner of the lot sold by George A. Dick to Caesar Cone; thence westerly with the north line of said lot about 350 feet to Chestnut street; thence northerly with Chestnut street ten feet to the beginning"—which deed was duly recorded. That the defendant had actual knowledge that the said alley was called for in such of the conveyances above mentioned as were executed and registered prior to the execution of the above-mentioned deed to him. That the plaintiff agreed to purchase from Caesar Cone, and took from him a contract in writing to convey, the land described in the deed from said Caesar Cone to the plaintiff long before the defendant received from the said George A. Dick, trustee, and Mrs. Mary E. Dick, the said deed for the said 10-foot alley above described. That the plaintiff, relying upon the fact that the said alley was called for in the deeds above set out, and upon the faith that it would be kept open, was induced to purchase the said lot, and pay therefor a larger sum than he would otherwise have done, the said alley giving to the plaintiff a convenient entrance to his said lot facing on Summit avenue, and upon which he has erected a house which he occupies as a home. That the defendant has, since the execution to him of the quitclaim deed above mentioned, and after being forbidden by the plaintiff to do so, closed up said alley, and thereby cut the plaintiff off from entering the back portion of his premises from Percy or Chestnut streets, and has damaged him. He prays that the defendant be enjoined from obstructing his right to pass through and over the said alley, and be required to keep it open, etc. The defendant demurred "for that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." His honor overruled the demurrer, and ordered the defendant to open the said alleyway, and enjoined him from ever closing same, or in any way interfering with the free use of the same by the plaintiff and the public who may wish to pass and repass over and along the same. From this judgment the defendant appealed.

The plaintiff contends that this case comes within the principle well settled by this court in Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681; State v. Fisher, 117 N. C. 733, 23 S. E. 158; Conrad v. Land Co., 126 N. C. 766, 36 S. E. 282; Collins v. Land Co., 128 N. C. 563, 30 S. E. 21, 83 Am. St. Rep. 720—that where an individual sells or conveys a town or city lot bounded by streets or alleys marked out on a plat, and the grantee enters upon it and expends money in improving it, he is entitled to a right of way over such street or alley as appurtenant to the land, and any subsequent conveyance by his grantor or those claiming under him of the portions of such street or alley by which the grantee's lot is bounded is void in so far as such sale may affect his rights. We have no disposition to question the correctness of the law as laid down in these cases. This court, at the present term, in Hughes v. Clark, 46 S. E. 956, has reaffirmed the doctrine and cited with approval the cases above named. The right of purchasers to have such streets or alleys kept open for their own use and the use of their grantees is not based so much upon the theory that they have an easement as that the dedication, evidenced by the making of the plat and the reference to it either in the deed or in the negotiations, estops the party from closing up such street or alley or interfering with the use of them for the purpose for which they were dedicated. While there is some conflict in the authorities which we have examined, it may be said that an alley is not necessarily a street, and does not necessarily signify that the public have a right to use it. An alley is defined as "a narrow passage or way in a city, as distinguished from a public street." 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. p. 149. Webster defines it as "a narrow passage, specially a walk or passage in a garden or park, bordered by rows of trees or bushes; a bordered way. A narrow passage or way in a city, as distinct from a public street." The distinction between a private and a public alley is recognized by the Supreme Court of Maryland in Witsen v. Gutman, 29 Atl. 608, 24 L. R. A. 405. It is not alleged in the complaint by whom, or at what time, this alley was opened, or for what purpose. The language is "that the said land was bounded on the north by a ten-foot alley connecting Percy and Chestnut streets." Whether it was opened at the time the deed was made, and for the use of the two lots, or whether it had been opened before that time, and dedicated to that purpose, does not appear. The nearest approach to an allegation that the alley was opened is found in the fifth paragraph: "That the ten-foot alley called for in the description in the said deed to the plaintiff is the same alley which is established, called for, and set out in each of the deeds above referred to prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff of the land described in said deed to him." We do not think that the mere fact that the deed from George A. Dick to Julia P. Dick called for a "stone," "thence north, 84 degrees and 22 minutes west, 340 feet along the south side of the ten-foot alley," in the absence of any allegation that an alley of that width had been opened and dedicated for the use of the owners of the property conveyed, is sufficient to pass an easement to the grantee, or to entitle him to enjoin the closing of such alley. No right of way or other easement is expressly granted; therefore the plaintiff's claim to such right or easement is based upon the contention that it is granted by implication upon the well-settled principle that, if a man grant a piece of land surrounded by other lands belonging to him, the grantee will have by implication a right of way to pass to and from the land granted. This right arises out of the necessity of the situation of the grantee in respect to the land granted. By the complaint in this case it appears that the lot conveyed fronted on two streets, being 216 feet apart, and fronting about 378 feet on each street. It would seem, therefore, that no easement or right of way would arise by implication by reason of necessity. In the present condition of the pleadings we prefer not to discuss or decide the rights of the parties except for the purpose of disposing of the demurrer. It may be that the plaintiff can, by amendment of his complaint, set forth more clearly the basis and extent of his alleged right. The judgment of his honor cannot be sustained, for that it assumes not only that the plaintiff was entitled to an alley, but that the public had a right to pass and repass over and along the same. We find no suggestion in the complaint that the alleged alley was dedicated to any public use; nor does the judgment recognize or protect such rights, if any, as the owner of the adjoining lot may have to the use of the alley. It may well be that, if opened at all, the alley was for the benefit of the lot conveyed and the adjoining lot. How this is, will, we presume, be made to appear by an amendment to the complaint. Upon the pleadings we simply decide that his honor should have sustained the demurrer, and given the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his complaint as he may be advised. Although no objection was taken to the form of the demurrer, and we therefore treat it as sufficient, we have not overlooked the fact that it does not conform to the requirements of section 240 of the Code, as construed by this court in the cases cited in Clark's Code, § 240. As the defendant may, notwithstanding the defect in form of his demurrer, have made a motion in this court for the same causes, we treat the case as if such motion had been made. Tucker v. Baker, 88 N. C. 1.

RAILROAD BONDS—ISSUANCE UNDER VOID STATUTE—RIGHTS OF BONA FIDE HOLDERS—AUTHORITY UNDER OTHER STATUTORY PROVISIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONSTRUCTION—RECITALS IN BONDS—ENJOINING TAX—RIGHT OF TAXPAYER TO SUE.

1. Const. art. 2, § 14, provides that no laws shall be passed to pledge the faith of the state for the payment of any debt, or to impose any tax, or allow the counties, cities, or towns to do so, unless the bill shall have passed three several readings, etc., and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third readings of the bill shall have been entered on the journal. Laws 1885, p. 400, c. 215, § 7, authorized any township in M. county through which a railroad might pass to subscribe to its capital stock, issue bonds therefor, etc., but the yeas and nays on the passage of the statute were not recorded on the journals. Prior to this statute, decisions of the Supreme Court construing other constitutional provisions tended to establish the principle that a statute ratified and signed by the presiding officers of the two houses was conclusive evidence that the bill had been constitutionally passed. Held, that these decisions did not apply to article 2, § 14, so as to protect the bona fide purchasers of bonds issued under Laws 1885, p. 898, c. 215, on the theory that the decisions became a part of the contract of purchase, and that a subsequent decision holding the bonds invalid would impair the obligation of the contract.

2. Code, § 1996, providing that the boards of commissioners of the several counties shall have power to subscribe stock to any railroad company "when necessary to aid in the completion of any railroad" in which the citizens of the county are interested, cannot be applied to authorize the issuance of bonds by a township in aid of a road not yet begun.

3. Code, c. 17, § 707, subsec. 14, provides that no townships shall have or exercise any corporate power whatsoever unless authorized by an act of General Assembly, to be exercised under the supervision of the board of county commissioners. Held, that an issue of township bonds in aid of a railroad under a void statute could not be justified under section 1996, providing that the boards of commissioners of the several counties shall have power to subscribe stock to any railroad company in which the citizens of the county are interested.

4. Township bonds issued in aid of a railroad pursuant to Laws 1885, p. 898, c. 215—the same being an unconstitutional statute—recited that they were issued by virtue of that act, and by authority of a township election in pursuance thereof, the purpose and intent of which was to raise a fund to pay the township's subscription to the railroad company's capital stock, "for the construction and equipment of the same." The court below found that the bond election was held under Laws 1885, p. 898, c. 215, and expressly declined to find that it was held under Code, § 1996, providing that the boards of commissioners of the several counties shall have power to subscribe stock to any railroad company in which the citizens of the county are interested. The preliminary steps prescribed by Laws 1885, p. 898, c. 215, and by Code, § 1996, are entirely different. Held, that the bond issue could not be justified under Code, § 1996, on the theory that recitals in bonds that they are issued under a statute will be held, in favor of bona fide purchasers, to import full compliance with the statute.

5. In an action by a taxpayer to enjoin a township tax levied to pay interest on railroad bonds issued under a void statute, the burden is on the defendant county commissioners to show that the bonds are valid under some other act.

6. A taxpayer may enjoin county commissioners from making a tax levy to pay interest on township railroad bonds issued under an unconstitutional statute, without restoring to the bona fide holders of the bonds the consideration paid therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; M. H. Justice, Judge.

Suit by G. C. Graves and others against the commissioners of Moore county. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified.

The Carthage Railroad Company was chartered by chapter 215, p. 898, Laws 1885. By section 7 of said act the commissioners of Moore county, or any township through which said railroad might pass, were authorized to subscribe to its capital stock such an amount as, upon a vote at an election to be held as in said act provided, should be named. The said commissioners, upon taking such vote, were authorized to issue bonds for the purpose of borrowing money to pay such subscriptions as might be made pursuant to the provisions of said act. The commissioners were authorized to levy taxes to pay the interest on such bonds, and to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal. The bill constituting said act was not passed either in the Senate or House of Representatives in accordance with the provisions of section 14, art. 2, of the Constitution, in that the names of the Senators and members voting for and against said bill were not recorded on the journals. The commissioners, in accordance with the provisions of said act, caused an election to be held in Carthage township, in said county, in regard to subscribing $10,000 to said railroad, at which a majority of the qualified voters voted for said subscription. Pursuant thereto the commissioners issued the bonds of said township to the amount of $10,000. Said election was held between March 4, 1885, and Noember 1, 1886. The said bonds were in proper form, and attested according to law. They were put upon the market and sold and purchased in good faith for their full value, and without any notice, express or implied, to the purchasers of any infirmity therein, except such facts as appeared upon the record on the journals of the Senate and House, and of this the purchasers had no actual notice. The money derived from the sale of said bonds was spent in the construction and equipment of said railroad company, extending through said Carthage township. The stock of said company to the amount of $10,000 was issued to the board of commissioners for the benefit of Carthage township, and is now held by said board for said township, and the people of said township have enjoyed and continue to enjoy the benefit of said railroad. The defendant board of commissioners has each year since the issuance and sale of said bonds levied a tax upon the taxable property in Carthage township sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds, and has paid such interest, and it is the purpose of said board at the meeting on the first Monday in June to levy a tax upon the property and polls in said township for the purpose of paying the interest on said bonds accruing during the year 1903, and they will levy said tax unless restrained, etc. The bonds contain the following recital: "This bond is issued by virtue of an act of the General Assembly of North Carolina, ratified March 4, 1885 [Acts 1885, p. 398, c. 215], and by authority of an election held in Carthage township in pursuance thereof ratifying the same," etc. The defendant board in apt time requested the court to find from the affidavits the following facts: "That when the said bonds were issued and sold, November 1, 1886, they were valid by the laws of North Carolina, as then expounded by all the departments of the government, and administered in its courts of justice. That said bonds were issued and sold prior to the decision in the case of State v. Patterson, 98 N. C. 600, 4 S. E. 350, and prior to the decision of said case every decision of the Supreme Court of said state had been in favor of the validity of said bonds and the act of the General Assembly under which they purport to be issued. That said bonds were sold for value and in good faith, and are now owned by the Jacob Tome Institute of Baltimore, not a party to this suit. That the validity of said bonds cannot be impaired by the decision of the courts of the state made subsequent to the issue and sale of the bonds." The court declined to find said facts and to hold as requested, and the defendants excepted. His honor, being of the opinion that chapter 215, p. 398, Laws 1885, had never been passed in accordance with the provisions of section 14, art. 2, of the Constitution, and was invalid, and that the election held pursuant thereto, and the bonds issued by authority thereof, were void, enjoined the defendant board of commissioners from levying the tax to pay the interest or principal of said bonds. The defendants appealed.

U. L. Spence, for appellants. H. F. Seawell and W. J. Adams, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. The defendant concedes that his honor's ruling in respect to the invalidity of chapter 215, p. 398, Laws 1885, is sustained by the decisions of this court in Bank v. Commissioners, 119 N. C. 214, 25 S. E. 968, Commissioners v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 28 S. E. 539, 39 L. R. A. 439, Rodman v. Washington, 122 N. C. 39, 30 S. E. 118, and Commissioners v. Payne, 123 N. C. 432, 31 S. E. 711, but contends that said bonds are valid under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Commissioners of Wilkes County v. Coler, 180 U. S. 107, 23 Sup. Ct. 738, 47 L. Ed. 971, and Commissioners of Stanly County v. Coler, 190 U. S. 437, 23 Sup. Ct. 811, 47 L. Ed. 1126. They say that prior to the passage of the act of 1885, p. 398, c. 215, and the issuance and sale of the bonds November 1, 1886, every decision of this court construing the Constitution tended to establish the principle that, when an act had been ratified and signed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, it was conclusive evidence that the bill had been passed in accordance with all of the provisions of the Constitution; that purchasers of bonds issued pursuant to such act are presumed to have contracted with reference to such decisions, and that they entered into and became a part of the contract; that to hold the bonds issued in pursuance of such acts invalid, in the light of such decisions, impairs the obligation of the contract, etc. If the premise be true, the conclusion must be conceded. The principle is well settled by numerous authorities, and commends itself to the judicial mind. This identical question, however, is decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Wilkes Co. v. Coler, 180 U. S. 506, 21 Sup. Ct. 458, 45 L. Ed. 642. The Circuit Court of Appeals, under the judiciary act of 1891, certified to the Supreme Court three questions, two of which were: (1) Whether, if the bonds and coupons in question were issued, put in circulation, and came into the hands of purchasers for value and without notice, in due course of trade, and if there were at that time no decisions of the Supreme Court of North Carolina adverse to these bonds, or bonds issued under similar statutes, they are valid, etc.; (2) whether there was any decision adverse to the validity of these or other identical bonds, or any construction of the Constitution or law of North Carolina which affected the question of their validity. Mr. Justice Harlan, for the court, proceeds to examine the cases relied on by the bondholders to sustain their contention; being the same cases relied on by the defendant herein. Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119;

Scarborough v. Robinson, 81 N. C. 409—all of which were decided prior to November 1, 1886. The learned justice carefully analyzes these cases, and comes to the following conclusion: "It thus appears that no one of the cases cited by the defendants involved a construction of article 2, § 14, of the state Constitution. Those cases arose under other provisions of the Constitution." The question is so fully discussed, and the conclusion so clearly stated, that we think it unnecessary to do more than refer to the opinion in that case. This court has since the decision of those cases kept the distinction between acts of ordinary legislation and acts coming within the provision of article 2, § 14, of the Constitution, clearly in view. Bank v. Commissioners, 119 N. C. 214, 25 S. E. 966; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 22 S. E. 16, 28 L. R. A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801; Wilson v. Markley, 133 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023. The distinction was clearly defined in Bank v. Commissioners, supra.

2. The defendant says that if the bonds are not valid under chapter 215, p. 398, Laws 1885, the commissioners had power and authority to order the election, and pursuant thereto to issue the bonds, under section 1996 et seq. of the Code, which provides that "the boards of commissioners of the several counties shall have power to subscribe stock to any railroad company, or companies when necessary to aid in the completion of any railroad in which the citizens of the county may have an interest." This court, in Commissioners v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 28 S. E. 539, 39 L. R. A. 439, discussed and decided this identical question, holding that the extent of power conferred upon the commissioners by section 1996 of the Code was confined by the express language used "to aid in the completion of any railroad," etc. This view was reaffirmed in Commissioners v. Call, 123 N. C. 308, 323, 31 S. E. 481, 44 L. R. A. 252. The defendant says this construction was repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Stanly Commissioners v. Coler, 190 U. S. 437, 23 Sup. Ct. 811, 47 L. Ed. 1126, and by the Circuit Court of Appeals in Commissioners of Stanly Co. v. Coler, 113 Fed. 705, 51 C. C. A. 379. It is true that these courts held that, while the general rule required the federal courts to accept the construction put upon state Constitutions and state statutes by the courts of the state, there were exceptions thereto, and that the case presented one of such exceptions; citing Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 2 Sup. Ct. 10, 27 L. Ed. 859. The federal courts rejected the construction put by this court upon the word "completion"; holding that, read in the light of the context, it was to be construed as synonymous with "construction." We have examined with care the opinions of the learned judges, and the reasoning advanced to sustain their views. We are constrained, with all possible deference, to say that we find in them no reason advanced which causes us to change the view expressed by this court. We do not find it necessary to follow this discussion, because, in our opinion, section 1996 cannot, in any point of view, be called in aid of the bonds involved in this case. It will be observed that authority is given "boards of the several counties" to subscribe, etc. The subscription here is made by Carthage township, and certainly no power is given by the Code for townships to make such subscription otherwise than by a special act of the General Assembly. It is expressly provided that "no township shall have or exercise any corporate power whatsoever, unless authorized by an act of the General Assembly to be exercised under the supervision of the board of commissioners." Code, c. 17, § 707, subsec. 14. While it is true, as contended, that the county commissioners, as the governing board of the county, by the terms of chapter 215, p. 398, Laws 1885, represent and direct the action of the township in respect to the subscription, etc., it will hardly be seriously contended that they may, under the terms of section 1996 of the Code, submit the question of issuing bonds to the people of the township, except by positive direction of the General Assembly. These bonds expressly recite upon their face that they are "issued by virtue of an act of the General Assembly" ratified on the 4th day of March, 1885 (Acts 1885, p. 398, c. 215), "and by authority of an election held in Carthage township in pursuance thereof ratifying the same, the purpose and intent of which is to raise a fund sufficient to pay the subscription of said Carthage township to the capital stock of the Carthage Railroad Company for the construction and equipment of the same." It would be difficult to use stronger terms in which to set forth the subscription to the road, and the purpose for which it was made, "for construction and equipment of the same," expressly excludes any idea that the people of Carthage township or the commissioners of the county supposed that they were subscribing "to aid in the completion" of a railroad. We therefore conclude that even if we were to adopt the interpretation placed upon the statute by the Supreme Court of the United States, which we cannot do, these bonds would not come within the protection of section 1996 of the Code. Again, much emphasis is laid by Mr. Justice McKenna, in the Stanly Bond Case, upon the fact that there the bonds expressly recited that they were issued pursuant to the provisions of section 1996 et seq. of the Code. Purchasers were justified, therefore, in assuming that all provisions and conditions, the performance and existence of which are necessary to authorize the issuing of the bonds, had been complied with and existed; citing School District v. Stone, 106 U. S. 183, 1 Sup. Ct. 84, 27 L. Ed. 90, wherein it is said that "when a statute confers power upon a municipal corporation, upon the performance of certain precedent conditions to execute bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad * * * and imposes upon certain officers * * * power to determine whether such conditions have been performed, recitals that the bonds are issued pursuant to or by authority of the statute have been held, in favor of a bona fide purchaser for value, to import full compliance with the statute, and to preclude inquiry as to whether the precedent conditions had been performed before the bonds were issued." This well-settled principle can have no application here, because there is not the slightest reference to the Code or any statute, other than chapter 215, Laws 1885, as the authority under which the bonds were issued. If the power was vested in the commissioners of Moore county to submit to the voters of Carthage township the proposition to make the subscription, and it was so recited in the bonds, such recitals, in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, would be conclusive evidence that the conditions existed upon which the authority to issue them could be exercised; but the recitals could not create or confer the power, if there was an absolute want of it. Every purchaser of the bonds would take them with notice of that fact. Wilkes Com'rs v. Coler, 190 U. S. 107, 23 Sup. Ct. 738, 47 L. Ed. 971.

His honor finds as a fact that the election was held under the provisions of the act of 1885, p. 398, c. 215, and expressly declines to find that said election was held pursuant to the provisions of sections 1996, 1997. There being no evidence in the record tending to show that the provisions of section 1997 in regard to ordering and holding the election were complied with, and no finding of fact to that effect, and no recitals in the bonds that they were issued pursuant to or by authority of said sections, it is difficult to perceive how we could say either that they were so issued, or, if so issued, that the provisions of the sections were complied with. On the contrary, we can see, from the facts found and the recitals, that the election was held pursuant to chapter 215, p. 398, of the Laws of 1885. Section 12 of said act prescribes the preliminary steps to be taken before an election can be held; that 25 taxpayers petition in writing that an election be ordered, etc. The recital in the bonds conclusively fixes the fact that such steps were taken, and all things necessary were done in respect to the election. Stanly Bonds Case, supra. It is difficult to see how the same recitals can conclusively fix the fact that the bonds were issued pursuant to and in compliance with another statute, the terms and provisions of which in regard to the preliminary steps to be taken are entirely different. The burden is upon the defendant to show that, although void under the act recited in the face of the bonds, they are valid under some other statute, and to show further that all things necessary to be done under such statute were done, which is practically to contradict the recitals. We conclude that no power is conferred upon the commissioners by section 1996 of the Code to submit to the people of a township the question of subscribing to a railroad; that, in the absence of any such power, his honor correctly declined to find the fact that the commissioners undertook to order the election under said section. To have so found would have been error, because there was no evidence thereof. On the contrary, the record expressly showed the contrary.

The defendant says that the plaintiff has no standing in a court of equity; that before he, as a taxpayer, can invoke the equitable aid of the court, he must offer to restore to the holders of the bonds the proceeds or the property received in consideration thereof. It is well settled that a taxpayer may maintain a bill to enjoin the collection of an illegal tax, or a tax levied for an illegal purpose. If the bonds are absolutely void, a tax levied to pay them would be equally so. No estoppel can grow out of a void act of the General Assembly, or any act done by authority thereof. If the bondholders are so advised, we can see no reason why they may not make themselves parties, and assert their right to the stock now held by the commissioners in trust for the township. The plaintiff simply asks that a tax levy be enjoined. We pass upon the legal aspects of this record, without regard to the moral element involved. Certainly this court does not sympathize with repudiation of public obligations, but our duty is to construe the Constitution and laws of the state. Suitors must look to other tribunals—either their own consciences or the judgment of an enlightened public conscience—to find vindication for their actions. We deem it not improper to say that we commend the action of the defendant board of commissioners in defending the rights of the holders of the bonds, and setting up in the strongest possible view the grounds upon which, if at all, the bonds could be sustained. The case was well argued, and the briefs well and carefully prepared. The defendant contends that the injunction should not have been made perpetual, but, in any point of view, only continued to the hearing. The order may be so modified to the end that any other parties in interest may, if so advised, come in and litigate their rights.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 21, 1904.)

JUDICIAL SALES—AGREEMENT OF PARTIES—CHILLING BIDDING—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. At a judicial sale, an agreement, to which all parties in interest are parties, intended to chill the bidding, will not invalidate the sale.

2. Where the parties to the judicial sale had agreed before the sale with another as to a purchase on their behalf, and in consequence of the agreement and a reliance on the performance of it the land had been purchased by the other party to the agreement at much less than its real value, and the purchaser refused to carry out the agreement, and it could not be enforced because of the statute of frauds, he will not be allowed to hold the land.

3. After the admission of evidence and argument, an amendment to the pleading which does not present a different cause of action requiring new proof is properly admitted.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; J. E. McDonald, Special Judge.

Action by Julia L. Fairey and others against W. H. Kennedy and others. From the decree, defendants W. H. Kennedy and A. M. Kennedy appeal. Affirmed.

J. O. Patterson and Allen J. Green, for appellants. B. T. Rice, for respondents.

WOODS, J. A synopsis of the pleadings is necessary to a clear understanding of the issues involved in this cause. The following are substantially the allegations of the complaint: Mrs. Elizabeth Wade executed a mortgage to the defendant W. H. Kennedy in 1886, and died intestate in 1896, leaving her husband and a number of children as her heirs. The husband afterwards died, leaving the children as his heirs. Two daughters, Mrs. McCurley and Mrs. Nipson, died intestate after their mother, the first leaving as her heirs her husband and one minor child, and the second her husband and two minor children. Kennedy, the mortgagee, recovered a judgment of foreclosure in 1897 in an action to which all who claimed an interest in the land through Elizabeth Wade were parties. The master sold under this judgment, and "W. H. Kennedy became the purchaser thereof by and through his son and partner in business, A. M. Kennedy, one of the defendants herein." Before the sale was made, W. H. Kennedy agreed with W. D. Wade, a son of Mrs. Wade, and F. A. Fairey, husband of one of her daughters, acting for all the heirs of Mrs. Wade, that he would bid off the land, and allow the heirs two years to redeem it by paying the judgment and $200 owing to W. H. Kennedy by W. D. Wade individually. Fairey and W. D. Wade were to hold and cultivate the land and apply the profits to the debts. In pursuance of this agreement, W. H. Kennedy, through

A. M. Kennedy, bought the land for $1,210, and W. D. Wade alone, with Fairey's consent, went into possession, and made payments to W. H. Kennedy on the indebtedness. The other parties for whose benefit the agreement was made also made payments. After receiving these payments, W. H. Kennedy violated and renounced the agreement, concluded with W. D. Wade to exclude all the other heirs from participation in the benefits to be derived from the redemption of the property, and W. D. Wade is now in possession of the land under some separate agreement to purchase. The property mentioned "is worth $3,000 or more, and in consequence of said agreement entered into between the said W. H. Kennedy and the heirs at law of Mrs. Elizabeth Wade the same was sold at a great sacrifice, as it was understood at said sale that said land was to be bid off for the benefit of the said heirs at law, and the bidding was chilled by reason of said agreement." The plaintiffs allege their readiness and desire to carry out the terms of the contract made with Kennedy for the benefit of all the heirs, and demand judgment for an accounting for all rents and other payments made by W. D. Wade and the other heirs; that plaintiff be allowed to pay the indebtedness remaining due under the contract, and that upon such payment, W. H. and A. M. Kennedy be decreed to execute fee simple title to the heirs of Mrs. Wade. All who claim through Mrs. Wade are parties plaintiff or defendant. The infant defendants, in their answer, join in the prayer of the complaint. W. D. Wade and C. L. Wade, in their answers, allege that the land brought a fair price at the master's sale, and deny that the bidding was chilled. They deny that any contract was made with W. H. Kennedy before the master's sale for the redemption of the land, and allege that after the sale W. D. Wade made a contract of purchase with A. M. Kennedy, which was to be for the benefit of all the Wade heirs; that he paid about $400 on this contract, a part of which came from some of the other heirs; that he has not been able to pay the remainder of the purchase money, and the heirs have not come to his assistance. They ask for an accounting by A. M. Kennedy of the sums received, and that he be required to execute a deed to W. D. Wade and such other of the Wade heirs as shall come in and contribute their portion of the purchase money. W. H. Kennedy, in his answer, denies that he made the contract set up in the complaint, or that A. M. Kennedy purchased the land for him, or that he has any interest in it, or that he has received money from any of the Wade heirs on a contract of purchase. The answer of A. M. Kennedy sets up an independent purchase by him of the land at the master's sale, and contains an allegation that he has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the alleged contract with

W. H. Kennedy. Both the Kennedys allege the land was bought for a fair price at a fair sale, without any chilling of the bidding.

Upon the call of the case for trial, the defendants interposed the following demurrer: "The defendants now move to dismiss the complaint herein on the ground that the case does not state facts sufficient to constitute, a cause of action, in this: (1) That it appears from the face of the complaint that the agreement or contract sought to be enforced and set up in the complaint by the plaintiff is one that contravenes established principles of public policy, in that it tends to prevent and did prevent full and free competition at the judicial sale, as alleged in the complaint, and hence is alleged illegal and void, and cannot be enforced in a court of justice; and (2) it also appears from the complaint that the plaintiffs are in pari delicto with the defendants, and the court will not lend its aid to either party, but will leave them where it found them." The circuit judge overruled the demurrer. W. H. Kennedy and A. M. Kennedy are the only appellants, and their first and second exceptions involve the correctness of this ruling.

The demurrer is based on the proposition that an agreement intended to chill bidding at a judicial sale is, under all circumstances, regarded such a legal wrong that no rights can be claimed under it. Such agreement is denounced by the law as contrary to public policy, for the reason that it operates as a fraud upon those interested in the sale of property. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 2 Rich. Eq. 384; Barrett v. Bath Paper Co., 13 S. C. 158; 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. 950. When all parties interested unite in the contract, or subsequently sanction it in the promotion of their interests, the rule has no application, for the obvious reason that there is nobody left to be defrauded. In this case the complaint alleges the contract to bid in the property which resulted in chilling the bidding was made by the judgment creditor with two of the heirs acting for all other interested parties. The object was to secure time to buy back the property for the benefit of all concerned. It is true the infant defendants were not bound by the agreement, though it was intended for their benefit, and they could have repudiated it; but by their answer through their guardian ad litem they have asked the court to enforce their rights under it. For these reasons we think the demurrer was properly overruled, and the first and second exceptions cannot be sustained.

In the third exception the appellant submits that the circuit judge should have dismissed the complaint after hearing the evidence, on the same ground as that stated in the demurrer, and this exception falls with the first two.

After discussion of the merits of the case, the circuit judge held that the plaintiffs "failed to establish, by satisfactory proof such a clear, definite, and certain contract as entitles them to the specific performance thereof," and also that there was no such proof of part performance as would take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds; and that for these reasons specific performance, the particular relief demanded in the complaint, could not be granted. The circuit judge, however, found further that, though the verbal contract was not sufficiently definite for enforcement, and there had been no such performance as would prevent the application of the statute of frauds, yet that the Wade heirs had relied on the agreement made before the sale by W. H. Kennedy with W. D. Wade on their behalf, and that in consequence of this agreement and the reliance of the Wade heirs on it, the land had been purchased by A. M. Kennedy at much less than its real value, with full knowledge of the agreement. We think this finding is sustained by the great preponderance of the testimony. Not only is there direct proof of some agreement or understanding before the sale, but disinterested witnesses swear that W. H. Kennedy, after the sale, declined to consider any outside offer to purchase, giving as a reason that he had agreed to allow the Wade heirs to redeem or buy back the land. W. H. Kennedy does not deny the contract set up in the complaint, but merely says that he does not remember it. It is manifest from the conversation after the sale that W. H. Kennedy regarded himself in control of the land after the purchase by his son. From a review of the testimony we think it clear the father and son were acting throughout the whole transaction in concert, and not independently, and that A. M. Kennedy is in no position to disavow his father's actions or promises before the sale. In addition to this, a number of the Wade heirs paid in the aggregate, through W. D. Wade, to A. M. Kennedy, about $300—their share of the surplus proceeds of the master's sale—on this agreement for redemption made before the sale, and these payments have never been refunded to them. The owners of the property were lulled into allowing the property to be bought for much less than its value by the promise or representation of the purchasers that they should have a chance to redeem it. To have their bargain, the purchasers must carry out the promise or representation which they made, and it is of no consequence that the promise or representation did not amount to a legal contract. Having escaped from the promise under the statute of frauds, and because the promise was not sufficiently definite for legal enforcement, they cannot hold the bargain obtained by the promise, for that would be a fraud. McDonald v. May, 1 Rich. Eq. 91; Schmidt v. Gatewood, 2 Rich. Eq. 177; Rorer on Judicial Sales, § 1111. In this view the question whether the Kennedys participated in the steps taken to chill the bidding is of no consequence.

With this application of the law to the facts of the case, we now consider whether it was error for the circuit judge, at the conclusion of his decree, to allow the plaintiffs "to amend the complaint in such particulars as they may be advised necessary to raise the question of the validity of the sale of the tract of land described in the complaint." Amendment of pleadings to conform them to the facts proved, when the amendment "does not change substantially the claim or defense," is in the discretion of the circuit judge. Association v. Waters, 50 S. C. 459, 27 S. E. 948; Whitmire v. Boyd, 53 S. C. 815, 31 S. E. 306. In this case the allegations of the complaint as against W. H. Kennedy and A. M. Kennedy were as appropriate to a demand that the sale be set aside as to a demand for specific performance. Scrutiny of the complaint leads to the conclusion that no allegation necessary to a judgment annulling the sale is omitted. The promise, the reliance of plaintiffs on it, the repudiation of it by defendants, the resulting loss to plaintiffs and gain to defendants, are all alleged. The proof was directed to these issues. It is true, in their demand for judgment the plaintiffs ask for specific performance, and not to have the sale set aside; but the demand is not a part of the cause of action, and is not controlling. Westlake v. Farrow, 34 S. C. 273, 13 S. E. 469. As is said in Sheppard v. Green, 48 S. C. 175, 23 S. E. 228: "It is well settled that the plaintiffs may obtain any relief appropriate to the case made by the pleadings and evidence, without regard to the form of the prayer for relief." The amendment allowed will not present a distinct and different cause of action which would have to be established by different and distinct proof, and therefore does not come within the rule laid down in Whaley v. Stevens, 24 S. C. 479, and other similar cases. It is manifest from his decree that the circuit judge declined to set the sale aside without the amendment in careful concern that the defendants interested in sustaining the sale might have no ground to complain that the sale had been set aside without full opportunity being given to them to be heard as to the propriety of that particular relief.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

1. A complaint is not subject to demurrer on the ground that from the face of the complaint it appears that several causes of action have been improperly joined, where the allegations are set forth in form as a single cause of action.

Appeal from Common Pleas, Circuit Court of Charleston County; Purdy, Judge.

George H. Moffett, for appellant. John R. Bellinger, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The question presented by the exceptions in this case is whether a complaint is subject to a demurrer on the ground it appears upon the face of the complaint that several causes of action have been improperly united, when the allegations are set forth, in form, as a single cause of action. This question is conclusively settled by the case of Cartin v. R. R., 43 S. C. 221, 20 S. E. 979, 49 Am. St. Rep. 829, in which the court uses this language: "If two causes of action were set forth in the complaint, without being separately stated, the defendant, it is true, had the right to make a motion that the complaint be made more definite and certain, or, if allegations were made which were unnecessary to sustain the cause of action stated in the complaint, to make a motion to strike out such allegations as irrelevant and as surplusage. Pom. R. & R. R. §§ 447, 451. If the defendant waived said objections by failing to make such motions, then the plaintiff had the right to the relief to which all the allegations showed he was entitled." The foregoing case shows that a demurrer was not the appellant's proper remedy.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 23, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL.

1. An appeal will not lie by defendant in a criminal case from an order setting aside a verdict on motion of the state.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Chesterfield County; Buchanan, Judge.

Henry Timmons was indicted for crime. From an order setting aside the verdict on motion of the state, he appeals. Dismissed.

Stevenson & Matheson, for appellant. J. M. Johnson, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The defendant was tried under an indictment containing two counts. The jury rendered the following verdict: "Guilty of the second, not of the first, count." On motion of the solicitor, his honor the presiding judge granted an order that the verdict be set aside and a new trial had. The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions: "(1) Because the court erred in setting aside a verdict of acquittal on the first count, and in ordering a new trial, for the reason that it will subject the defendant to a second jeopardy. (2) Because it is not competent for the state to move to set aside a verdict of acquittal and for a new trial, because it enables the state to subject the defendant twice to jeopardy for one offense. (3) Because the acquittal on the first count ended the prosecution as to that count, and no new trial could be granted thereon without the consent of the defendant."

The solicitor raised the objection that the said order was not appealable. This question has been so recently decided by this court in the case of State v. Hughes, 58 S. C. 540, 35 S. E. 214, that we deem it only necessary to refer to that case to show that the appeal is premature. The case just cited decides that a defendant in a criminal case cannot appeal except from the final sentence imposed by the court.

It is the judgment of this court that the appeal be dismissed.

MILSTER et al. v. CITY COUNCIL OF SPARTANBURG et al.

MANDAMUS TO CITY—ATTORNEY'S FEES—AGENCY.

1 Where a petitioner had brought mandamus to require a city council to collect, and a manufacturing company to pay, back taxes, and the relief is granted, the petitioner is not such a representative of the city as would make his contract for attorney's fees binding on the city.

2 In mandamus proceedings to compel the city to collect taxes, where the relief is granted, the court has no control of the funds, so as to authorize payment of attorney's fees out of the same.

Petition by J. H. Milster and H. G. Abbott for writ of mandamus against the city council of Spartanburg and the Spartan Mills. Motion by attorneys for petitioners to ascertain fee. Refused.

For former opinion, see 46 S. E. 539.

Sease & Hoke, for the motion. Simpson & Bomar, Ralph K. Carson, and Mr. Sanders, opposed.

PER CURIAM. In this petition for mandamus to compel the city council of Spartanburg to collect and the Spartan Mills to pay municipal taxes on property of the Spartan Mills which the city council had undertaken to practically exempt from taxation, the petitioners asked the court to order the payment of reasonable counsel fees to their attorneys. The exemption from taxation was held unconstitutional, and the court ordered a writ to be issued, requiring the Spartan Mills to pay the unpaid municipal taxes on all its property in the city which had fallen due within six years prior to the filing of the petition.

Messrs. Sease & Hoke, attorneys for the petitioners, now move for an order of reference to ascertain what fee should be allowed them from the taxes thus brought into the city treasury. The city council opposes the motion, insisting that these gentlemen were not attorneys for the city of Spartanburg or for the city council, and that, even if they had been, the court is not in control of any funds from which it could, on motion, order the fee paid. In the case of Park v. Laurens (S. C.) 46 S. E. 1012, it was held that a petitioner standing in precisely the same relation to the city of Laurens and its city council as Milster and Abbott stood to the city of Spartanburg and its council could not be regarded the representative of the municipality, so as to make his contracts for reasonable counsel fees binding on the city as its representative. This motion would therefore have to be refused on that ground.

We think the other position taken by the city of Spartanburg is at least as strong. Mandamus is thus defined in High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, 4: "The modern writ of mandamus may be defined as a command issuing from a common-law court of competent jurisdiction, in the name of the state or sovereign, directed to some corporation, officer, or inferior court, requiring the performance of a particular duty therein specified, which duty results from the official station of the party to whom the writ is directed, or from operation of law." It is manifest, therefore, that in a mandamus proceeding the petitioner does not bring into the care or custody of the court property for administration or distribution. The proceeding relates entirely to the performance of a specifically alleged legal duty by persons charged therewith, and the court, through the writ, orders those persons to perform such specific legal duty. Such an order may direct the payment of money, as in this instance, but the court never has the money in its charge, and can make no disposition of it, further than to enforce obedience to the writ of mandamus. Upon payment and receipt of the money as required by the writ, the power of the court is exhausted. If the city of Spartanburg, through its council, had contracted with attorneys to institute mandamus proceedings to require the Spartan Mills to pay its taxes, and had expressly agreed to pay a fee in event of success, and all this had been set out in the petition, the court could not enforce the contract in the mandamus proceeding. Even in that case the contract would have been enforceable like any other by a suit between the contracting parties.

The only possible ground on which this claim could be placed is that Abbott and Milster, as citizens and taxpayers, should be regarded as representing the city in a matter of public concern, in which the city council refused to act for the city. Even if their contract for attorneys' fees could be regarded as a contract of the city, and standing on as high ground as if it had been made directly with the city council, payment of the fees could not be adjudged in a mandamus proceeding. In such a proceeding the court has no control of the funds after they are paid to the city council. If there is any contract, express or implied, with either the petitioners or their attorneys, it can only be enforced by a direct suit against the city.

The proceeding has resulted in a large accretion to the city treasury, but we cannot violate the settled rules of law to provide for the payment of the fees of the attorneys who conducted it to a successful issue. The motion is therefore refused.

STATE v. BANKS.

March 22, 1904.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Upon the trial of an indictment for unlawful and malicious shooting with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill, it is error to instruct the jury that if they believe there was a quarrel between the accused and F., and that both were in fault, and that a combat, as the result of the quarrel, took place, and the accused shot and wounded F., "in order to reduce the offense from malicious to unlawful shooting, two things must appear from the evidence and circumstances of the case: First, that, before the shot was fired and the wound inflicted, the accused declined further combat, and retreated as far as he could with safety; and, secondly, that he necessarily shot F. in order to preserve his own life or to protect himself from great bodily harm."

Error to Circuit Court, Logan County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Levi Banks was convicted of malicious shooting, and brings error. Reversed.

John S. Marcum and Ragland & England, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the State.

McWHORTER, J. Levi Banks was indicted in the circuit court of Logan county for unlawful and malicious shooting with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill Jonah Ferguson, on the 3d day of May, 1903. He pleaded "Not guilty." A jury was impaneled, and, after hearing the evidence and instructions of the court, rendered a verdict of not guilty of the malicious shooting, but guilty of unlawful shooting and wounding. The prisoner moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial on the ground that the same was contrary to the law and the evidence. The court overruled the motion, and refused to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, and ascertained the term of prisoner's confinement in the penitentiary at three years, and rendered judgment accordingly, to all of which rulings the defendant excepted. The defendant, in the course of the trial, took four several bills of exceptions to the rulings of the court, which were signed, sealed, and made a part of the record. A writ of error and supersedeas were awarded him.

The first and second bills of exceptions go to the rulings of the court in refusing to quash the panel of 20 jurors, on the motion of the defendant, because of irregularity in the summoning of the jurors. While the record shows some irregularity, it shows that the persons who were regularly drawn were summoned, and the same persons served as jurors, and there was no such irregularity as could possibly have prejudiced the defendant's case.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 is to the ruling of the court in granting instructions on behalf of the state, Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The first instruction on the question of self-defense is sufficient and proper. The second and third instructions are as follows: "(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe there was a quarrel between the prisoner and Jonah Ferguson, and that both were in fault, and that a combat, as a result of such quarrel, took place, and that the prisoner shot and wounded Jonah Ferguson, in order to reduce the offense from malicious to unlawful shooting, two things must appear from the evidence and circumstances of the case: First, that, before the shot was fired and the wound inflicted, the prisoner, Levi Banks, declined further combat, and retreated as far as he could with safety; and, secondly, that he necessarily shot the said Jonah Ferguson in order to preserve his own life or to protect himself from great bodily harm. (3) The court instructs the jury that, on the trial of this case, if the prisoner, Levi Banks, relies upon self-defense to excuse him in shooting and wounding Jonah Ferguson, the person named in the indictment, in order that such defense may avail the prisoner the jury should believe from all the evidence in the case that the necessity relied on to justify the shooting and wounding did not arise out of the prisoner's own misconduct." As to instruction No. 2, it is evidently an abortive attempt to revamp the instruction set out in point 6 of syllabus, State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679, and apply it to this case. It will be seen, by reference to the instruction as here given, that the jury are told that, to reduce the offense from malicious to unlawful shooting, two things must appear from the evidence and circumstances of the case: First, that, before the shot was fired and the wound inflicted, the prisoner, Levi Banks, declined further combat, and retreated as far as he could with safety; and, secondly, that he necessarily shot the said Jonah Ferguson in order to preserve his own life or to protect himself from great bodily harm—thus telling the jury that, if both propositions were true, the defendant was still guilty of unlawful shooting, when, as a matter of fact, if they were true, the defendant, in firing the shot, was acting wholly in self-defense, and was entitled to a verdict of acquittal. If he had retreated as far as he could with safety, and then necessarily had to shoot in order to preserve his own life or to protect himself from great bodily harm, he would have been justified in firing the shot, and it could not have amounted to unlawful shooting. The verdict of the jury clearly shows that they were influenced by this instruction, as the language of the verdict shows that they had it in mind when they wrote their verdict. The third instruction, while it may be good as an abstract proposition of law, yet it should not have been given in connection with No. 2. In State v. Douglass, 28 W. Va. 298 (Syl., point 6), it is held: "Where an erroneous instruction has been given to the jury, the presumption is that the exceptor has been prejudiced thereby, and the judgment will be reversed for such cause, unless it clearly appears from the record that the exceptor could not have been so prejudiced." Instruction No. 2 is clearly bad, and it is not only presumable, but quite certain, that the jury were influenced by it in arriving at their conclusion and verdict.

Bill of exceptions No. 4 relates to the evidence only, and the defendant does not seem to rely upon it; and, as the case will have to be retried, I deem it unnecessary to take up the matter of the evidence.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

BRYAN v. McCANN et al.

March 22, 1904.)

TRUST—BILL TO ENFORCE—PARTIES.

1. A trustee filed his bill and amended bill to remove an alleged cloud upon the title to trust property; to ascertain and fix the amount of the trust debt, which is controverted by the debtors; and to obtain a decree to sell the property for the amount of the debt, when so ascertained and fixed. The court decreed a cancellation of the tax deed, alleged to be a cloud upon the title, ascertained and fixed the amount of the trust debt, and decreed that the trustee shall recover of the debtors the amount so ascertained and fixed by the court, and that, in default of payment within the time prescribed, the trustee, as special commissioner, shall sell the trust property. The administrator of the deceased trust creditor is not a party to the suit, although it appears therein that the trust creditor had died intestate, and that her administrator had been appointed and qualified as such before the institution of the suit.

Held, that the decree is erroneous, because the same was made and entered in the absence of a necessary party, and because the recovery in the name of the trustee is unwarranted.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Bill by T. J. Bryan against J. L. McCann and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Simms & Enslow, for appellants. Vinson & Thompson and T. J. Bryan, for appellee.

MILLER, J. By deed of trust executed by C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann his wife, bearing date on the 30th day of April, 1891, they conveyed to the plaintiff, T. J. Bryan, trustee, a certain house and lot then owned by said C. A. McCann, situate in Central City, in the county of Cabell, to secure to Elizabeth A. Foster the payment of the note of said C. A. McCann for $500, payable one year after its date at the Huntington National Bank, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per centum per annum. The note was not paid at its maturity, but Mrs. Foster then took no steps to collect the same. Various payments thereon were made to her from time to time. After the execution of the deed of trust, the property was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1898; and on the 11th day of January, 1900, the same was sold by the sheriff, for said delinquent taxes, and was bought by J. L. McCann, a son of the grantors in the deed of trust, who was then about 23 years of age, and in business for himself, although living with his parents. In the year 1900 Mrs. Foster died intestate, leaving surviving her two brothers, W. H. Howe and F. C. Howe. In December, 1900, W. H. Howe was appointed and qualified as her administrator, and afterwards the administrator, W. H. Howe, requested the trustee, T. J. Bryan, to sell the property under the deed of trust for said indebtedness, when it was discovered that the property had been returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon and sold as aforesaid. Thereupon, at the January rules, 1901, for the circuit court of said county, the trustee filed his bill against said C. A. McCann, S. C. McCann, and J. L. McCann; alleging that the principal of said note, with about $150 of the interest thereon, was still due and unpaid, and praying that said tax deed be set aside and annulled; stating as a reason therefor that the same had been irregularly and fraudulently procured and executed, and that it was a cloud upon the title of said property. The defendant J. L. McCann demurred to the bill, which demurrer being overruled, he filed his answer, in which he avers that he purchased said property at the tax sale for the sum of $40.06; that after his said purchase he paid the taxes charged and due upon said property for the years 1899 and 1900; and that the amount of said taxes so paid by him, with the interest thereon, then amounted to about $100, which sum said trustee should pay before he would be entitled to redeem said property. Respondent further says that said trustee did not pay or tender to him the said taxes paid by him as aforesaid before the execution and delivery to him of said deed by the clerk of the county court, but that the trustee did pay to the clerk said $40.06, with interest thereon. Defendants C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann also filed their demurrer and answer to the bill, in which answer they deny that they are indebted to said Elizabeth Foster in the sum of $500, and interest thereon, as aforesaid. Upon the contrary, they allege and charge that, upon a true statement of the account between the parties, the said loan will be found to be fully paid off and satisfied, provided the interest thereon be charged only at the rate of 6 per centum per annum. They also deny all of the other allegations of the bill. Depositions for both plaintiff and defendants were afterwards taken and filed in the cause, relating to the trust debt, the amount thereof, and to the tax deed to defendant, J. L. McCann. After the depositions were all taken and filed as aforesaid, to wit, on the 21st day of July, 1902, the plaintiff filed his amended bill in the cause against said C. A. McCann, S. C. McCann, and J. L. McCann, but did not make the administrator of Mrs. Foster a party thereto. In the amended bill the plaintiff amplifies his averments in the original bill as to the $500 trust debt, and says that said C. A. McCann made default in the payment of the note when it became due, but that Mrs. Foster took no steps to collect the same; that C. A. McCann paid the interest on it for several years, and that on the 30th day of October, 1899, C. A. McCann still being in default in the payment of the interest, a settlement was made between him and Mrs. Foster concerning the interest due upon the said note, the principal never having been paid, when it was found that there was then due $133.70 of interest upon the debt, whereupon said C. A. McCann and S. A. McCann executed to Mrs. Foster their joint note for said $133.70, payable one year after its date, with interest, which note was not paid at maturity, but remains unpaid; and that said $500 note, with its accrued interest, is also unpaid. The death of Mrs. Foster, the appointment and qualification of said W. H. Howe as her administrator, the sale and purchase of said property for the delinquent taxes thereon, and the conveyance thereof to J. L. McCann, are all reiterated in the amended bill, with a prayer that the tax deed be canceled, and that the property be sold to satisfy the plaintiff's demand as therein stated. The said J. L. McCann demurred to and also answered the amended bill, denying the several material allegations thereof. The defendants C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann, not waiving their demurrer thereto, but insisting on the same, also filed their answer to said amended bill, in which they rely upon the allegations of their original answer, and also deny the averments of the amended bill. On the 2d day of August, 1902, Annie B. Thompson and the Huntington National Bank filed their petition in said cause setting up a lien on the property of said C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann described in the bill, and praying that they be made parties to the cause, and that their lien be protected. Thereupon they were made parties to the suit. On the same day, to wit, on the 2d day of August, 1902, the cause came on to be heard, and was heard by the court, upon the process executed upon the defendants, the bill and exhibits therewith filed, the said amended bill, the said answers of each of the defendants to the bill and amended bill, with general replication to said answers, and upon the depositions taken and filed in the cause as aforesaid. Upon consideration thereof, it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said tax deed was and is fraudulent and void, and was and is a cloud upon the plaintiff's title to said property, and the said tax deed was then set aside and held for naught; and the court having ascertained that there was then due from the defendants C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann, upon the debts in the plaintiff's bill set up, the sum of $737.71, it was further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff should recover against said C. A. McCann and S. C. McCann said sum of $737.71, with interest thereon from that date until paid, and that he also recover from said C. A. McCann, S. C. McCann, and J. L. McCann the costs of said suit by him expended. It was further decreed that unless the defendants, or some of them, should, within twenty days thereafter, pay the said sums decreed against them as aforesaid, then the plaintiff, T. J. Bryan, trustee, who was by said decree appointed special commissioner for the purpose, should sell said property for cash. From this decree the defendants, C. A. McCann, S. C. McCann, and J. L. McCann, were allowed an appeal, and assign as grounds of error that the administrator of said Elizabeth A. Foster is not a party to said cause, and that the court erred in decreeing that said T. J. Bryan, trustee, was entitled, as plaintiff, to recover said debt from defendants.

A trustee may apply to a court of equity to remove impediments to a fair execution of his trust, to remove a cloud hanging over the title to the property conveyed to him in trust to secure the payment of a debt or debts, and to adjust accounts, if necessary, in order to ascertain the actual debts which ought to be raised by the sale, or the amount of prior incumbrances. Machir v. Schon, 14 W. Va. 777, 783; Ambler, Trustee, v. Leach et al., 15 W. Va. 677; Johnson v. Johnson, 30 Ill. 215; Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492. A trustee may, under circumstances, in order to remove a cloud upon the title to the realty conveyed to him in trust, file a bill in equity to set aside and have declared void a tax deed made under the provisions of the statute. Burlew, Trustee, v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108. Having taken jurisdiction to remove the alleged cloud upon the title of the property, the court in this cause should go on and ascertain the liens thereon, with the amounts thereof, provided the proper parties are before the court upon sufficient pleadings for that purpose. When a court of equity takes jurisdiction of a cause for one purpose, it will go on and dispose of the questions involved, to avoid a multiplicity of suits. Watson v. Watson, 45 W. Va. 290, 81 S. E. 939;

Robinson v. Braidon, 44 W. Va. 183, 28 S. E. 798; Chrislip v. Teter, 43 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. 288; Hanly v. Watterson, 39 W. Va. 214, 19 S. E. 536.

The notes of defendants C. A. and S. C. McCann to Mrs. Foster, and the money due thereon, if any, belonged to the administrator, W. H. Howe, for the purposes of administration. The title of that and the other personal property of the intestate vested in him upon his appointment and qualification as her administrator as aforesaid, and related back, after his qualification, to the instant of the death of his intestate. Schouler's Ex'rs & Adm'rs, § 190; Woerner on Amer. Adml. pp. 385, 409, 411. Before and at the time of the institution of the suit, W. H. Howe was, in law, the creditor as to the two notes executed by the McCanns to Mrs. Foster. No principle of equity is more familiar or better settled than this: That all persons materially interested in the subject in controversy ought to be made parties in equity, and, if they are not, the defect may be taken advantage of either by demurrer or by the court at the hearing. Armentrout's Ex'rs v. Gibbons, 25 Grat. 371. Burlew, Trustee, v. Quarrier et al., 16 W. Va. 108; Howard v. Stephenson, 33 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. 66; Rexroad v. McQuain, 24 W. Va. 32; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59.

One of the material questions raised and controverted by the pleadings, and upon which proof was taken and filed is the amount, if any, which is due the estate of Mrs. Foster from C. A. and S. C. McCann upon their notes to her, constituting a part of the assets of decedent's estate. Bryan, trustee, the plaintiff, has no pecuniary or personal interest in the debt. He merely holds the legal title to the property conveyed to him in trust by the trust deed as security for the debt. As a general rule, a trustee's authority over the trust property is defined and limited by the instrument creating the trust, and he should be guided strictly by its provisions. Atkinson v. Beckett, 34 W. Va. 584, 12 S. E. 717. He is the agent for both the creditor and debtor in the debt for which the trust is given. It is the duty of the trustee to look to the rights and interests of the trust debtor, as well as to those of the trust creditor. He is bound to act impartially between them. Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492; Livey v. Winton, 30 W. Va. 554, 4 S. E. 451; Hartman v. Evans, 38 W. Va. C69, 18 S. E. 810. Unless the trustee is authorized to do so by the instrument conferring his authority, under which he acts, he cannot collect the trust funds, and give acquittances or releases therefor. As trustee, he should not be a contesting litigant in the matter of which he is trustee, to contest with the creditor or debtor the amount or validity of the trust debt; but, in equity, he should always be a party as trustee. Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. 561. There must be an administrator to represent it, before an adjudication can be had in court concerning the personal property of an intestate decedent. 15 L. R. A. 491, note; Smith v. Denny, 37 Mo. 20; Hays' Ex'r v. Hays, 5 Munf. 418; Weeks v. Jewett, 45 N. H. 540.

The attempted adjudication of the amount due on the trust debt was between the trustee, on the one side, and the makers of the notes, C. A. and S. C. McCann, on the other side. The ascertainment and decree of the court thereon do not bind either the estate of Mrs. Foster, because her administrator was not a party thereto, or the debtors, because there was no issue between the administrator and themselves concerning said debt, which is controverted by them in their answer. A sale under the decree complained of would not discharge the lien of the deed of trust on the property, because the creditor, the administrator of Mrs. Foster, was not a party to the suit, and not bound by the decree. The debtors and the owners of the property are entitled, on the payment of the debt, under the decree or otherwise, to have the lien of the deed of trust released. The purchaser is likewise entitled to take it free from the incumbrance. The trustee cannot legally release the trust deed.

From what has been said, it follows that the court should have sustained the demurrers to both the original and amended bills for want of proper parties, and, not having done so, it should have directed the necessary parties to be made at the hearing. It is immaterial in what manner it is brought to the attention of this court that the decree complained of was rendered in the absence of proper parties; the decree will be reversed and the cause remanded in order that proper parties may be made. Gallatin L. C. & O. Co. v. Davis et al., 44 W. Va. 109, 28 S. E. 747; Reger v. Gall, 54 W. Va. —, 46 S. E. 147.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Cabell county for further proceedings to be had therein according to the views herein expressed, and further according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

CORLEY v. CORLEY.

April 11, 1903.)

Petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 44 S. E. 182.

POFFENBARGER, J. It is insisted, upon the authority of Tompkins' Ex'r v. Stephens, 10 W. Va. 156, and certain Virginia cases, that the order in question is appealable. In Tompkins' Ex'r v. Stephens, an order setting aside a verdict rendered on the trial of an issue out of chancery was held to be appealable, and reversed. Point 1 of the syllabus holds that a decree granting or refusing a new trial on an issue out of chancery is reviewable, without saying whether a final decree is necessary to the entertainment of the appeal, and the opinion is silent on that question; but the court did entertain it, and hence the case establishes a precedent where a new trial has been granted, but not where it has been refused, and no final decree entered. The authorities cited by Judge Green for the doctrine announced in the syllabus are all actions at law. One was on a demurrer to evidence, making it the duty of the court to render a judgment one way or the other, and in the other two there were final judgments following the orders relating to the verdicts. After merely referring to these cases: Knox v. Garland, 2 Call. 241, Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. 213, and Pleasants v. Clements, 2 Leigh, 474, he says: "And I see no good reason why the same practice should not prevail in reference to granting or refusing new trials on issue out of chancery." Neither any of these cases nor Tompkins' Ex'r v. Stephens sets a precedent for entertaining an appeal from a mere order refusing a new trial, and we cannot go beyond them in view of the well-nigh universal rule that appeals cannot be taken except from decrees that are final in some sense, either absolutely or as settling the principles of the cause.

As shown in the opinion, the orders from which this appeal is sought to be taken settle nothing in the cause. An order granting a new trial might be different. Clause 9, § 1, c. 135, Code 1899, allows an appeal in such case, but not from an order refusing a new trial, and in the latter case a writ of error is never allowed except from the judgment entered on the verdict. Reed v. Cline's Heirs, 9 Grat. 136, is relied upon as holding that an order directing an issue out of chancery is appealable. But that case lays an important restriction on this assertion. It says: "There may be an appeal from a decree directing an issue where the decree impliedly involves a settlement of the principles of the cause," and no authority is cited in the opinion for the principle, even under that restriction. In that case the appeal was entertained because in directing the issue the court impliedly held "that the statute of limitations and the staleness of the demand" were not "sufficient defenses against the complainant's demand." Even if this reasoning is sound, and would be followed now, this case is not within its scope, for it presents but a single question of liability upon an alleged contract, which was in no sense prejudiced by the order directing the issue. Reed v. Cline's Heirs was followed by Wise v. Lamb, 9 Grat. 309, but in that case there was a final decree in accordance with the verdict. Although Wise v. Lamb approves the doctrine of Reed v. Cline's Heirs, it does not decide the same question, and cannot be said to be another precedent. In Beverly v. Walden, 20 Grat. 147, in which there had been no final decree when the appeal was taken, the evidence had all been taken, and clearly showed that the plaintiff was not entitled to relief, and that a decree dismissing the bill should have been pronounced when the issue was directed, and it was dismissed in the appellate court. We have no such condition here.

As the case cannot be brought within the reasoning of any of the cases referred to, a rehearing would only result in delay and final dismissal of the appeal; hence it is refused.

STATE v. BRUCE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1904.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SALES OF OLEOMARGARINE.

1. State v. Myers, 26 S. E. 539, 42 W. Va. 822, 35 L. R. A. 844, 57 Am. St. Rep. 887, overruled.

2. Chapter 8, p. 12, Acts 1891, Code 1899, p. 1115, being in contravention of the Constitution and laws of the United States, is invalid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

J. A. B. Bruce was indicted for selling oleomargarine, and from conviction appealed to the circuit court for writ of error, and from a denial of the same he brings error. Reversed.

A. W. Reynolds, for plaintiff in error.
The Attorney General, for the State.

McWHORTER, J. Under chapter 8, p. 12, Acts 1891, of the Legislature, found at page 1115 of the Code of 1899, J. A. B. Bruce was indicted and convicted in the criminal court of Mercer county, and fined $20, for the violation of said statute as a vender of oleomargarine, adulterated or artificial butter, and unlawfully exposing the same for sale, without the same being then and there colored pink. The defendant demurred to the indictment, which demurrer was overruled by the court. The defendant then entered a plea of not guilty. A jury was impaneled, and the following statement of facts: "It is admitted by the parties in this case that the defendant, J. A. B. Bruce, is a retail dealer in oleomargarine at his place of business in the city of Bluefield, Mercer county, West Virginia, and, as such retail dealer, sold to a customer, on or about the 10th day of February, 1902, at his said place of business in the said city of Bluefield, Mercer county, West Virginia, one package of oleomargarine, less in quantity than ten pounds, which was properly stamped in accordance with the laws of the United States, and the said sale was in all particulars strictly in accordance with the laws of the United States, the said defendant being then a duly licensed retail dealer in oleomargarine, by authority of and pursuant to the laws of the United States, at his said place of business; that the said oleomargarine was part of a shipment of oleomargarine which had been purchased at wholesale, strictly in accordance with and pursuant to the laws of the United States, from the Capital City Dairy Company, at the city of Columbus, in the state of Ohio, and was shipped to him from the place of business of the said Capital City Dairy Company, in the state of Ohio, to Bluefield, Mercer county, West Virginia aforesaid, the said Capital City Dairy Company being a duly licensed wholesale dealer in oleomargarine, under and pursuant to the laws of the United States; that the said oleomargarine was a pure, standard article of oleomargarine, such as is recognized by the laws of the United States as a proper and lawful article of interstate commerce, and the same article of food, by the name of 'oleomargarine,' referred to in the laws of the United States in force at the time of the said sale by the defendant to his customer, and at the time of his purchase thereof in the original package from the said Capital City Dairy Company, regulating the sales thereof, and the said oleomargarine was not colored pink"—was by agreement introduced as evidence at the trial, subject to the instructions of the court to the jury thereon; with which statement of facts the state rested its case. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict of the jury, and grant him a new trial, upon grounds set out in his bill of exceptions, which motion was overruled by the court, and judgment entered for a fine of $20, to which ruling of the court the defendant excepted. The defendant presented its petition, accompanied by a copy of the record, to the circuit court of Mercer county, praying for a writ of error to the judgment of the criminal court, which writ was refused by the said circuit court. He then obtained, upon petition to this court, from one of the judges thereof, a writ of error to the said judgment of the circuit court in refusing said writ and a writ of error and supersedeas to the judgment of the criminal court. Upon the trial of the case the defendant asked the court to give the following instruction to the jury: "The court instructs the jury that chapter 8 of the Acts of the Legislature of West Virginia, 1891, adopted in the Code of West Virginia, 1899, is in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and is therefore unconstitutional and void, and upon the evidence and facts proved in this case the jury shall find for the defendant;" which the court refused to give and the attorney for the state asked the court to instruct the jury "that under the evidence in this case they should find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment," which instruction the court gave, over the objection and exception of the said defendant.

Among the grounds upon which the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, as set out in the bill of exceptions taken by the defendant, are the following: "(1) Chapter 8 of the Acts of the Legislature of West Virginia, 1891, which was adopted into the Code of West Virginia, 1899, is unconstitutional and void. This statute is in contravention of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that Congress shall have the power 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes,' in that it burdens and prohibits interstate commerce in an article of commerce which is recognized by the acts of Congress and the laws of the United States as a proper subject or article of interstate commerce. (2) That said statute is in contravention of that portion of article 6 of the Constitution of the United States which declares that 'this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, * * * shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding,' in that it nullifies pro tanto a regulation of interstate commerce by Congress. (3) Congress passed laws fully regulating the sale of oleomargarine at retail, which laws were in full force at the time of the sale made by the defendant in this case. The sale made by the defendant was authorized by the acts of Congress so regulating such sales, and the defendant had fully complied therewith, and the sale was made strictly pursuant thereto, and said act of the Legislature of West Virginia under which this indictment was made is in contravention of the laws of the United States, in that it imposes an unreasonable burden, restriction, and prohibition upon and against such sales so authorized by the laws of the United States, the result of which is to restrict and prohibit interstate commerce in this recognized article of commerce." Also the overruling of the demurrer to the indictment, and in refusing to give the instruction to the jury asked by the defendant, and giving the instruction asked by the state.

In State v. Myers, 42 W. Va. 822, 26 S. E. 539, 35 L. R. A. 844, 57 Am. St. Rep. 887, decided December 16, 1896, the act of 1891 under which this indictment was found was held to be "not unconstitutional." Since the decision in that case the United States Supreme Court, in case of Collins v. New Hampshire, 171 U. S. 30, 18 Sup. Ct. 768, 43 L. Ed. 60, decided May 23, 1898, passed upon a statute of New Hampshire similar to our statute, the syllabus of which decision is as follows: "Following the decision in Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania [171 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 757, 43 L. Ed. 49], the court holds that the statute of New Hampshire prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, unless it is of a pink color, is invalid, as being, in necessary effect, prohibitory." The case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, referred to in said syllabus, was decided by the Supreme Court on the same date, and is reported in the same volume, immediately preceding the Collins Case. These cases conclusively settle the question involved in the case at bar, and it is deemed unnecessary to reiterate here the reasons set forth in those cases for the decision. It follows that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, and, further, in giving the instruction asked by the state, and refusing to give the instruction asked for the defendant as set out in the bill of exceptions. The decision in the case of State v. Myers, 42 W. Va. 822, 26 S. E. 530, 35 L. R. A. 844, 57 Am. St. Rep. 897, is overruled.

The judgment of the circuit court in refusing to grant a writ of error, and the judgment of the criminal court, and the verdict of the jury, are set aside, and the indictment dismissed.

(35 W. Va. 379)

STATE v. BALLARD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1904.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—VERDICT.

I. B. is indicted for the unlawful and felonious attempt to feloniously, willfully, maliciously, deliberately, and unlawfully slay, kill, and murder K. The jury found B. guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the second degree, as charged in the indictment. The facts and circumstances prove that, if the pistol shot, alleged in the indictment, and fired by B. at K., but which did not strike him, had resulted fatally to K., B. would not have been guilty of either murder of the first degree, murder of the second degree, or voluntary manslaughter.

Held, that the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court thereon, fixing the fine of defendant at $50, and imposing upon him imprisonment in the county jail for the period of six months, are erroneous.

Error to Circuit Court, Boone County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

O. M. Ballard was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and brings error. Reversed.

W. L. Ashby, for plaintiff in error. L. Fuller, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MILLER, J. At the October term, 1902, of the circuit court of Boone county, O. M. Ballard, the plaintiff in error, was indicted for the unlawful and felonious attempt to feloniously, willfully, maliciously, deliberately, and unlawfully slay, kill, and murder one H. H. Kessinger. At the same term he entered his plea of not guilty to the indictment and was put upon his trial before a jury, which returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the prisoner, O. M. Ballard, guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the second degree, as charged in the within indictment." Thereupon the prisoner, by his attorney, moved the court in arrest of judgment, and also to set aside the verdict of the jury, and to grant him a new trial upon the indictment; but the court overruled said motions, and the prisoner excepted; whereupon the court fixed his fine at $50, imposed imprisonment upon him for a period of six months in the county jail, and entered judgment upon said verdict accordingly. To this judgment the plaintiff in error was granted a writ of error, and says that the evidence in the case wholly fails to sustain the verdict of the jury and the judgment thereon, and prays the reversal of said judgment.

The evidence adduced on the trial is certified and made part of the record, and proves the following facts: On the 15th day of August, 1902, at a church in said county, between four and five miles from the home of said Kessinger, and a greater distance from the residence of Ballard, the two had some hot and disrespectful words, and a threat on the part of Ballard to fight Kessinger is shown. Some time afterwards the parties, with others, but not together, started homeward, both traveling in the same direction and over the same road. It appears that Kessinger and some others were at first in the advance, but that Ballard and another young man passed them on the road. Shortly after this, Kessinger quickened the pace of the mule upon which he was riding, and overtook Ballard, who was on horseback. Kessinger testifies that he then told Ballard "to get off his horse, and let us have a fair fight with our fists, and have it out there. * * * I called him a few names." He admits that, in order to overtake Ballard, he racked and trotted his mule, and might have loped him some. He also says that he cursed and abused Ballard, and told him to get down and fight, and says that he might have called him "a s— of a b—, or something like that;" and further admits that, when he started his mule in a rack, he meant to overtake Ballard, and "allowed that we might have a little fair fight, and there would be no more of it. I told him that's the way I wanted to fight." It is also shown that, just before Ballard and Kessinger reached the place of the shooting on the public road, Kessinger dismounted, and said to Ballard that he intended to whip him; but Ballard told him that he was not going to get off; that very soon thereafter Kessinger threw a rock, which struck Ballard on the side of the head, knocking off his hat and hurting Ballard, as he says, a great deal; and a little later Kessinger threw a second rock, which struck Ballard in the back. Kessinger then advanced toward Ballard a few steps, when Ballard turned in his saddle, without stopping his horse, which he says was in a little trot, and fired his pistol in the direction of Kessinger. There is no dispute about the throwing of the rocks by Kessinger, or of their striking Ballard as stated. Kessinger admits that he threw the rocks before the shooting, and that it all occurred in a few seconds. Ballard swears that when he fired he neither stopped his horse nor slowed him up; that he shot in the direction of Kessinger after he received the stroke from the second rock; that he shot because he was afraid Kessinger would follow him up and throw more rocks at him; that he shot to the left of Kessinger; and that, if he had stopped his horse and taken aim, he could have hit Kessinger. It is shown that at the time they were not more than 10 or 15 feet apart. Ballard further testifies that he had put his pistol in his pocket the night before, when he had no thought of Kessinger; that he did not have his pistol for the purpose of shooting, and that he did not at the time intend to shoot Kessinger. The facts and circumstances seem to corroborate Ballard in this statement. If he had intended beforehand to shoot Kessinger, he could have done so when Kessinger first came up and challenged him for a fight, or while Kessinger was riding along with him before the shooting occurred. The shot was fired in front of the house of Kessinger's father in the public road. Ballard had gone beyond the front gate at Kessinger's home, in the direction of his own home. He was in a place where he had a legal right to be when attacked by Kessinger. It was shown that the father, mother, cousin, and other relatives of Kessinger were present, or very near, when the difficulty occurred. Ballard says that Kessinger could have whipped him in a fight, but admits that he wanted to fight Kessinger in the morning, when the first difficulty occurred; and says that he was then drinking, but had sobered up when Kessinger came up with him on the road; and that he then told Kessinger that he wanted no trouble with him. He says he was "not scared very much, but was hurt a right smart," by the rocks which struck him.

Section 9 of chapter 152 of the Code of 1899 provides that: "Every person who attempts to commit an offence, but fails to commit or is prevented from committing it, shall, where it is not otherwise provided, be punished as follows: If the offence attempted, be punishable with death, the person making such attempt shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years. If it be punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, he shall be confined in jail not less than six nor more than twelve months, and fined not exceeding five hundred dollars. If it be punishable by confinement in jail, or fine, he shall be confined in jail not more than six months, or fined not exceeding one hundred dollars." This leads to a consideration of the question of the grade of the offense, if any, as shown by the evidence, had the shooting proved fatal to Kessinger, the shot not having touched Kessinger, and it not appearing how near to him it came. If the shot fired by Ballard had killed Kessinger, the offense, if any, would not have been murder of the first degree, because all the facts and circumstances show that Ballard did not have, at the time of the shooting, the specific intent to take life, which is always an essential element in the crime of murder of the first degree, and without which that degree of murder cannot be established. It is urged that Ballard, being on horseback, and some distance from Kessinger, could have retreated, and should have done so, without firing the shot. In the language of this court, hereinafter quoted, this very attempt to retreat, under the circumstances shown, might have forfeited his life. He had been twice struck with the rocks thrown by Kessinger, who was still advancing upon him within distance, and with ability, to strike him again.

In State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679, 708, the court says: "The distinction between the circumstances under which a defendant is compelled by law to retreat before killing his assailant to preserve his own life, or to prevent the infliction of great bodily harm upon him, and those under which, without retreating, he may kill his assailant in self-defense, is well and sharply drawn. It is absurd to say that, when in the dead of night on the public road or street one is violently assaulted without fault on his part, he is bound to retreat before he uses a deadly weapon in defense of his person. His very attempt to retreat under these circumstances might forfeit his life. This is a very different case from the one, where a man, being himself in fault, enters into a combat with another. He must cease the combat and retreat, as far as safety will permit, before he is justified under any circumstances in taking life on the ground of self-defense."

In the Cain Case, supra, it is held: "When one, without fault himself, is attacked by another in such a manner or under such circumstances as to furnish reasonable grounds for apprehending a design to take away his life or to do some great bodily harm, and there is reasonable grounds for believing the danger imminent that such design will be accomplished, and the person assaulted has reasonable ground to believe, and does believe, such danger is imminent, he may act upon such appearance, and, without retreating, kill his assailant, if he has reasonable grounds to believe, and does believe, that such killing is necessary in order to avoid the apparent danger; and the killing under such circumstances is excusable, although it may afterwards turn out that the appearances were false, and that there was in fact neither design to do him some serious injury, or danger, that it would be done. But of all this the jury must judge from all the evidence and circumstances of the case." It is also held in that case that: "The bare fear that a man intends to commit murder or other atrocious felony, however well-grounded, unaccompanied by any overt act indicative of such intention, will not warrant killing the party by way of prevention. To warrant said killing, there must be some overt act indicative of imminent danger at the time; and the acts of the assailant must be such, as, under all the evidence and circumstances of the case, convince the jury that the prisoner had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, the danger imminent, and that the killing was necessary to preserve his own life, or to protect him from great bodily harm."

So far as the record discloses, Ballard was without fault at the time he was assaulted by Kessinger with rocks. The difficulty between them in the morning was no legal excuse for the attack by Kessinger at the time of the shooting. The threats and overt acts of Kessinger, and the presence of his father and other relatives at the time, were sufficient to put Ballard in fear of great bodily harm at the hands of Kessinger. Had the shot fired by Ballard proved fatal to Kessinger, Ballard would not have been guilty, under the facts and circumstances, of either murder in the second degree or voluntary manslaughter, and therefore could not have been guilty of an attempt to commit either of them.

The verdict finds him guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the second degree. The law affixes the same punishment to a conviction for an attempt to commit either murder in the second degree or voluntary manslaughter, such conviction being punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. The verdict and judgment thereon are erroneous. Therefore the said verdict is set aside, the judgment reversed and held for naught, a new trial upon the indictment is granted to the defendant, and the case is remanded to the circuit court.

RUNYON v. RUTHERFORD et al.

March 22, 1904.)

ARBITRATION — SUBMISSION — PROCEDURE — AWARD—PARTIES.

1. An award of arbitrators, made under a submission entered into between the sole defendant and one of two coplaintiffs in an action of assumpsit, brought for the recovery of a debt due to the plaintiffs jointly, for the determination of the matter in controversy in the action, whereby it was further agreed that the award should be entered as the judgment of the court, is neither void nor voidable merely because of the failure of the other party to unite in the submission, nor because the umpire failed to append the word "umpire" to his signature, and affixed in lieu thereof the word "arbitrator."

2. An award so made is binding upon the parties to the submission, though it does not bind those who are not parties to it.

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Action by Lewis Runyon against Lewis Rutherford and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. S. Marcum and J. B. Wilkinson, for plaintiffs in error. Sheppard & Goodykoontz, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. The entry of an award of arbitrators as the judgment of the court in an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Mingo county is the subject of complaint here, and the principal assignments of error rest upon two grounds, namely, that the award is not final, for want of a necessary party to the submission, and that the umpire signed it as "arbitrator," instead of "umpire." To show the propriety of the application of certain legal principles, under which the first objection to the award is deemed to be untenable, it is necessary to state the nature and origin of the claim sued on and the proceedings which resulted in the arbitration and judgment complained of. On or about the 20th day of November, 1896, Elliott Rutherford, Sr., and Louis Rutherford caused to be printed, posted, and circulated a handbill or advertisement, whereby they accused Anderson alias "Cap" Hatfield of the murder of John and Elliott Rutherford at Matewan, Mingo county, November 8, 1896, and offered to pay a reward of $500 for his arrest and delivery to the jailer of said county. On the 20th day of the same month J. H. Clark and Daniel Christian made the arrest, and had the prisoner committed as aforesaid. Clark assigned his interest in the amount claimed under the offer of reward to Louis Runyon, who, as assignee, together with Christian, brought this action January 25, 1897, against said Elliott and John Rutherford to recover said sum of $500. The date of the alleged assignment is not made clear by the record, but prior to the commencement of the action, December 10, 1896, the following receipt was executed: "Received of E. Rutherford and Louis Rutherford in full the reward offered by them for the arrest of Cap Hatfield for the murder of John and Elliott Rutherford at Matewan, November the 8th, 1896. Louis Runyon per W. S. B. agent of J. H. Clark." It appears that on or about the date of this receipt Clark was under a criminal charge of some kind which necessitated his giving a recognizance or bond, and he executed this release in consideration of $50 cash paid to him by the Rutherfords and their giving or furnishing such bond for him. Clark swears he agreed to and did release only his interest, but Elliott Rutherford testified that Clark agreed to release the whole of the claim, according to the tenor and purport of the receipt. How this testimony got into the record does not appear, but it seems to have been given at a trial had at the May term, 1898, which must have been abortive for some reason not disclosed by the printed record. After the issue was made up, the case was continued from term to term until January 10, 1900, when, upon the suggestion of the death of Elliott Rutherford, the action was abated as to him, and again continued. On the 27th day of August, 1900, Daniel Christian and Louis Rutherford made an agreement in writing under seal, submitting "the matters in controversy in said suit" to the arbitrament and final award and determination of John A. Sheppard and H. K. Shumate, and, upon their failure to agree, or disagreement within a specified time, to the determination and umpirage of such third person as the said arbitrators should select, and agreeing that the award should be entered as the judgment in the case. Failing to reach an agreement, the arbitrators selected Paul W. Scott as umpire, who, on the 25th day of September, 1900, after having heard the evidence and argument of counsel, sitting with the arbitrators, made an award in writing, signed by himself and John A. Sheppard, styling themselves "arbitrators," whereby it was ascertained that there was due from Rutherford to Christian the sum of $307.50, with interest thereon from the date of the award, and costs amounting to $42.60. Subsequently, the award was entered as the judgment of the court over the objection of the defendants.

Counsel for plaintiff in error say the award is utterly void as to all parties and for all purposes for want of finality and mutuality, because of the failure of Runyon to join in the submission, and in support of this contention they cite Gregory v. Deposit & Trust Co. (C. C.) 38 Fed. 408, McCarthy v. Swann, 145 Mass. 471, 14 N. E. 635, and Turner v. Stewart, 51 W. Va. 493, 41 S. E. 924. The first of these cases seems to have been a complicated suit in equity, involving many issues. The second one is a case in which, after a reference, the parties, together with another person, who was no party to the suit, but who had a separate and distinct interest connected with the matters in controversy between the parties, entered into an agreement that the determination of the referee should be final, and entered as the judgment of the court. It was held that the claim of this third party was not thereby brought into the suit, and the court refused to enter the award. Turner v. Stewart only holds that an award is not binding upon a party who did not unite in the submission. It does not decide that an award made under a submission entered into by some of the parties to a pending suit is void as to those who do submit their matters in difference to arbitrators. Whatever may be said of the other two authorities, relied upon, the rule is well settled in the law of this state that an award made under such a submission is binding upon the parties to it, although they be parties to a pending cause, and other parties to it do not join. In Fletcher v. Pollard, 2 Hen. & M. 544, the court held: "If, pending a suit in chancery, brought by one of three mercantile partners against the other two for a settlement of the accounts of the copartnership, the plaintiff and one of the defendants agree to refer all matters in difference between them relative to the subject in controversy to arbitrators (whose award is to be the decree of the court), according to which agreement an order of reference is made, and the arbitrators make a report that they had examined and stated the books of the copartnership, and award the payment of certain sums by the other defendant as the only debtor to the plaintiff and to the defendant, who agreed to the reference, and state that the payments already made by that defendant discharge him from any further claim of the plaintiff on account of the copartnership, such report ought to be considered as an award, and sufficiently final and good between the parties who agreed to the reference." Fleming, J., said: "The award appears to be perspicuous and just, and ought, in my opinion, to be conclusive, at least between the parties who agreed to the special reference." Wood v. Shepherd, 2 Pat. & H. 442, holds that: "One partner has no authority, by virtue of the partnership relation, to bind his copartners by an agreement to submit claims or transactions growing out of the partnership business to arbitrators. But the partner who makes such agreement is bound thereby, and the agreement is valid and binding between the parties thereto." Though not under a submission made by the parties to a pending suit, the award in Wood v. Shepherd was in all substantial respects like the one now under consideration. It was a voluntary submission by agreement, and the court very properly held that the parties to it, although without authority to bind others, could, upon obvious principles of law, bind themselves. To deny this right would be to limit the natural right of the individual to make and claim the benefit of contracts. Thompson, J., said, in the above case: "It is certainly not a very obvious consequence that, because those who do not submit are not bound by the award, those who do should not be. On the contrary, the very reverse of this proposition would, at the very first blush, seem to be the most reasonable. Wood and Shepherd had the perfect right and the full power to bind themselves, whilst they could not bind outstanding copartners. Shepherd was beyond question irrevocably bound. There is nothing wrong or unusual for one man to submit for himself and another, taking upon himself the peril of his dissent or nonacquiescence." To the same effect, see Boyd's Heirs v. Magruder's Heirs, 2 Rob. (Va.) 761, differing somewhat in its facts from the case last above cited, but not in principle. Forrer v. Coffman, 23 Grat. 871, though not binding authority upon this court, reaffirms the principles formerly announced by the Virginia court, holding that where, in a pending suit by a plaintiff against copartners, the plaintiff and one of the defendants made a submission of the matters in controveray, agreeing that the award shall be entered as the judgment, the award is binding upon the parties to the submission, and should be entered up as the judgment in the action. Staples, J., said: "The second objection is that Clippenger is not noticed in the award, although he is a party to the action, and one of the lessees of the property involved in the decision of the arbitrators. The answer is that Clippenger was in no way concerned in the submission, and cannot, therefore, be bound by the award. The defendant Forrer agreed to surrender the lease, to assume any liability which might attach to the firm, and to pay the plaintiff for the rent of the property such sum as should be ascertained by the arbitrators. The award may not be binding upon Clippenger, who was no party to the submission; but it is none the less valid as to Forrer, who did assent to it. As to him, the award is within the terms of the submission." By becoming litigants parties do not lose or surrender the right or power to make contracts and bind themselves in respect to the matters in controversy. Consent decrees and judgments by confession are not unusual in the courts, and, when made, parties are more firmly bound by them than by decrees and judgments obtained in the regular course of procedure, for they cannot be disturbed for anything except fraud, or perhaps mistake. In such cases all errors and irregularities are released and waived. Without his consent, Rutherford could not be subjected to two suits upon this demand, one by Christian and the other by Runyon; but no principle of law is recalled which precludes him from agreeing to a severance of this demand, and making himself liable for two actions on account thereof, if such a thing could result from holding this award valid. It cannot be said that he was ignorant of any interest Runyon may have in the controversy, for he was a party to the action, the declaration in which apprised the defendant of his alleged interest. Neither surprise, mistake, nor other adventitious circumstance calling for relief or working injustice appears, and the ancient jealousy of the courts on the subject of their jurisdiction, which led them to discourage arbitrations, and which seems to have governed the action of the court in McCarthy v. Swann, 145 Mass. 471, 14 N. E. 635, has long since yielded to the modern view of the speedy and economical adjustment of controversies by means of them.

A question somewhat discussed, but not important, is whether the receipt given by Clark is conclusive upon Runyon. However that may be, it does not conclude Christian, because it is admitted that the debt due to him and Clark jointly was not paid to the latter. Ordinarily, a joint creditor may collect the whole debt, and payment to him is binding upon his co-creditor; but he cannot release without payment, so as to prejudice the other party. Parsons, Cont. 730. Part payment made to one would operate to reduce the amount of the recovery, but both creditors would still have to sue for the balance due, because the promise or obligation is to them jointly, and not made to either separately. It does not preclude him from suing, but may prevent recovery of more than one-half of the debt, as to which matter no question arises here.

The only remaining contention is that the failure of the umpire to affix the word "umpire" to his signature, and his signing the award with one of the arbitrators, and describing himself as "arbitrator," invalidates the award. To so hold would set it aside on purely technical and extremely narrow grounds. From the award itself it appears that he was the umpire, and not an arbitrator, and therefore that the misdescription is nothing more than a clerical error. Taking the instrument, and construing it as a whole, the court is bound to say he makes an award as umpire, and not as an original arbitrator, and this is the rule of construction universally applied.

These conclusions result in an affirmance of the judgment.

PRESTON v. WEST et al.

March 22, 1904.)

BILL IN EQUITY—PARTIES—DEMURRES—DECREE—APPEAL.

1. A person cannot be made a party to a bill by merely inserting his name in the caption thereof, but the bill must contain some allegation showing such person's interest or claim to interest in the subject-matter in controversy.

2. A bill which makes a person a party in the caption thereof, but contains no allegation showing such person's interest or claim to interest in the subject-matter in controversy, is demurrable.

3. If the circuit court overrules such demurrer, and grants the relief asked in such bill as to the subject-matter in controversy without having such nominal party properly impleaded as to such subject-matter, although other pleadings in the cause show that such nominal party is claiming the whole of such property, such nominal party may appeal from such decree, and have the same reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Raleigh County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Bill by A. D. Preston against A. H. West and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. H. McGinnis and J. W. McCreery, for appellants. A. D. Preston, for appellee.

DENT, J. A. H. West and Jane West, his wife, complain of a decree of the circuit court of Raleigh county, rendered on the 27th day of January, 1903, in favor of A. D. Preston, on a bill in chancery filed by said Preston against appellants and others. Am.

inspection of the record shows the following proceedings in the case: At February rules, 1902, plaintiff filed his bill against A. H. West and others, claiming an individual interest in a certain tract of land, and alleging that the whole of the land was claimed in some manner by A. H. West, and praying a partition thereof. At April rules A. H. West filed his answer, alleging that he had no interest in the land, but that it belonged to his wife, Jane West, who had purchased and paid for the land in 1893, and had ever since been in peaceable possession thereof, denied the right of plaintiff to partition, and asked that Jane West be made a party to the suit. A general replication was put in the answer, and both plaintiff and defendant A. H. West took depositions. These depositions appear to fully sustain the allegations of the answer as to the ownership of the property being in Jane West. Plaintiff excepted to the reading of these depositions, because, among other things, the defendant A. H. West disclaims any interest in the subject-matter in controversy. On the 5th day of May, 1902, the court permitted the plaintiff to amend his bill by inserting in the caption thereof the name of Jane West, and thereupon she appeared by her attorney, waived service of process, and leave was given her to file her answer to the bill at rules. At a special term of the court held on the 27th day of January, 1903, the cause was heard on the bill and exhibits upon the demurrer to the bill, on the answer of A. H. West and general replication thereto, upon the depositions and exceptions thereto, and was submitted to the court on argument of counsel. The court thereupon overruled the demurrer to the bill, and decided that plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed, and that he is the legal owner of the one-half undivided interest in the land; allowed the defendant Jane West to file her answer, to which the plaintiff replied generally; and then appointed commissioners to partition the land, if susceptible of partition. From this decree this appeal is taken.

It is plainly apparent from these proceedings that Jane West has never had her day in court, nor any opportunity to be properly heard. The court entirely ignored the answer of A. H. West, the depositions taken in behalf thereof, and the exceptions thereto. This answer, sustained by the depositions in support thereof, shows that Jane West claims the subject-matter of controversy, and is a necessary party to the suit. In an irregular manner her name was added to the caption of the bill, and she waived process, and was granted leave to answer. This conferred upon her the right to appear, and object to the decree, and, if erroneously entered, to appeal therefrom; otherwise she would be bound thereby, as she must be deemed to have been present in court. There is some doubt as to the appealable character of the decree. This should be resolved in her favor, to prevent future complications. Certainly the court intended the decree to be a final adjudication, even as to her rights, or it would not have been entered at the time of or after she tendered her answer. On an inspection of the whole record, it is plain that she is a necessary party to the suit, as she claims the whole subject-matter thereof. The irregular way in which she was named as a party has denied her a hearing in the cause. The court appears to have disregarded the answer of A. H. West and the depositions in support thereof, because he was not interested in the subject-matter of controversy, and to have refused to consider the answer of Jane West, either because not filed in time, or because not responsive to the allegations of the bill. The reason, however, is anything but plainly apparent.

The first cardinal question of ascertainment in every chancery suit before a final decree, or a decree settling the principles of the cause, is as to whether all persons interested in such decree are properly before the court, and have had a hearing as to their rights. Rexroad v. McQuain, 24 W. Va. 32. This is peculiarly a question for the court for the promotion of the ends of justice, whether on demurrer at the hearing or on appeal. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. 468. Not only must a person in interest be made a party, but he must be properly impleaded. Crickard v. Crouch's Adm'rs, 41 W. Va. 503, 23 S. E. 727. In the case of Shinn v. Board of Education, 39 W. Va. 498, 20 S. E. 604, it was held that: "Where a person files his petition asking to be admitted as a party defendant in a pending suit in equity, in which no allegation is made naming or referring to him in any way, and no relief is prayed against him, and he is admitted to become such party defendant, he does not become a party in the cause until he is made a party by some allegation in the bill as amended." A person is not properly a defendant to a bill unless such bill contain some allegation touching such person's rights, and prays relief because thereof. McCoy v. Allen et al., 16 W. Va. 724. In the present case the court permitted the amendment of the bill by the insertion of the name of Jane West in the caption thereof. She waived process and appeared. The demurrer to the bill was considered and passed on by the court, with all the papers before it, after the name of Jane West was inserted in the caption thereof. On an examination of the bill there appears not a single allegation therein touching the rights or the property of Jane West, nor is it apparent therefrom why she is made a party thereto. Hence there is no allegation therein contained that calls upon her for an answer, or shows why she is made a party thereto. The bill is therefore defective and demurrable as to her, and the court should have required the plaintiff to have amended the same so as to show cause for bringing her before the court. Until it was so amended she could not and would not be bound to answer the same. The court should have sustained the demurrer to the bill, and required the plaintiff to have amended the same, not alone by naming Jane West as a party defendant therein, but also by making such proper allegations as to her rights in the premises concerning the subject-matter of the suit and the prayer for relief as would enable her to properly present her rights by answer, and have the same properly adjudicated.

It is proper to say here that when exceptions are filed to depositions because taken before issue made up on answer filed the court should first determine such exception before hearing the cause, so as to afford opportunity to retake such depositions, if necessary. While due diligence is required, snap judgment should not be permitted in any case in chancery, but all proceedings should be carried on and molded to meet the ends of justice, the primary object of all litigation, which it is the duty of the court to attain, if possible.

The decree complained of is reversed, the demurrer to the bill sustained, with leave to plaintiff to file an amended bill making the appellant Jane West a party thereto by suitable allegations as to her interests and rights therein contained, and for further proceedings according to the rules of equity.

BARRETT v. RALEIGH COAL & COKE CO.

March 22, 1904.)

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—APPEAL— —REVIEW—BREACH OF CONTRACT— DAMAGES.

1. In treating a demurrer to evidence as on a verdict of a jury in favor of the demurree, the court should be governed by the rules and principles established in the case of Johnson v. Burns, 20 S. E. 686, 39 W. Va. 658, and not the old rules and principles thereby superseded and rendered obsolete.

2. On demurrer to evidence, if it be conflicting, judgment in favor of the demurree should be given, unless the evidence plainly and decidedly preponderates in favor of demurrant on some decisive point.

3. On demurrer to evidence, if the evidence, though conflicting, plainly and decidedly preponderates in favor of the demurrant on some decisive point, the demurrer should be sustained, and judgment should be given for the demurrant.

4. On a demurrer to evidence, although the evidence in favor of the demurree may be weak, doubtful, or questionable, the demurrer will be overruled, unless on some decisive point at issue the evidence in favor of the demurrant plainly and decisively preponderates over the evidence as to the same point in favor of the demurree.

5. When the circuit court has found for the plaintiff on a demurrer to evidence by the defendant, this court will not disturb such finding, unless it is against the plain and decided preponderance of the evidence, or is wholly without evidence to support it.

6. A plaintiff contractor who sues for the profits on his contract, which he was prevented from fulfilling by his employer, without fault on his part, is entitled to recover the full consideration for such contract, less the expense of fulfilling the same.

7. Plaintiff in such a case is not bound to prove what his profits would have been with absolute certainty, but only with such reasonable certainty as will satisfy a jury as to the reasonableness of his demand or estimate. Remote or doubtful contingencies are insufficient to destroy the reasonable certainty of such demand.

8. A judgment in favor of demurree on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed, unless upon a plain legal ground, sufficient to preclude any recovery on the part of the demurree.

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by Leon Barrett against the Raleigh Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See 41 S. E. 220.

John H. Hatcher and W. A. French, for plaintiff in error. Broun & Ball, W. L. Ashby, and A. A. Lilly, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. The Raleigh Coal & Coke Company complain of a judgment of the circuit court of Raleigh county, rendered against it on the 28th day of July, 1903, for the sum of $930, at the suit of Leon Barrett. The plaintiff obtained a judgment on a former trial, which was brought here by the defendant, and reversed. Barrett v. Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 410, 41 S. E. 220, 90 Am. St. Rep. 802. On a second trial, the jury rendered a second verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which, on motion of the defendant, was set aside by the circuit court. On the third trial the defendant, probably fearing an adverse verdict against it which might not be set aside, demurred to the evidence, so as to cast on the court the duty of deciding the law of the case applicable to the evidence. The circuit court overruled the demurrer, and entered judgment for the defendant; hence this writ of error.

The first question that presents itself is as to what rule should govern in cases of demurrer to evidence, the new rule of Mapel v. John, 42 W. Va. 30, 24 S. E. 608, 32 L. R. A. 800, 57 Am. St. Rep. 839; supported by Talbott v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 500, 28 S. E. 311, and Teel v. Ohio R. R. Co., 49 W. Va. 85, 38 S. E. 518, or the old rule as held in Shaver v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 502, 37 S. E. 664, sustained by Hogg's Readings & Forms, 537. Or can and should these rules be reconciled to mean virtually the same thing, except that the old rule is modified by the holding of this court in the case of Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 686. In the case of Shaver v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 512, 37 S. E. 668, Judge Brannon says: "I hesitate not to say that if this case had been wholly left to the jury, and it had found a verdict for the defendant, the court must have set it aside as unwarranted by the evidence, and, this being so, the circuit court in this case was warranted in giving judgment for the plaintiff upon the demurrer." Gunn v. Ohio River R. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 681 [26 S. E. 548, 36 L. R. A. 575].” In the latter case it is said: “If the evidence is such that, if there were a verdict in favor of the demurree, the court ought not to set it aside then on demurrer to the evidence, the court ought to give judgment against the demurrant.” Both these cases were decided since the case of Johnson v. Burns, cited. Hence, when they use the word “verdict,” they mean a verdict determined according to the rule laid down in the latter case, and not the rule existing prior to that time. The old rule regarding the review of a verdict of a jury was modified, by the holding in the case of Johnson v. Burns, to suit the statutory requirement that the court should consider the whole of the evidence certified, and thereby incidentally modified the rule relating to the consideration of the evidence on demurrer, and this is the new rule established in the case of Mapel v. John. To hold otherwise we must say, in cases of demurrer to evidence, that when the word “verdict” is used it is according to its ancient effect prior to the decision of Johnson v. Burns. This would make unnecessary confusion between the present rule relating to motions to set aside the verdicts of juries, the motion to exclude the evidence, the motion to direct a verdict and a demurrer to the evidence, all of which motions should be governed by the same principles of law, and this is, that, where the evidence plainly preponderates in favor of a litigant, he is entitled to judgment. If the evidence so plainly preponderates in favor of the demurrant that a verdict of a jury in favor of the demurree would be set aside, then the court will sustain the demurrer and give judgment for the demurrant, otherwise the judgment must be for the demurree. This verdict must be governed by the new standard established by the case of Johnson v. Burns, and not the old standard that was thereby modified. On the subject of the conflict of evidence, the rule then would be that all the evidence of the demurrant in conflict with the evidence of the demurree should be rejected, unless the conflicting evidence of the demurrant so plainly preponderates over the evidence of the demurree that if there were a verdict in favor of the latter it would be set aside, and in such case the demurrer must be sustained. For if the evidence, although conflicting, plainly preponderates in favor of the demurrant, judgment should be entered accordingly. This makes judgments on demurrers to evidence harmonize with the later decisions founded on the verdicts of juries, following the case of Johnson v. Burns. Miller v. White, 48 W. Va. 68, 33 S. E. 332, 76 Am. St. Rep. 791; Limer v. Traders’ Co., 44 W. Va. 175, 28 S. E. 730; Davidson v. Railway Co., 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593. Following this rule, the judgment in favor of the demurree in this case cannot be disturbed unless the evidence, though conflicting, plainly and decidedly preponderates in favor of the demurrant, or the evidence of the demurree is for some reason legally insufficient to sustain the judgment.

The first question raised by the demurrant is that the writing introduced by the defendant is not a completed contract binding on the defendant, because not signed by its president and sealed with its corporate seal, but is only signed by its superintendent, William Lang. Nevertheless it was received and held by the company, and acted on between the parties, as a completed contract, and on the former appeal to this court no such objection was interposed, but the contract was admitted, so that the court cannot do otherwise than treat it as a binding contract between the parties thereto, and a jury would have the right to find that it was ratified and confirmed by the conduct of the parties in relation thereto, and such finding could not be disturbed.

The plaintiff’s case is that he was to make and burn 500,000 bricks for the defendant, at the price of $5 per thousand, to the satisfaction of the superintendent, on the defendant’s land; the defendant to furnish the clay and the coal necessary to burn the bricks; that he proceeded to get ready to make and burn the whole amount of brick by preparing the yard and securing the necessary implements; that he made and burned sixty thousand (60,000) of such brick; that he was then notified by the then superintendent, Mr. Bunn, not to make any more brick, as the company had all the brick it needed, and more, too; that he then saw the president, who told him not to make any more brick, that when they needed any more they would make another contract, and that plaintiff’s contract was a mere memorandum, not binding on the defendant; that plaintiff answered that he would see whether it was not a binding contract, and refused to sign a receipt in full on payment of his hands for the labor performed by them, claiming that the defendant should pay him for the preparation made for making the 500,000 brick. This the defendant refused to do. The plaintiff then brought this suit, claiming as due him a prospective profit of $2 per thousand on the whole 500,000 brick, deducting therefrom the amount already received by him, leaving a balance, with interest, as ascertained by the jury, amounting to $920. The plaintiff’s proof undoubtedly sustains the plaintiff’s contentions, and the only question presented for the court is as to whether, as to any material and controverted point, the evidence of the defendant plainly and decidedly preponderates.

Defendant’s second position is that Mr. Bunn had no authority to stop Mr. Barrett from completing his contract, and that, in fact, neither what Mr. Bunn nor Mr. Lucado, the president of the company, said to him was a sufficient breach of the contract to authorize the plaintiff to stop work thereunder. On these propositions the feigned verdict is for the plaintiff, and the plain and decided preponderance of the evidence does not controvert the same. On the contrary, it is fully sustained by the evidence, for it shows that the defendant had changed its superintendent, and with him its plans for future work, and therefore did not intend or need to carry out its contract with plaintiff.

Defendant's third position is that if the contract is held valid, and that the defendant has broken the same, such breach is warranted by the inability of the plaintiff to make such brick as are specified in the contract. This is an after consideration, and was not given to plaintiff, at the time it refused to permit him to proceed with his contract, as a reason for such refusal. Plaintiff's answer to this is that he made just as good brick as could be made with the clay and coal furnished him by the defendant, and that the defendant had accepted those already made, and did not interpose this objection until after suit was brought, and that the bricks could have been sold to other parties for $6 per thousand, but the defendant refused to allow them to be sold. On this proposition the evidence is conflicting, and does not plainly and decidedly preponderate in favor of the defendant, so as to overthrow the feigned verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The defendant's fourth position is that the plaintiff has not shown in his evidence that his profits would have amounted to $2 per thousand, but that the evidence shows that, if he had been permitted to fulfill his contract, he would have suffered a loss instead of gaining a profit. On this question also the evidence is conflicting, and the plain and decided preponderance is not in favor of the defendant. The court is not able to say how a jury would have found on this question, but, the defendant having admitted that such finding would have been against it, the court cannot say that such finding was opposed to the plain and decided preponderance of the evidence.

It is sufficient to say that plaintiff's own evidence fully sustains his case, if there was no other evidence in the case. His evidence is contradicted to some extent by the witnesses for the defendant, but it is supported by his own witnesses. As to the credibility of witnesses, the jury is ordinarily the sole judge. Smith v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 48 W. Va. 69, 35 S. E. 834; Trump v. Coke Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. 1035; Young v. Railroad Co., 44 W. Va. 218, 26 S. E. 932; Sisler v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 769, 23 S. E. 721; Akers v. De Witt, 41 W. Va. 229, 23 S. E. 669. With the credibility of witnesses the court has nothing to do on a demurrer to evidence, as a general rule, for the demurrer admits the credibility of the demurree's witnesses as established. If the defendant had stopped the plaintiff from fulfilling his contract, for the reason that he was unable to make and burn brick to its satisfaction, and had given him such reason for so stopping him, the plaintiff might have had no cause of action, but it stops him because it does not need any more brick, because, apparently, of a change of superintendent and plans, without giving him any other reason, and then, after it is sued on its contracts, it sets up the various after-considered pretexts that there was no binding contract, that its servants did not stop the execution of the contract, that plaintiff could not make good brick, and that plaintiff would have lost money if permitted to execute the contract. These are contradictory, evasive issues, instead of meeting plaintiff with a square issue; yet, if any of them were fully sustained by a clear and decided preponderance of the testimony, a jury would have been bound to have found in favor of the defendant. They were thence submitted to different juries. The first two found for the plaintiff, and the defendant virtually admits that the third would have done likewise. It may be that the juries were moved by the apparent lack of fairness on the part of the defendant in dealing with the plaintiff. But, however this may be, the evidence being decidedly conflicting, and the facts being determined by the demurrer in favor of the plaintiff, there is no question of law presented by the evidence that will enable this court to say that the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer to the evidence and entering judgment for the plaintiff.

The damages appear to be excessive. This was a question for the jury, and not for the court, and the defendant made no motion to set aside the verdict because of excessive damages, if such motion was even proper, on the return of the third verdict.

Defendant claims that the damages are speculative, and not certain. Beatty Lumber Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co., 52 W. Va. 410, 44 S. E. 309; Douglass v. Railroad Co., 51 W. Va. 523, 41 S. E. 911; Bodkin v. Arnold, 48 W. Va. 108, 35 S. E. 980; Hare v. Parkersburg, 24 W. Va. 554; James v. Adams, 8 W. Va. 563. In the case of United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 339, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168, the rule is stated to be, in case a contractor sues for the profits on a contract which he is prevented from fulfilling by breach of his employer, without fault on his part, the difference between the cost of doing the work and what he was to receive for it. 3 Sunderland on Damages, § 713; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Stewart & Co., 79 Md. 487, 29 Atl. 964. The plaintiff is not bound to prove such profits with absolute certainty, but with only reasonable certainty, and the fact that the employer might reject the work as not done to his satisfaction, when completed, would not render such profits uncertain, especially if the contractor might get a larger price for the brick when completed than his employer agreed to pay him for the same. There is evidence tending to show that the plaintiff could have received $6 per thousand for the brick made and burned, if the defendant had rejected the same absolutely and permitted him to sell them. The defendant had no right to reject the brick as not according to the contract, and at the same time retain the same and refuse the plaintiff the right to sell and make his expenditures therefrom. If the brick were rejected, plaintiff was entitled to a lien thereon for the money, time, and labor expended in producing them, although the defendant might be entitled to hold them for its advances. The probability that the defendant might have rejected all the brick when completed, and that the plaintiff would have thereby sustained the complete loss thereof is too uncertain a contingency to render plaintiff's estimate of his profits so uncertain as to prevent a recovery therefor. All that the plaintiff was required to prove was that the profits claimed were reasonably certain to have been realized but for the wrongful act of the defendant. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Stewart & Co., cited.

Defendant claims that the evidence shows that the plaintiff would have incurred a loss instead of realizing a profit out of his contract, and, impliedly, that defendant deserves a reward for stopping him, instead of being compelled to pay his estimated profits. This might have been urged before a jury, as the evidence is conflicting, but it is not a question for the court, unless it is clearly and decidedly plain that the plaintiff would have suffered loss instead of having made a profit on his contract. The court cannot so determine.

The various questions raised by the defendant are questions of fact, dependent on the evidence, which is highly contradictory and conflicting, and on most material points favorable to the plaintiff. For this court to overrule the circuit court and sustain the demurrer to the evidence, the court must hold that the evidence plainly does not justify a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for any sum whatever. The defendant has placed itself in the position of saying to the court, "If the plaintiff is entitled to any recovery, he is entitled to the full amount of the conditional verdict of the jury."

The character of the evidence in this case as to the binding force of the contract, the alleged breach thereof, the ability of the defendant to fulfill it, for the want of experience, lack of means, or character of material to be used, or the satisfactory character of the work already done, and as to whether there would result a profit or loss, and the amount thereof, demanded a submission to a jury as the proper triers of all such and similar questions of fact, and the jury's verdict, rendered on a fair hearing, should have ended the controversy. As to the questions of fact—and these are all that are left for consideration—on conflicting testimony of witnesses, the plaintiff was entitled to a trial by jury, and the defendant could not deprive him of such trial by demurring to the evidence, unless it could present a plain legal ground, not subject to disputed questions of fact, which would preclude any recovery on the part of the plaintiff. No such decisive legal ground appearing, this court must affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

March 22, 1904.)PAYMENT — EVIDENCE — RECEIPT — IMPEACHMENT—MARRIED WOMAN—LIABILITIES—FAMILY SUPPLIES.

1. Casual admissions alone, although in writing, are insufficient to show payment of an acknowledged debt, when payment is denied, and the debtor, being called upon to prove it, fails to testify or introduce other evidence.

2. A receipt purporting to be in full of rent of real estate to a specified date, or other account, is only prima facie proof of settlement, and may be overcome by contradictory evidence, and no rule of universal application as to the nature and sufficiency of such evidence can be formulated.

3. The husband being the head of the family, and under a legal duty to support it, the separate estate of the wife is not liable for an account for family necessities supplied by a merchant, when it is not shown that she has agreed to pay for them, or estopped herself from denying liability therefor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Bill by J. M. Anderson, trustee, against Davis & Ould and others. From the decree, plaintiff and defendant Huff, Andrews & Thomas Company appeal. Affirmed.

R. C. & B. McLaugherty, Anderson & Easley, and Henson & Mason, for appellants. W. Walter McLaugherty, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. Two appeals from the same decree of the circuit court of Mercer county have been taken in the chancery cause of J. M. Anderson, Trustee, v. Davis & Ould et al., one by the plaintiff, Anderson, trustee, and the other by Huff, Andrews & Thomas Company, both of which present the same question on the merits of the case. On the 7th day of May, 1900, Davis & Ould, partners doing a mercantile business in the city of Bluefield, made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors by conveying all their property to J. M. Anderson, trustee. Later the trustee brought this suit to convene all the creditors, and determine the amounts and priorities, if any, of the debts due from the firm; making Mary O. Lusk a defendant, along with numerous other creditors. She answered the bill, setting up claims for rent of the room in which the firm carried on its business, amounting, in the aggregate, to $768.50. Of this sum, $240 was charged as the rent from May 15, 1896, to May 14, 1897, inclusive, and the residue, of $528.50, as the rent from May 14, 1897, until May 8, 1900. In addition to this, she claimed $22.50 as rent due from the trustee for the use of the room from May 8, 1900, until June 21, 1900. She averred that, of the amount so due to her, she had assigned about $80 to W. Walter McLaugherty, out of which he was to pay a judgment in favor of E. Levering &

Co. for $63.40, with interest and costs thereon; a judgment in favor of the American Thread Company for $20.34, with interest and costs; whatever individual account or claim he might have against her; and the balance, if any, to her or her order. There was a reference to a commissioner, who refused to allow Mrs. Lusk anything, but, on exception to his report, the court disapproved his action in respect to said claim, sustained the exception, and allowed her the sum of $550, and adjudged that $196.20, part of said sum of $550, being one year's rent of said room, was the first lien on the assets of the firm. From so much of the decree as allows this sum to Mrs. Lusk, and gives her the lien aforesaid, the trustee and Huff, Andrews & Thomas Company have appealed. Huff, Andrews & Thomas Company show that their claim was $1,145.56, on which they would have received a dividend of 50½ per cent., equal to $578.50, but for the allowance aforesaid to Mrs. Lusk, in consequence of which their dividend was reduced to 41.55 per cent., yielding them only $476. Claiming a loss of $102.50 to them by reason of said allowance, they appeal.

A dismissal of the appeal of Anderson, trustee, is urged upon the ground that he has not sufficient interest in the controversy between the creditors to enable him to sustain an appeal. The suggestion in this connection is that by resisting the allowance of a claim of a creditor, under the circumstances of the case, the debtors being insolvent, he intermeddles, without warrant or authority, in the controversy between creditors. This is a misapprehension of the duties and office of a trustee in such case. In the application of the assets conveyed to him, he is not only responsible to the creditors, but also represents the debtor, having full authority to sue for and collect such claims as constitute part of the assets, and to resist the payment of unjust or illegal demands asserted against them. His status is strikingly analogous to that of an administrator or an executor. In respect to such assets, he is the only person who can sue or be sued at law. While the claims of creditors conflict with one another, each prosecutes his action or claim directly against the trustee or the funds and property in his hands, and only incidentally against the demands of other creditors. The creditor unites with the trustee in the defense of the assets against other demands. It is well settled that an executor may prosecute an appeal. Ward v. Brown, 53 W. Va. 227, 44 S. E. 488; Shirley v. Healds, 34 N. H. 407; Smith v. Sherman, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 411; Bellow's Estate, 60 Vt. 224, 14 Atl. 697; Fairfax v. Fairfax, 7 Gratt. 36. Executors, administrators, and trustees in deeds of trust executed for the benefit of creditors hold the legal title to the estate in their hands, and, at law, are the only persons who can sue and be sued in respect thereto. As the trustee is the only person who can be sued, he is a proper person to defend, and his resort to an appellate court is but a continuation of the defense made in the lower court. Though, in equity, those who hold the beneficial interest must be made parties, the legal title of the fiduciary is nevertheless respected. He therefore clearly has the right to appeal, and, in doing so, represents the estate, for the benefit of all who are interested in it. Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 316. It is not intended here to intimate that the trustee represents his assignee personally. A decree or judgment against the trustee only would bind only the fund or property in his hands.

Said sum of $240 arose under a written contract of rental for one year as aforesaid. On the 1st day of June, 1897, another contract in writing was made for one year at $15 per month, and after the expiration of said year the lessees held over until the date of the assignment. The amount of rent claimed to have accrued to Mrs. Lusk is not controverted, but it is insisted that, by reason of payments and credits given on a store account, nothing remains due her. In her answer and deposition she fails to state the exact amount due, giving as a reason for her failure her ignorance of the exact state of the account. The management of the business was intrusted to her husband, W. I. Lusk, who insists in his deposition that there is a considerable balance due his wife, but that he does not know the amount. Nor does the trustee prove by his assignors or any witness the amount paid on account of the rent. On that subject they do not testify. Neither Davis nor Ould testified at all. The contract of June 1, 1897, provided for the payment of part of the rent thereunder upon a note held by the lessees, and the balance to W. O. Pollock, local agent of the Holston National Building & Loan Association. Whether anything was paid on the note does not appear. Pollock files a statement showing that he received from Mrs. Lusk, for the building association, in the years 1897, 1898, and 1899, $287.72. A receipt for $60 is produced, and an order payable to a third party for $20 is mentioned; but whether it was paid out of the rent is uncertain, as W. I. Lusk testifies that he paid something on it, and the balance is not shown to have been paid. The appellant relies, however, upon certain facts, in the nature of admissions, tending to show that there was only about $80 due and unpaid on account of the rent at the date of the assignment. One of these is the receipt for $60, above mentioned, which reads as follows: "Received of Davis & Ould $60.00, sixty dollars, in full for rent to May 1, 1899. Mary O. Lusk, per W. I. Lusk." Said W. I. Lusk says the words "in full for rent to May 1, 1899," were added to the receipt after he signed it as agent for his wife, and later he testified that only the words "in full" were so inserted. He testifies also that he had given several receipts, but does not remember how many, and has nothing to show just how much was paid to him on account of rent. A circumstance relied upon as tending to prove that Mrs. Lusk only claimed about $80 after the assignment is that she sued out a distress warrant for about that amount. Another is that she executed to W. Walter McClaugherty on the 20th day of September, 1900, the assignment for about $80 hereinbefore described, purporting to be an assignment of all the rent due and owing to her by the trustee, including everything up to and including May 7, 1900, the date of the assignment. Another is that, on a day which does not seem to be fixed by the evidence, W. I. Lusk made an alleged settlement, as agent of his wife, with Davis and the trustee, in which, among other items credited on the account for merchandise, is the sum of $80 as rent up to May 8, 1900, leaving a balance due Davis & Ould on the store account of $236.87. But Lusk says he has no recollection of having made such statement, or signing the memorandum at the foot of the account. He says Davis, after having taken several drinks with him, took him to the office of the trustee, where the credits were made, but he was so much intoxicated that he does not remember what transpired after he went to the office. Anderson, the trustee, testifies that he procured the meeting of Lusk and Davis at his office, and says that, if Lusk was drunk, he did not observe it, and that, though he may have been drinking some, he was not so drunk he did not know what he was doing.

Are these circumstances sufficient to bar recovery? The amount of rent which accrued to Mrs. Lusk is undisputed. Davis & Ould owe her the amount she claims, if they have not paid it in some way. The burden was upon them to show payment. They were virtually called upon to do so in the account filed by Mrs. Lusk with her deposition April 30, 1902, prior to the making of the final report of the commissioner, in which she said her account was subject to any proper credits for money paid her by Davis & Ould to S. P. Cary, Pollock, and to themselves on a note held by them against her, amounting to about $40. In it she further said the amount was unknown to her, but was left open for proof to be furnished by Davis & Ould. At most, the facts and circumstances relied upon constitute evidence in the nature of admissions. They do not show payments. They are not conclusive by any means, although written. The assignment is not a written agreement between Mrs. Lusk and Davis & Ould. It is a paper given to a third party, and is in no sense a contract between Mrs. Lusk and Davis & Ould. She may have been laboring under some false impression or defect of recollection at the time she executed it, and, if so, she could overthrow the inference of payment arising from its language. She may have assumed that Davis & Ould had paid more money to the building association and to other parties for her, on account of the rent, than they had actually paid. She says in her answer that she had endeavored without avail to obtain a settlement with them; and, in her deposition, that she does not know how much has been paid; and, in her account filed before the commissioner, virtually calls upon them to disclose the amount, and they have failed to do so. As to the distress warrant sued out after the assignment, it could only have covered the rent for one year, and the making of the affidavit for it does not necessarily carry upon its face any implication of the payment of the rent for preceding years. The receipt relied upon as showing payment of rent up to May 1, 1899, is not conclusive, although it is evidence. Ruby, Adm'r, v. Railroad Co., 8 W. Va. 269. In the case just cited the receipt was attached to a statement, and imported a settlement and payment of a balance due, but it was nevertheless said to be impeachable. Of a receipt in full, 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 988, says: "Like other receipts, it is subject to explanation or contradiction by extraneous evidence." The same work says at page 986: "No rule can be laid down as to the kind or quantity of evidence which ought to outweigh the receipt." Nor is the alleged settlement made by W. I. Lusk in which $80 was credited on the store account as rent to May 8, 1900, conclusive. It is mere evidence. Although these admissions, by reason of their being written, are entitled to more weight, perhaps, than mere verbal admissions, they are still casual in their nature, and may have resulted from inadvertence. If, as is claimed, the rent has all been paid, it is remarkable that no receipts were taken for, nor book entries made of, the payments, and still more remarkable that, if receipts were taken, they have not been produced. Again, if none were taken, it is strange that the fact is not established, and the testimony of Lusk to the effect that he gave receipts is not denied. Neither Davis nor Ould attempt to testify to the payment of the rent. For some reason, they have seen fit to rely solely upon these admissions. If it were a case otherwise doubtful upon the evidence, these facts would be undoubtedly sufficient to turn the scale against Mrs. Lusk; but, as her debt is undisputed, and no effort is made to show payment of a large part of it, except by means of these admissions, an entirely different one is presented, and, under such circumstances, they are insufficient to establish the fact sought to be deduced from them. The large discrepancy between the acknowledged amount of the debt and the payments shown or indicated is a circumstance which, being wholly unexplained or accounted for, clearly overbalances the admissions relied upon. "It is a familiar rule that verbal admissions should be received with caution and subjected to careful scrutiny, as no class of evidence is more subject to error or abuse." 1 Jones, Ev. § 297. "It is hardly necessary to add that, unless admissions are contractual, or unless they constitute an estoppel, within some of the rules already stated, they are not conclusive, but are open to rebuttal or explanation, or they may be controlled by higher evidence. This is true even though they are made under oath, although admissions thus solemnly made are evidence of great weight against the declarant, and they throw on him the burden of showing a mistake." Id. § 298.

Of the rents which accrued as aforesaid, $175, in addition to the $80 hereinbefore mentioned as having been credited at the time of the alleged settlement, was credited on a store account made with Davis & Ould. It commences in November, 1898, in the name of W. I. Lusk, and, after running to August 21, 1899, in his name, was transferred to a new book, and entered up in the names of W. I. and M. O. Lusk. Nothing in the record shows that Mrs. Lusk ever contracted any part of the account, agreed to pay it, asked credit for it, or knew that it was made in her name. The rents in question were part of her separate personal estate, which she was entitled to hold free from the debts of her husband, and, in the absence of any application of them by her to the payment of her husband's store account, or an extension of credit upon the faith of the same, induced by some act or declaration of hers, they could not be applied in payment of her husband's account. Schouler's H. & W. 235, 324. The law presumes that the husband supports the family, since he is under a legal duty to do so. Id. 66, 101, 199; Min. Inst. 310; Bogges v. Richard's Adm'r, 39 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. 599, 26 L. R. A. 537, 45 Am. St. Rep. 938; Atwood v. Dolan, 34 W. Va. 563, 12 S. E. 688.

As the record fails to show in detail the findings and calculations made by the court, it is impossible to determine whether they are strictly accurate, but no more has been allowed than seems to be justly due, so far as can be ascertained from the evidence, under the principles above announced. By allowing interest on each item of unpaid rent from the date on which it became due until the date of the decree, there appears to be due Mrs. Lusk at least $550.

The court did not err in adjudging a lien in favor of Mrs. Lusk for the rent for the year next preceding the date of the assignment. The statute gives it. Code 1899, c. 93, § 11; Anderson v. Henry, 45 W. Va. 319, 31 S. E. 993.

These conclusions result in an affirmance of the decree as to both appellants.

March 22, 1904.)

BILL OF DISCOVERY—SUFFICIENCY—INSURANCE—NOTICE OF LOSS—RECEPTION.

1. It is necessary that a mixed bill for discovery and relief show that the plaintiff has a good case for recovery or defense, in order to obtain discovery.

2. Notice of loss may be given to an insurance company through the mail, at the risk of the insured. Deposit of it in the mail is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of its reception by such company.

3. If the furnishing of proof of loss is made by an insurance policy a condition precedent to action upon it, performance, or waiver of it, must be shown before recovery can be had. Such is the case where the policy provides that no action shall be brought until its conditions are complied with and it requires such proof of loss.

4. A bill cannot be maintained against a corporation for discovery without making a proper officer of it a party.

5. If a fire insurance policy provide that proof of loss shall be furnished within a given time, and that no action shall be brought upon it until such proof is furnished, and provide for its forfeiture for certain causes, but not for failure to furnish such proof of loss, failure to furnish such proof of loss within the given time does not wholly destroy all right of recovery, but only delays right of action; but action upon it cannot be brought until such proof is furnished.

6. Loss of a policy of fire insurance will not excuse compliance with the imperative requirements of the policy as to notice and proof of loss.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by J. W. Munson against the German-American Fire Insurance Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. W. Dailey, for appellant. W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. J. W. Munson filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Randolph county against the German-American Fire Insurance Company of New York, stating that the company had issued to him a policy of insurance for $1,000 upon his dwelling house; that the house was destroyed by fire, and that the policy was destroyed with it; that as soon as practicable after the fire he had informed the agent through whom he obtained the policy of the destruction of the house, he not knowing the company's address, and the agent informed him that he was no longer agent for the company, but gave him the address; that the plaintiff then wrote the company a letter informing it of the fire, but, receiving no reply, he placed the matter in the hands of an attorney, who wrote the company of the loss of the house and policy, and that the plaintiff did not know the demands of the policy as to what he should do, and asking what the company required of him in the way of proof of loss; that the company answered that this letter was the first information it had of the fire, and that the matter had been referred to its Baltimore agent; that the plaintiff asked this agent what was required of the plaintiff to secure a settlement of the claim, but both had failed to give him information. The bill states that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount of the policy; that he believed that it was provided in the policy that before he had right to recover it was necessary for him to furnish some sort of proof of loss, but that he did not remember the provisions of the policy, or what proof of loss was required; that he had so informed the company. The bill avers that the plaintiff had full proof to meet any requirement of the policy; that the company had an exact copy of the policy, and knew of its requirements. The bill asked that the company be required to make discovery as to requirements of the policy in order for the collection of the insurance money, that upon such discovery the plaintiff be allowed to furnish proof of his demand, and that the amount of the insurance be decreed to him. A decree was entered requiring the company to make such discovery, and afterwards a decree was rendered compelling the company to pay the full amount of the policy, and the company has appealed.

The first question arises upon a demurrer to the bill. The court overruled the demurrer. Counsel for the company suggests that it is indispensable that to call for discovery the bill show a good case, a right of recovery, and that this bill does not show a good case, because it shows that the plaintiff knew that he had to do certain things as conditions precedent to recovery, namely, to give the company notice of loss, and to furnish statement of the loss. It is plainly necessary that a bill show a recoverable case to call for discovery. It must state "a case which will constitute a just ground for a suit or defense, and its nature, * * * such a case as will enable the plaintiff to recover in the action." Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 163; 6 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 740; Story, Eq. Pl. § 319. This puts the question whether the bill does present a case for recovery. It is said that the bill admits, as it does, that Munson knew very well that he was called upon to give the company notice of the fire, and also proof of the loss, and its character and amount, and that the bill fails to state that he did so. The bill says that, after writing to the local agent, Munson wrote to the company of the fire at once. Prima facie, this was sufficient notice, as a letter deposited in the mail, properly addressed, is presumed to reach the person addressed. Galloway v. Standard Co., 45 W. Va. 237, 31 S. E. 969; 1 Joyce on Ins. §§ 62, 3300. Thus, so far as concerns notice of loss, the bill is sufficient. Besides, the policy is not stated in the bill as to its provisions, and we cannot say what were its provisions. We do not know whether the failure to give notice of the fire was required within a particular time, or whether it forfeited the contract. True, the bill says that it was necessary to recovery. This may be said to make it a precedent condition, but we do not know whether the failure to give notice of fire within a given time forfeited the policy. Therefore, as before suit notice of the fire was given, we cannot say that the demurrer was good so far as it concerns failure to give notice of loss in due time, because notice appears to have been given, and also because we do not see that its delay forfeited the policy.

But how as to proof of loss? The bill makes no pretense that it was given or attempted to be given. This makes the bill bad, because it admits that a duty to furnish proof of loss rested on Munson, and the law is settled that such proof is indispensable to a suit for recovery. If a pure bill of discovery could be maintained upon a bill not averring that proof of loss had been furnished, still a bill for discovery and relief cannot be sustained without such averment. "If the furnishing of proofs of loss is a condition precedent to the bringing of action, performance or waiver of it must be shown." Kerr on Ins. 767. This bill is one of discovery and relief, not a pure bill of discovery. There is jurisdiction in equity, regardless of discovery, since the bill states the loss of the policy; but that can be no relief upon a bill not stating that proof of loss was furnished or waived. It was error to overrule the demurrer and compel a discovery, as no proof of loss had been given before the suit. Proof of loss afterwards would not avail for this suit.

The bill is defective in another respect. When discovery from a corporation is asked, it is indispensable to make some proper officer of it a defendant, as a corporation cannot answer under oath, and therefore the practice is to make such officer a party. Teter v. W. Va. Cent. & Pa. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 433, 14 S. E. 146; Roanoke Street R. Co. v. Hicks (Va.) 32 S. E. 295. In the latter case the Virginia court said: "A bill cannot be maintained against a corporation alone, as one for discovery, it being unable to answer under oath."

The company, in response to the command for discovery, produced a copy of the policy. It provides that: "If fire occur, the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company * * * and within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by said insured stating" (giving the details of the proof of loss). The policy contained this provision: "No suit or action on this policy shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months after the fire." It contained no clause of forfeiture for failure to comply with this provision; that is, as to notice of loss and proof of loss. It does contain provisions forfeiting the policy for keeping certain inflammable articles in the house, and other causes, but does not for-felt for failure to give notice and proof of loss. As stated above, the bill states that prompt notice by letter was given of the fire, which is prima facie evidence of its reception by the company; but it is only prima facie evidence. The officers of the company swear that this letter did not reach the company. This repels the claim of early notice to the company. Joyce on Ins. § 8300. The earliest notice of the company was 8d January, 1902. The fire was 20th October, 1901. None of the authorities hold that this notice would comply with the provision of the policy demanding immediate notice of loss. Joyce on Ins. § 8291; May on Ins. § 462; Elliott on Ins. § 304; Kerr on Ins. p. 482. It would seem very reasonable that such a provision ought to be complied with within a reasonable time. How can a distant company, without such notice, know of the fire and take steps, while the matter is fresh, to investigate the facts for its own protection? But the policy does not forfeit for this cause, though it is particular to do so for other causes. "If no forfeiture is provided for in case of failure to furnish the proofs, forfeitures being stipulated in case of breach of other requirements, or furnishing the proofs in the specified time is not made a condition precedent to recovery, the great majority of recent decisions hold the effect of failure to furnish them is merely a postponement of the time of payment to the specified time after they are furnished." 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 829; Rheims v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 39 W. Va. 672, 20 S. E. 670. Elliott on Ins. § 307, says: "Where no forfeiture is provided by the contract, and the service of the proof of loss is not made a condition precedent to the liability of the company, the effect of such failure is simply to postpone the day of payment. No liability attaches to the company, however, until such proofs are furnished; but, unless otherwise provided, expressly or by fair implication, it is not important that proofs be not in fact served within the time stated in the policy." It is there stated that it is only when the policy forfeits the right that the liability ends. Kerr on Ins. 450, lays down the same law. But without regard to absolute forfeiture of the policy, it still can be said, under all the authorities, that, where a policy calls for proof of loss before suit, no suit can be maintained upon it without such proof. This is shown by authorities above given and by our own cases. Peninsular L. T. Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 606, 14 S. E. 237; Flanagan v. Phenix Ins. Co., 42 W. Va. 426, 26 S. E. 518; Adkins v. Globe Ins. Co., 45 W. Va. 384, 32 S. E. 194. It is said that the Rheims Case does not hold that proof of loss is a condition precedent to suit, and that it differs from the three cases above mentioned. I do not think so. That case turned more on waiver. The Rheims Case holds that where proof of loss is to be made within a fixed time, but the policy does not forfeit for failure therein, failure to make proof of loss within the time does not forfeit the policy, but postpones action until proof is made. There was proof in that case, but not within the time. It does not hold that suit can be brought without such proof. The Peninsular Case does not assert a forfeiture, but declares, with the Rheims Case, that proof before suit is necessary. The Flanagan and Adkins Cases say nothing as to forfeiture, but assert the prerequisite of proof before suit. All the cases are consistent with two propositions: One, that where proof is required by the policy within a fixed time, but no forfeiture is declared, mere failure to furnish proof within the time does not destroy all right of recovery; the other, that such proof must precede action. The failure of the plaintiff in this case to furnish proof of loss cannot be excused by the loss of the policy, even if Munson was unable to remember its provisions. Persons making an imperative contract cannot plead failure of memory of its contents. They are bound to remember. One cannot place upon the other damage from the former's loss of memory; he cannot make him carry the burden of an accident which is only the misfortune of the one, not the fault of the other. This policy makes no such exception. Only the act of God can intervene and release the letter of the contract. Joyce on Ins. § 8280; May on Ins. § 465; Kerr on Ins. p. 470.

For these reasons, we reverse the decree and dismiss bill.

CLARK et al. v. MERCER COUNTY COURT.*

March 15, 1904.)

TAXATION—EQUALIZATION—REVIEW BY COUNTY COURT—APPEAL.

1. C. and D. made application to the county court of the county of M. to have corrected certain valuations of their lands made by a commissioner to reassess the lands of that county under chapter 21, p. 82, Acts 1899, and also to have stricken off the valuation added thereto by the board of equalization; alleging that the acts of the commissioner and board were each illegal and void, and praying to be released from the taxes charged against their lands for 1900 upon the valuations ascertained and fixed as aforesaid. The county court refused their application and dismissed it. Applicants then appealed to the circuit court, making the county court a defendant. The circuit court, upon the appeal, reversed the order of the county court; ordered that said valuations and the landbooks for 1900 be corrected, as to applicants' lands, by taking therefrom the valuation added thereto by the board of equalization; and released and exonerated C. and D. from the payment of $1,889.43 of the state, county, and district taxes and levies charged against said lands for 1900, $1,049.70 of said sum being county and road levies. To the last-mentioned judgment, the county court was granted a writ of error.

Held, that the county court did not err in refusing the relief prayed for as aforesaid, because it was without jurisdiction to grant the same; that the circuit court did err in reversing the judgment of the county court, in correcting said valuations, and in releasing C. and D. from the payment of said taxes and levies as aforesaid; and that this court has jurisdiction upon said writ of error to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

Error from Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by E. W. Clark, trustee, and others, against the county court of Mercer county. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. M. Anderson, for plaintiff in error. A. W. Reynolds and J. S. Clark, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. On the 20th day of February, 1899, the Legislature of this state passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the reassessment of the value of all the real estate in this state" (Acts 1899, p. 82, c. 21), which act took effect 90 days after its passage. The law provides for the appointment, qualification, and duties of a commissioner for each assessment district in the several counties of the state. Each commissioner appointed and qualified under the act was required on the 1st day of April, 1899, or as soon thereafter as practicable, after receiving the books and instructions to be furnished to him by the auditor, to proceed to examine, in person, all the tracts of land and town lots, with the buildings and improvements, if any, thereon, within his district; and, upon such examination, in accordance with his instructions and the provisions of the act, to assess the fair cash value thereof. As soon as the commissioner had completed the assessment in his district, he was required to make and verify, by oath or affirmation, three copies thereof, in the books furnished by the auditor for that purpose, two of which books he was directed by the statute to file with the clerk of the county court of his county on or before the 1st day of January in the year 1900, and the other he was required to transmit to the auditor on or before the 1st day of April of the same year. In the county of Mercer, from which this proceeding comes, J. W. Dunnagan, the commissioner to reassess the lands in that county, was not appointed until April 5, 1900, under said act of 1899. It appears that he did not then have sufficient time to go upon the lands in the county and make a personal examination thereof, but took for his guide the book showing the reassessment of said lands in 1890, and also the landbook of said county for 1899, and made up his assessments by adopting the lands and the values thereof as charged, and appearing upon said book for 1899; that he made no changes thereof, except to add thereto the value of any additional buildings placed on the lands of which he had information; and that the reassessment of the lands of defendants in error, hereinafter referred to, was made in that way. It also appears that there was no reassessment of the lands in Mercer county under said act or otherwise, except that made by Dunnagan. Section 10 of that act provides for a state board of equalization, to consist of four members, whose duty it was to correct and equalize the assessments made as aforesaid between the several counties and assessment districts, if it should appear to them that the average value of the real estate in any county was either too high or too low. The said board had the right, under the law, to increase or reduce the average value of the real estate in the several counties and districts thereof according to the evidence adduced before them, or which might come to their knowledge. It is also shown that the board of equalization increased the valuation of the lands in Mercer county, as fixed by Dunnagan, including the lands of plaintiff, and added thereto 25 per cent. On the 11th day of December, 1900, said E. W. Clark and Joseph I. Doran, trustees of the Flat Top Coal Land Association, made application to the county court of said county of Mercer to have corrected the reassessment of the lands of said association in that county made under said act of 1899 as aforesaid, and to have corrected the landbook for 1900 in respect to said lands, which application was docketed, and the prosecuting attorney for the county waived notice thereof and appeared thereto; and again, on the 16th day of March, 1901, to which time the hearing had been continued, the said applicants, as well as the prosecuting attorney who attended to the interests of the state and county in the matter, appeared in the county court, whereupon said trustees moved the court to correct the landbook of Mercer county for the year 1900 in respect to all of the tracts of land charged thereon in their names, as trustees aforesaid, and to release and exonerate them, as trustees, from the payment of 25 per cent. of the taxes charged upon all of said tracts of land for the year 1900, upon the ground that said taxes were and are illegal, having been placed thereon pursuant to the action of the State Board of Equalization, appointed and acting under the provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1899, and because said taxes were and are based upon the reassessment of lands made in the year 1900 as aforesaid, and upon the ground that the action of the board of equalization, in placing an increase of 25 per cent. in value upon said lands was and is illegal and void. After hearing the evidence upon the motion, the county court overruled the same, refused to correct the said landbook, and declined to release the applicants from any of the taxes charged against them upon said lands as aforesaid for the year 1900. To the action and ruling of the court, said Clark and Doran, trustees, excepted, and upon their request the court signed a bill of exceptions in which is certified all of the evidence heard and the rulings made by it upon the hearing of the application aforesaid. From this order of the county court said Clark and Doran obtained an appeal to the circuit court. The appeal was placed on the record of that court in the name of "E. W. Clark et al., Surviving Trustee, v. County Court of Mercer County." On the 15th day of August, 1901, it was heard by the circuit court; the plaintiffs, E. W. Clark and Joseph I. Doran, being present, as well as John M. Anderson, prosecuting attorney of Mercer county, who was attending to the interests of the state and county therein. The last-mentioned court was of opinion that there had been no reassessment of the lands in the proceedings mentioned, under the said act of 1890; that the action of the board of equalization in increasing the valuation of said lands 25 per cent. was and is illegal and void; that such illegally increased value resulted in the illegal increase of the taxes on the lands of said Clark and others, trustees, to the extent of 20 per cent.; and that 20 per cent. of the taxes charged against said lands on the landbook for 1900 were and are void. The order or judgment of the county court was therefore reversed and set aside, and the landbook of Mercer county for the year 1900 was ordered to be corrected as to all of the tracts of land charged thereon in the names of said E. W. Clark and others, trustees, to the extent of 20 per cent. of the taxes charged against said lands, and that said trustees should be, and were, released and exonerated from the payment of the illegal assessment against them as aforesaid, amounting to 20 per cent. of the taxes charged against said lands for the said year. The taxes, from the payment of which said Clark and others were so released and exonerated, were and are as follows: State tax, $262.41; state school tax, $105.08; county levy, $524.85; road tax, $524.85; teachers' fund, $524.85; for purchase of schoolbooks, $52.47; and building fund, $419.82. Thereupon the prosecuting attorney moved the court to set aside its said finding and judgment, which it refused to do. The county court, by its prosecuting attorney, then applied for, and was granted, a writ of error and supersedeas by this court to the last-mentioned judgment.

Defendants in error contend that the reassessment by Dunnagan, commissioner as aforesaid, was and is illegal and void, because he was not appointed within the time prescribed by the act in which the assessment should have been made and completed; that his appointment was after the date on which he was required to begin his work of reassessment; that at the time of his appointment the life of the act had expired; that the reassessment so made by him for these and the further reason that he did not personally examine the lands, was and is illegal and void; and that therefore the action of the board of equalization in increasing and adding 25 per cent. to the value of the lands as fixed by said Dunnagan was and is without jurisdiction, illegal, and void.

Const. art. 10, § 1, provides that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and all property, both real and personal, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value. * * *" In order to carry out this mandate of the Constitution, the Legislature from time to time has enacted suitable laws providing for the revaluation and reassessment of the lands of the state. Such statutes, in their administrative requirements, are generally treated and held by the courts as directory. If, however, by the use of negative words, the statute requires a particular proceeding to be taken in a particular time or manner, and makes it void if not so done, or gives it effect provided it is so done, or declares that, unless it is so taken, subsequent proceedings shall not be had, or prohibits its being done except at the time the statute prescribes, or if any terms plainly imperative are employed, the intent is clear, and no discretion can be permitted in construction. It is not often, however, that these or similar words are met with in the statutes which define official duties under the revenue laws, and the construction of particular provisions must be left for determination in such light as the obvious purpose they were intended to accomplish may afford. No one should be at liberty to plant himself upon the nonfeasance or misfeasance of officers under the revenue laws which in no way concern himself, and make them the excuse for a failure on his part to perform his own duty. Cooley on Tax. 479.

While it is not necessary to decide the question in order to dispose of the present case, yet we are of opinion that the administrative features of the act under consideration are directory, and that the revaluation and reassessment of the taxes charged against the lands of plaintiffs thereunder as aforesaid were not and are not void, but were and are irregular. Section 7 (page 86) of the act provides that "any person feeling himself aggrieved by the assessment of his real estate or other property, as herein provided for, made under the provisions of this act, may, within one year after the filing of a copy of such assessment with the clerk of the county court, apply, by himself or his agent, to the said court for redress, first giving reasonable notice in writing of his intentions to the prosecuting attorney, and stating in said notice the character of the correction he desires. It shall be the duty of the prosecuting attorney, upon being notified, to attend to the interest of the state at the trial of such application. If upon hearing the evidence offered, the county court shall be of opinion that there is error in the assessment complained of, or that the valuation fixed by the commissioner is too high or too low, the court shall make such order correcting the assessment as is just and proper. The right of appeal, from any such order made by the county court, shall lie to the circuit court, and may be taken either by the applicant or the state; and in case the applicant, or the state by its prosecuting attorney or agent, desires to take an appeal from such order, the party desiring to take such appeal shall have the evidence taken at the hearing of such application certified by the county court, and such appeal when allowed, by the court or judge in vacation, shall have precedence over all other cases pending in said court." This provision refers to the assessments made by the commissioners and not to the acts of the board of equalization, "whose duty it shall be to correct and equalize the assessments so made, between the counties and assessment districts." That statute nowhere confers jurisdiction on the county court to review or alter the work of said board. Under section 94 of chapter 29 of the Code of 1890, the county court had no authority to make the change or grant the relief prayed for by Clark and others upon the grounds urged by them. Therefore the county court, having no jurisdiction, did not err in dismissing said application. The circuit court, acting as an appellate tribunal under the same law, had no jurisdiction to reverse the action of the county court, and release the applicants from the payment of said taxes, as hereinbefore stated. The circuit court therefore should have refused the appeal, and declined to act in the matter.

Can this court entertain this writ of error? In the case of Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. 632, the court held that "a county court is not a party to an appeal taken under section 7, c. 36, p. 63, Acts 1891, for reassessment of lands by a landowner, from the decision of a county court refusing to reduce the valuation of his land made by a commissioner under said act, and cannot maintain a writ of error from this court to the decision of a circuit court upon such appeal." The section of the act of 1891 referred to provides that the right of appeal from any such order made by the county court shall lie to the circuit court, and may be taken either by the applicant or the state. In that case the applicant, Mackin, appealed to the circuit court; and from the judgment of that court, which was adverse to her, she obtained a writ of error to this court, which was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The court, by Brannon, J., in part, says: "Thus I have shown that there is no act expressly giving a writ of error to this court on the decision by a circuit court of an appeal from a county court in a matter of correction of an assessment for taxes, and also that no writ of error lies under the general statute providing for appeals and writs of error." But that case does not govern this writ of error. The Constitution (article 8, § 3) confers appellate jurisdiction on this court in civil cases "where the matter in controversy exclusive of costs, is of greater value or amount than one hundred dollars; * * * and in cases relating to the public revenue, the right of appeal shall belong to the state as well as the defendant." Counties are parcels and subdivisions of the state. The county courts are the legal representatives of the respective counties for the exercise and discharge of certain delegated governmental functions, among which are the superintendence and administration of the internal police and fiscal affairs of their counties, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law. Const. art. 8, § 24. Upon proper application and proof, the county court may increase or reduce the valuation of any property charged with taxes within its jurisdiction, and release the taxes erroneously assessed thereon. It is thus clothed with authority to deal with the state and district as well as the county taxes and levies. The county court of every county shall be a corporation by the name of "The County Court of — County," by which name it may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and contract and be contracted with. Code 1890, c. 39, § 1. It would be a solecism to say that the Constitution creates the county court, and imposes upon it certain duties, of which the superintendence and administration of the fiscal affairs of its county is one, and that the statute gives it the right to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in the courts, but that it cannot be a party to a tax proceeding which directly affects and takes from it the revenues of its county. In this case, by the order or judgment of the circuit court, which we must say was and is wholly without jurisdiction, and therefore void, the state, county, and districts in said county of Mercer were and are deprived of $1,889.48 of taxes for 1900, not because the lands upon which the taxes were charged were not liable for taxes for that year, not because said lands were valued too high, but for the reason, as it is stated, that the commissioner and board of equalization were without authority to fix the valuations. The county court, representing directly the said county and road levies, amounting in the aggregate to $1,049.70, was thus deprived, to that extent, of the means with which to pay the creditors of the county, to open and maintain public roads, and to discharge other public obligations. If we were disposed to adopt a narrow meaning of the Constitution and statute, we can nevertheless entertain this writ of error for the purpose of reversing said judgment. The county court was made a party defendant to the "case" (which is a civil case) in the circuit court. The judgment of that court was and is, in legal effect, in favor of the plaintiffs, Clark and others, against the county court, for $1,049.70, to be taken from its county and road levies. That judgment was and is void. Where the subject-matter in controversy is sufficient, and the bar of the statute has not intervened, the right of a party to a void judgment or decree to have the same reviewed and reversed, if prejudiced thereby, is unquestioned. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh, 224; McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724; Railroad Co. v. Ryan, 81 W. Va. 364, 6 S. E. 924, 13 Am. St. Rep. 865; Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196-199, 18 S. E. 468.

The judgment complained of, being prejudicial to the plaintiff in error and void, is reversed and set aside, and the said proceeding is dismissed.

STATE v. KELLISON.*

March 1, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DELAY IN TRIAL—DISCHARGE OF ACCUSED—PRIVILEGE OF COUNSEL—RECORD—IMPANELING JURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The fact that the record in a felony case shows that more than three terms of the court have passed without a trial, after the finding of the indictments, affords no ground for the discharge of the accused, under section 25 of chapter 159 of the Code of 1899, from prosecution for the offense with which he is charged. It must further appear that he has been held for trial, as well as charged with the crime, for such period, without a trial.

2. Failure of the record in a felony case to show that the accused had the assistance of counsel therein is not ground for setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, if it does not affirmatively appear that the accused was denied the privilege of counsel guaranteed to him by section 14 of article 3 of the Constitution.

3. It is not necessary to a legal conviction on a charge of felony that the order showing the impaneling of the jury recite that the jurors so impaneled were good and lawful men.

4. If, in such case, the order recite that the jury were "sworn the truth to speak upon the issue joined," without more respecting the oath, and it does not appear that any objection was made to the form of the oath administered, it is presumed that the jury were properly sworn.

5. Failure of the record in a felony case to show that, upon an adjournment, the court instructed the officer into whose charge the jury were given to keep them together, and not to converse with them, or permit any one else to do so, is not ground for setting aside the verdict. Although it is usual and proper to give such instruction, the law does not require it, for the statute makes it the duty of the officer to do the things above mentioned without any instruction.

6. When, in a trial of a felony case, the court instructs the jury, at the instance of the defendant, that, in order to convict, they must believe from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty, it is not error to give, at the instance of the state, another instruction to the effect that such reasonable doubt is not a vague or uncertain doubt, and that what the jury believe from the evidence as men they should believe as jurors.

7. The giving, in such case, of the following instruction, though not as periphrastic as it ought to be, is not error: "The court instructs the jury that, to convict a person of murder, it is not necessary that malice should have existed in the heart of the accused against the deceased, and if they believe from the evidence that the accused, with a deadly weapon, shot and killed the said Julia Simmons, the intent and the malice may both be inferred from such act."

8. Instructions to the jury must be taken and read as a whole, and if, upon being so read and construed, they state the law correctly, and do not misstate it in any particular, and no proper instruction asked for has been refused, the verdict will not be disturbed on the ground that additional proper instructions could have been given, or that some particular instruction, standing alone, might tend to mislead the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Pocahontas County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Jerome Kellison was convicted of murder in the first degree, and brings error. Affirmed.

C. H. Scott, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, P. Jerome Kellison, convicted of murder of the first degree in the circuit court of Pocahontas county, and sentenced to life imprisonment, complains of alleged errors in the judgment. The order entered on the 4th day of October, 1899, merely shows the return of the indictment, and no other order in the case was made until the 2d day of October, 1901, when the accused was arraigned, and entered his plea of not guilty and took a continuance. As more than three regular terms of the court, after the finding of the indictment, had passed without a trial, and the record did not show any of the reasons therefor that, under the statute (section 25, c. 159, of the Code of 1899), excuse such failure, it is said that he was entitled to his discharge from prosecution for the offense. "Every person charged with felony, and remanded to a circuit court for trial, shall be forever discharged from prosecution for the offense" if there be such failure, unless certain specified reasons therefor are shown. The accused does not appear by the record to be within the provisions of this statute. It does not show that more than three terms had passed without a trial after he was taken into custody. He had not been arraigned, nor entered any plea, nor, so far as is disclosed by the record, had he been remanded to the circuit court for trial. There can be no presumption that at any time before October, 1901, he had demanded or desired a trial, or was so situated that the court could try him. The fact is, as shown by the testimony, that he was never arrested on the charge until May, 1901. Had he moved for a discharge before going to trial, this fact would have precluded it.

*Rehearing denied.

If, after trial and conviction, he could demand his discharge in this court at this late day, that fact would clearly bar him here, as the record shows it. The word "remanded" in said section is not consistent with the present statutory provisions relating to procedure in felony cases. Since the necessity of a preliminary examination as a prerequisite to trial has been dispensed with, and indictments are no longer found in courts having no jurisdiction to try on charges of felony, the expression is inaccurate. But under the Code of 1860, and the statutes as they existed prior thereto, it was consistent with other provisions, and only applied to persons in custody or under recognizance. Hence it can only apply under such conditions now, and is to be construed as if it read "held" for trial, instead of "remanded" for trial. In Virginia the statute, as amended, so reads. Kibler v. Com., 94 Va. 804, 28 S. E. 858.

No order entered in the case, except the one in which the verdict is recorded discloses that the accused had the assistance of counsel, and an assignment of error is based upon the failure of the record to show that fact. The trial seems to have been in progress on three successive days, but there is no mention of counsel until the third day. Nothing in this record indicates that he asked for the assistance of counsel, or that he was denied it, or that he did not have it. The Constitution does not make assistance of counsel a prerequisite to conviction as it does a trial by jury. The clause contains no prohibitory language. It only says he shall have the assistance of counsel. The common law did not permit persons charged with felony to have the advice and assistance of counsel, and this clause of section 14 of article 3 of the Constitution was inserted to cure the shameful defect of the common law in this respect by guarantying said right to such persons. Cooley's Const. Lim. 474. Even if said clause makes it the duty of the state to furnish counsel when demanded, it does not follow that such action is to be taken unless demand therefor has been made, nor that the silence of the record on the subject raises a presumption of the denial of the privilege. This clause is in the same section with the one which says the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against him, under which it has been held to be reversible error to permit the examination of witnesses in the absence of the accused. State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 39 S. E. 676; State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 800; State v. Sutfin, Id. 771; State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736; Younger v. State, 2 W. Va. 579, 98 Am. Dec. 791. In those cases it was held that the record must affirmatively show the presence of the accused at all stages of the trial. But in arriving at that conclusion the court very properly read that clause in connection with the constitutional inhibition of a conviction without a trial by jury, and the testimony of the witnesses is an inseparable part of the trial. The assistance of counsel is a matter of a different kind. Both at common law and under our Constitution a trial in a felony case may be had without the assistance of counsel. The prisoner himself may be learned in the law, and skilled in its practice. Can it be said that it is the duty of the court, or was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, to compel a man to accept the assistance of counsel whether he desires it or not? Even in the case of the personal presence of the accused at the trial, the presumption of regularity operates to some extent. It is sufficient to show his presence at the commencement of the proceedings of any day, and, if the record does not affirmatively show his absence thereafter, his presence is presumed to have continued throughout the session.

Although it appears from the record that the jury were selected and tried, an assignment of error is predicated upon the failure of the order to say they were "good and lawful men," but it is not insisted upon in the argument. The record shows no objection to the jurors, or any of them, on the ground of incompetence or disqualification, and, as a rule, there is a presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction. In felony cases there are some exceptions to the rule, but no reason is perceived why the record should affirmatively show these formal words. The observations hereinafter made respecting the oath of the jurors apply here with equal force.

Another objection is that the jury were not sworn to return a verdict according to the law and the evidence. The order recites that they were "sworn the truth to speak upon the issue joined." Under several decisions of this court this is sufficient. The record does not purport to set out the form in which the oath was administered, nor show anything which negatives the presumption that it was in the usual form. In Lawrence's Case, 30 Grat. 849, the order recited that the jury "were sworn the truth of and upon the premises to speak." Moncure, P., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "And the effect is the same as if it had been said, that the jury were sworn 'well and truly to try and true deliverance make between the commonwealth and the prisoner at the bar, and a true verdict render according to the evidence.' The prisoner and his counsel were in court when the jury were sworn, and might and no doubt would, have objected, if the jury were not properly sworn. The fact that no objection was made shows that they were properly sworn. It is not necessary that the form of the oath administered to jurors on the trial of a felony case should be copied into the record. It is sufficient that the record shows they were duly sworn."

This language is quoted with approval by Johnson, P., in State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771, 773, and it clearly covers the objection raised here. The syllabus in State v. Sutfin says: "It is not necessary that the form of the oath administered to a jury in a felony case should be entered on the record. It is sufficient if the record shows that the jury were duly sworn." To the same general effect, see State v. Ice, 34 W. Va. 244, 12 S. E. 695; State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. 813; Russell v. State, 10 Tex. 288; Wrocklege v. State, 1 Iowa, 168; State v. Ostrander, 18 Iowa, 436.

A further objection is that the jury were given in charge of the sheriff of the county and one of his deputies "with instructions to keep them together without communication with any other person, and not to speak to them relative to this trial." This is the recital of the record, which does not show the name of the deputy. This court cannot presume, in the face of the recital of the record, that the person to whom they were given in charge was not a deputy sheriff, and the name of the deputy is wholly immaterial, as any one of the deputies was a person qualified for such duty. The instructions to the officer, as recited in the order, were not in the language of the statute, but they substantially conformed to it so far as the order purports to set them out. No objection was made or exception taken for want of proper instructions, nor does the statute say the court shall give any instruction to the officer, though it is usually done, in the form of an oath administered to the officer. This court has decided that the oath is unnecessary, and imposes no additional obligation upon the sheriff. The law makes it his duty without any instruction from the court. State v. Polndexter, 23 W. Va. 805.

At the instance of the state several instructions were given over the objection of the defendant. As the propriety of giving them depends upon the character of the evidence, a brief statement of the material facts becomes necessary. Kellison's victim was Mrs. Julia A. Simmons, who was killed in her own dooryard, at about 10 o'clock at night, by a pistol shot fired by him, and which took effect in the right breast. Her daughter and several other persons were on the porch, but a few feet distant from the gate at or near which she and Kellison were standing when the shot was fired. But whether any of them actually saw what occurred between the accused and the deceased at the moment the shot was fired is not made clear by the evidence. Kellison was more or less intoxicated, and had come to the place a short time before the killing in company with Charles Apperson, another young man, in quest of two girls, Ess Clunen and Eliza Campbell. On the evening before they had called upon these girls at the home of Elizabeth Clunen, mother of Ess Clunen, and had possibly arranged to see the girls at the same place on the evening of the homicide. Apperson says they had, but other witnesses state the contrary. At any rate, they went, and were informed upon their arrival that the girls had gone to Mrs. Simmons' that day to work, but would return that evening. After waiting for some time, Kellison and Apperson started to meet the girls, taking with them Jason Clunen, a young boy, and brother of Ess Clunen. Not meeting them, they went on to the premises of Mrs. Simmons, a distance of two or three miles. Instead of going to the house, they sent Jason Clunen in to tell his sister that her sister at home was sick, and that she must return at once. She started out, accompanied by Lucy Simmons, a daughter of the deceased, and, being in distress over the news, she was soon informed by her brother that her sister was not sick, but that the boys were down at the fence, and wanted to see her and Eliza Campbell, and take them back home. Later Apperson went to the house, but Kellison did not. The evidence shows that he was noisy, abusive, and indecent in his language, and fired one or more shots from his pistol while in conversation with the girls and Mrs. Simmons. He made threats against one John Edmiston, of whom he was jealous, saying he had come there to kill him. Mrs. Simmons had interposed an objection to the demand that the girls go home that night, and Kellison used abusive and offensive language toward her. It seems that at one time he retired from the fence near the house, but came back, and in the meantime Lucy Simmons had armed herself with a sword. Kellison was ordered to leave the premises, but, instead of going, he continued to make threats and use abusive and indecent language. Mrs. Simmons took the sword from the hands of her daughter and went to the gate, saying that she would protect her house and her children from him, or that she would make him leave. As stated, the daughter and others, including Ess Clunen and Charles Apperson, were on the porch, in front of which there were some hop vines, which may have obstructed the view of what transpired at the gate. They say, however, they heard Kellison order Mrs. Simmons to stand back, and that immediately afterwards the shot was fired, which killed her almost instantly. Apperson testifies that there was a cut on Kellison's hand, which might have been made by the sword. He had a ring on a finger of that hand, which also had an indentation, which might have been made in the same way.

The first instruction was objected to because it tells the jury they may believe or refuse to believe any witness, and that when passing upon the credibility of a witness they may take into consideration his interest in the matter in controversy and his demeanor upon the witness stand. It is said this instruction conveyed an intimation to the jury that some of the evidence must be disbelieved, and that they might reject that part of it which was favorable to the accused. Though probably a little informal, the instruction states the law correctly, and, though there was very little conflict or inconsistency in the statements of the several witnesses, it is not perceived that the instruction could have had any such effect as is claimed. It does not refer to the evidence of any particular witness, and leaves all questions of credibility to the jury.

Instruction No. 2 told the jury that a reasonable doubt was not a vague or uncertain doubt, and that what the jury believe from the evidence as men, they should believe as jurors. This, taken in connection with the instruction given for the defendant, saying it was the duty of the state to prove the accused guilty beyond all reasonable doubt in order to convict, states the law with sufficient accuracy. They were told that their belief must be founded upon the evidence, and that a vague and uncertain doubt is not a reasonable doubt within the meaning of the law. How there could be any difference between their belief as men and their belief as jurors is not perceptible. Being jurors, they were still men, and the only belief possible is that which fastens itself upon the human mind, and they were told that it must be belief beyond all reasonable doubt. All the authorities say that reasonable doubt is difficult to define, but that its meaning is not difficult for a jury to comprehend. State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 609, 610, 39 S. E. 676. As the jurors were acting under oath, it cannot be assumed that they were men of such feeble understanding as to deem themselves relieved from the obligations thereby imposed by the terms of the instruction.

Instruction No. 3 told the jury that a man is presumed to intend that which he does, or that which is the immediate or necessary consequence of the act. As far as it goes, this is old and sound law.

Instruction No. 4 was, in substance, that if the jury believed the deceased had come to her death from a pistol shot at the hands of the accused, and he relied upon self-defense, the burden was upon him to show it by a preponderance of the evidence. This is good as far as it goes, and, if it is incomplete in any respect, the deficiency is supplied by the full instruction on the subject of self-defense given at the request of the defendant.

Instruction No. 5 is, in substance, the usual one to the effect that when a homicide is proven it is presumed to be murder of the second degree, and that the burden is upon the state to elevate it, and upon the prisoner to reduce it.

Instruction No. 6 is point 11 of the syllabus in Cain's Case, 20 W. Va. 679, which is as old, almost, as the criminal law.

Instruction No. 7 reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, to convict a person of murder, it is not necessary that malice should have existed in the heart of the accused against the deceased, and if they believe from the evidence that the accused, with a deadly weapon, shot and killed the said Julia Simmons, the intent and the malice may both be inferred from such act." The court evidently meant to say that express antecedent malice is not a necessary element of the crime, and that proof of express malice was unnecessary, all of which is sound law; and it was certainly proper to say that, if the jury believed from the evidence that the accused had shot and killed the deceased, they might infer from the act both malice and the intent to kill. Though the instruction does say it is not necessary that malice should have existed in the heart of the accused against the deceased, this statement is qualified by what follows, and the instruction as a whole tells the jury that malice is an element of the crime; but that it may be inferred from the act of taking life with a deadly weapon, and the jury could not have reasonably construed it to mean more than that proof of express malice was unnecessary. It could have been more perspicuously stated, but verdicts are not set aside for rhetorical imperfections or awkward phraseology in instructions, when the meaning intended to be conveyed is clearly manifest.

Instruction No. 8 reads as follows: "If the jury believes from the evidence that the prisoner, Jerome Kellison, went to the home of Mrs. Julia Simmons with a deadly weapon for the purpose of committing a felony or some other illegal purpose, or that the prisoner formed that purpose after coming on the property of Mrs. Julia Simmons, he was from that moment a trespasser, and it was his duty to leave when ordered away by Mrs. Simmons; and Mrs. Simmons had a right to use all forces necessary to make the prisoner leave; and if the prisoner refused to leave after repeated orders to go from the deceased, and used abusive, insulting, and blackguarding language to her, and upon the deceased going towards the prisoner with a saber in her hand, from her front door, saying she intended to protect her home and children, and that the prisoner should leave, the prisoner continued to curse and blackguard the deceased and her family, refused to leave, and drew a pistol and shot and killed the deceased, they must find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, unless they further believe from the evidence that the prisoner had reason to believe, and did believe, he was in imminent danger, and could not retreat without endangering his life, or great bodily harm." If it can be said that this instruction conveys an intimation that the deceased had the right to make a deadly assault upon the accused upon his refusal to leave, such intimation can be nothing more than a mere inference from the language used. The instruction does not say she had the right to kill or main, but only that she might use such force as was necessary to compel his retirement from the premises. The other instructions given in the case, both for the state and the defendant, leave no room for any such inference. The jury were plainly and repeatedly told that, if he fired the shot under such circumstances as made it lawful to do so, naming them, although upon the grounds of the premises of the deceased, he was guilty of no offense; and also that if the prisoner was upon the grounds of the deceased without legal right, and using profane language, the deceased was not justified in attacking him with, or attempting to eject him by the use of, a deadly weapon. The instructions must be taken and read as a whole, and if, upon being so read and construed, they propound the law correctly, and do not misstate it in any particular, they afford no ground for setting aside the verdict. The last clause of the instruction propounds the law correctly. The accused was in fault. On this question there is no conflict in the evidence. He brought on the quarrel. Having done so, nothing could justify his taking the life of the deceased except the necessity of doing so in order to save his own life, or prevent the infliction upon him of great bodily injury. There are two grounds upon which a man may stand his ground, and, if need be, kill his adversary, when he has opportunity to escape by retreating. When the attack upon him is made with murderous intent, with a sufficient overt act, he is under no duty to fly. Bish. Cr. Law, § 850; State v. Clark, 51 W. Va. 457, 41 S. E. 204. When one is assaulted in his own dwelling house, he need not retreat, but he cannot take the life of his adversary unless it is necessary in order to save his own life or prevent other felony. State v. Clark, cited; Bish. Cr. Law, § 858; Beard v. United States, 158 U. S. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. 902, 39 L. Ed. 1086. Exceptions are taken to some clauses of the instruction on the ground that they are incorrect recitals of the evidence, but a careful examination shows that they are not recitals. They constitute a hypothetical statement of facts as to which there is evidence, leaving it to the jury to determine whether they are established.

As it does not appear that the court erred in any of its rulings, the judgment will be affirmed.

PEEPLES et al. v. SETHNESS CO.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—PROCEDURE—VERIFIED ACCOUNT—PLEA—DEFAULT—JUDGMENT.

1. Where a verified account is attached to the summons in a justice's court, and served on the defendant personally, the affidavit performs the office of evidence, and the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, unless a verified defense is filed.

2. Suit on an unverified account may be met by an unverified plea.

3. But where a suit on an unverified account has been personally served, and the same is met by no defense whatever, the defendant's silence is to be treated as an admission of the correctness of every item in the account, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the call of the docket, and without the case being assigned for trial.

4. Questions as to the description or misjoinder of the parties are concluded by the judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by the Sethness Company against H. C. Peeples and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The Sethness Company brought suit on an account in a justice's court against the Southern Bottling Company and H. C. Peeples, which was personally served. There was no appearance for the defendants, and on the first day of the term and on the call of the docket the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants presented their petition for certiorari, on the grounds (1) that the judgment could not be lawfully rendered without proof of the correctness of the account being first made by the plaintiff; (2) that judgment could not be rendered on the call of the docket without first assigning the case in its regular order; and (3) because it was not alleged whether the Southern Bottling Company was a partnership or a corporation and Peeples was improperly joined as a defendant. The court refused to grant the writ of certiorari, and the petitioners therefor excepted.

J. W. & J. D. Humphries, for plaintiffs in error. Mark J. McCoard, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. If, in a justice's court, the plaintiff attaches to his summons a verified account, and the same is served upon the de-defendant personally, the affidavit as to the correctness of the account serves the office of evidence, which will be sufficient to make out the plaintiff's claim unless the same is met by a verified defense. An unverified account thus sued on may be met by an unverified plea. But where an unverified account sued on has been personally served, and is met by no defense whatever, the defendant's silence is to be treated as an admission of the correctness of every item in the account; "the case shall be considered in default," and the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment. Parris v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 631; Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5077, 5078. This judgment may be entered on the call of the docket, and as soon as the fact of default is ascertained.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—BOOKS—RENTAL CHARGE.

1. While the act of December 16, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 90, § 8), empowers county boards of education to purchase schoolbooks and rent them to the pupils, it does not authorize them to compel the pupils to rent such books, and make the payment of the rental charge a condition precedent to admission to the schools, without regard to whether the pupils already have such books.

Error from Superior Court, Sumter County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Mandamus by S. M. Gordy against J. B. Mathis, superintendent of schools, and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Blalock & Cobb and Hooper & Dykes, for plaintiffs in error. Shipp & Sheppard, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. To an order granting a mandamus absolute against the school authorities of Americus, directing them to admit certain children to the schools without requiring them to pay certain rental charges for books, the defendants excepted. The question in the case is whether, by section 8 of the act of December 16, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 90), the school authorities were authorized, where they had purchased the books needed for the schools and offered to rent them to the pupils, to make the payment of the rental charge a condition precedent to the admission of a child, without regard to whether he was already possessed of the books needed. The act above mentioned authorizes the proper school authorities to purchase such books as may be needed or adopted for the schools, and then sell them to the patrons and pupils of the schools. Section 3 then provides "that in cases where said boards of education shall purchase the books needed in said schools under their control, as herein provided for, they may rent the same to the pupils at such fees or for such charges as they may deem just and proper, and the boards may make all proper rules to insure the payment of said fees and charges and proper care in the preservation of said books." The judge below held that the proper construction of this act did not authorize the school authorities to make the renting of the books a condition precedent to admission to the schools, but that, while such authorities may purchase the books, and rent them to the pupils, adopting rules and regulations to insure the collection of the rental charges and the preservation of the books, "yet should a parent, as in the present case, whose children are otherwise entitled to be admitted to the educational privileges of said schools, supply such children with such books and stationery as are necessary for the use of such children under the regulations of such school, such children would be entitled to registration and admittance to said schools without the payment of such rental fees or charges." We think that the judge below properly construed the act in question. While the act conferred upon the school authorities full power to purchase the books and rent them out, it did not contemplate a compulsory renting. It authorized the rental, but did not authorize the school authorities to compel the pupils to rent. The rules the school authorities were authorized to make were not such as required the pupils to rent books, but such as would secure the payment of the rental charges by those who did rent, and insure the preservation of the books. The act did not contemplate a regulation that each pupil must rent his books from the school authorities even though he already has all the books he will need, or is required to have by the regulations of the school. The act did not, expressly or by implication, authorize the school authorities to compel the pupils to rent.

One of the questions argued in this court and in the court below was whether the act would be unconstitutional if a contrary construction were given it. This question was not passed upon by the judge below because its decision was rendered unnecessary by his construction of the act. For the same reason we also find it unnecessary to decide the question.

PERRY et al. v. BRUNSWICK & W. RY. CO.

ERROR—REVIEW—CERTIORARI—RAILROADS—LIABILITY OF LESSOR—SERVICE OF SUMMONS.

1. In reviewing a judgment of a judge of the superior court overruling a certiorari, questions which might have been made in the inferior judicatory, but which are not referred to in the petition for certiorari, will not be considered.

2. The act of December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, pp. 54, 55, § 1), providing that in certain cases railroad companies which have leased their property or lines of railroad may be held liable for claims against the lessee, does not contemplate that service upon the agent of the lessee will amount to service upon the lessor. While the act imposes a liability on the lessor, such lessor should be properly served.

3. Where in such a case the sheriff makes a return of service which is traversed by the defendant (the lessor), the latter may introduce evidence to show that no service was in fact made upon it.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by T. D. Perry and others against the Brunswick & Western Railway Company. Judgment for defendant on overruling of certiorari in the superior court, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Claude Payton, for plaintiffs in error. D. H. Pope and Perry & Tipton, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit for damages was brought in the county court of Worth county against the Brunswick & Western Railway Company. The sheriff made a return of service, which was traversed by the defendant. Upon the hearing of the issue thus made, the court decided in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff sued out a writ of certiorari, and on the hearing in the superior court the certiorari was overruled. The plaintiff excepted.

1. In one of the exceptions taken to the ruling of the judge of the superior court, the plaintiff in error seeks to raise the question whether the traverse filed in the county court by the defendant was insufficient, in that it was not signed by any one. The record shows that, while there was no signature to the body of the traverse, the attorney at law of the defendant subscribed the affidavit thereto. This would seem sufficient (see Neal v. Fox, 114 Ga. 164, 39 S. E. 860), but, whether it is or is not, the point is not properly before this court for determination. The petition for certiorari did not show, or even intimate, that any such question was made or passed upon in the county court, or suggest that the traverse was insufficient in the matter now pointed out. The plaintiff in error cannot, by bill of exceptions, raise points which were not made in the county court or in the certiorari. The judge of the superior court had no authority to consider any rulings of the county court which were not assigned as error in the petition for certiorari. Civ. Code 1895, § 4650; Fouché v. Morris, 112 Ga. 143, 37 S. E. 182; Brown v. Alexander, 112 Ga. 247, 37 S. E. 368. In reviewing his decision, this court is confined to points which were properly before him.

2. From the evidence introduced in the county court, it appears that the defendant, the Brunswick & Western Railway Company, had once run and operated a railroad which ran through Worth county, but had in July, 1901, transferred its property and franchises to another company, and had since that time done no active business in the county. The present suit was filed in September, 1902, and the injuries set out in the petition were alleged to have been inflicted in April, 1902. The sheriff served the suit by leaving a copy with the agent in the railroad office at the depot in Sylvester, Ga. The evidence showed that this agent had been employed by the defendant while it operated the railroad, and prior to July, 1901, but had not been in its employment since that time; being at the time of the service employed by the company to which the defendant had transferred its property and franchises. It also appeared that the office at the depot above mentioned was not at the time of the service the office of the defendant, but of the other company. This evidence makes it very clear that there was no service upon the defendant or its agent. Counsel for the plaintiff relied, however, upon the act of December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, pp. 54, 55, § 1). This act provides that a railroad company which leases its property or line of railroad to another person shall have the "contract of lease or other contract of like nature, evidencing the change of control and possession," recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court in each county through which the line of road may run. It then provides that "any such railroad refusing or failing so to do, will authorize any person having a right of action against said railroad, or the lessee or lessees thereof, * * * to file and prosecute said action against said railroad company in all respects as if the same were the proper party defendant, and any plea or other defense attempting to shift liability to such lessee or lessees or denying control or possession of such property or line of road shall not avail to protect any such railroad against liability that falls or refuses to record as provided." It is at least doubtful if this act is applicable to the defendant in the present case, for the act deals with railroad companies which have leased their lines, while the defendant appears to have transferred to another all of its property and franchises. Conceding, however, that the act would apply in such a case, the judgment of the court below was still correct. The act does not provide that a railroad company sued under its provisions need not be served, nor does it prescribe that service on the lessee shall amount to service on the lessor. It does not deal at all with the question of service, but simply fixes liability. If, under this act, the plaintiff may recover against the defendant, it is still true, under the general law, which is not changed by this act, that the defendant must be served. Even if the defendant was properly sued, it was not served. There was no service upon it or its agents, and the traverse of the sheriff's return of service was properly sustained.

3. Complaint was made of the admission of the defendant's evidence as to the transfer of its property and franchises, and as to the control of the office and the employment of the agent with whom the copy of the suit was left. Objection was made to this evidence on the ground that, under the act above quoted, the defendant was estopped to show nonliability or to shift the liability to the lessee. From what has been said just above, it will be seen that this objection was properly overruled. This evidence was not introduced to show that the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff, but for the purpose of showing that there had been no service upon it. For this purpose it was clearly admissible.

COOPER v. NISBET.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—FILING—EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL.

1. It is essential to the legal filing of a bill of exceptions, or other paper which the law provides may be filed in the office of the clerk of a court, that the intention to place the paper on file be in some intelligible manner communicated to the clerk or his deputy by the party desiring to have the paper filed.

2. Where a witness (the deputy clerk of a court) testifies that it his custom to make a pencil memorandum on a certain class of papers filed with him, and that a paper of that class involved in the suit had no such memorandum on it at a certain time, it is not competent to rebut such testimony by proof that a paper of a different class in the same suit had no memorandum on it; there being no evidence that such latter paper had ever been filed.

3. The failure to give instructions to the jury not demanded by the evidence will, in the absence of a written request to so charge, in no event be cause for a new trial. Especially is this true where the principle of law invoked by the complaining party is in fact charged substantially by the trial judge.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

CANDLER, J. This was a petition for mandamus, addressed to the judge of the superior courts of the Macon circuit. The petition alleged that on June 13, 1903, in a case pending in Bibb superior court in which the petitioner was plaintiff, the judge of that court signed a writ of error sued out by the petitioner, returning it to his counsel on June 15th, on which day service of the bill of exceptions was acknowledged by counsel for the opposite party; that, immediately after obtaining the acknowledgment of service of the bill of exceptions, counsel for petitioner "carried said bill of exceptions * * * to the office of the clerk of the superior court of said county, and in person delivered said bill of exceptions to B. J. Holt, the deputy clerk, and thereby lodged said bill of exceptions in the office of the said clerk for filing and transmission to the Supreme Court; that on August 4, 1903, the clerk certified and transmitted the bill of exceptions and a transcript of the record in the case to the Supreme Court, but failed and neglected to mark said bill of exceptions as of file in his office on June 15, 1903"; that petitioner applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to require the clerk to mark the bill of exceptions "Filed," and that that court passed an order directing the bill of exceptions to be retransmitted to Bibb county in order that appropriate proceedings might be had in the superior court of that county to determine the true date of such filing. The prayer of the petition was that the clerk be commanded to show cause why he should not be required nunc pro tunc to mark the bill of exceptions as of file June 15, 1903. The respondent answered, denying that the bill of exceptions had been lodged for filing in his office on June 15, 1903, and averring that his failure to mark it as of file on that date was due not to negligence, but to his refusal to do so. On this disputed issue of fact the case was submitted to a jury, who found for the respondent. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and to the overruling of his motion he excepted.

As to the material issues the evidence introduced at the hearing was directly conflicting. One of the attorneys for the plaintiff testified positively that on June 15, 1903, after the bill of exceptions had been certified by the trial judge, and service thereof had been acknowledged by opposing counsel, he took it to the office of the clerk of the superior court; that the clerk was not in, but his deputy, Holt, was; that witness delivered the bill of exceptions to Holt, calling his attention to it, and remarking: "Mr. Holt, here is another William" (meaning a bill of exceptions); that Holt took it and opened it; and that, as witness was in a hurry, he left the office immediately. This testimony was emphatically contradicted by Holt, who testified that the attorney did not leave the bill of exceptions with him on the date mentioned, and that it was found for the first time in the files of the office on July 29, 1903. How or when it came into the files, no one connected with the office seemed able to explain.

The motion for a new trial contains numerous grounds, but several of them complain of charges or refusals to charge which relate to the same point. We shall therefore not deal with each ground of the motion separately, but rather with the different questions raised by the various grounds.

1. Error is assigned upon the charge of the court to the effect that, to constitute a legal filing, it is necessary that the paper be tendered to the clerk or his deputy "with directions that the same be filed in the case." As explanatory of this instruction, the judge further charged: "To illustrate what I mean, an attorney cannot put a paper among a lot of papers, and carry the whole bundle to the clerk's office and hand them to the clerk, and expect the clerk to seek out from that bundle papers that have not been filed, and enter the fact that they were filed upon them. That does not constitute, in law, a legal filing." Complaint is also made of the refusal of the court to charge, as requested, that "it is not necessary that the party who tenders to the clerk for filing a paper should in terms request the clerk to file such paper. It is sufficient for a party to tender the paper to the clerk and call his attention to what it is, and it is then his duty to file it, if it is a paper such as he is required to file in office." We do not construe the language of the court below, to the effect that, to constitute a legal filing, a paper must be tendered to the clerk or his deputy with directions that it be filed, to mean that, in filing a paper, one must use express words of command or instruction, but, rather, that the clerk must in some way be acquainted with the intention of the party to file the paper. So construing it, we hold that the charge is free from error. It is not enough that the clerk know the character of the paper tendered to him. There should, in simple justice to him, be something to put him on notice that the exercise of his official duties is required. And in a broad sense, any words or conduct which will bring home to him notice of an intention to file may be termed a direction that the paper be filed. To hold that filing is a purely physical act, which may be accomplished without intention, or the communication of that intention, would, in our opinion, be almost an absurdity, and would open up possibilities for many grotesque errors and numerous hardships to both litigants and clerks. The true rule, we think, is that stated by the Illinois court in the case of Hamilton v. Beardslee, 51 Ill. 478, that, to constitute a legal filing, the paper must pass into the custody of the clerk, "and that the object be communicated to him in some manner capable of being understood." See, also, Pfirman v. Henkel, 1 Ill. App. 145; Boyd v. Desmond, 79 Cal. 250, 21 Pac. 755; Phillips v. Beene, 38 Ala. 248. And in the case of Jolley v. Rutherford, 112 Ga. 342, 37 S. E. 358, it was held that where papers were left on the clerk's desk, and his attention was not called to the fact that they were so left or that there was any intention to file them, there was no legal filing. That, it is true, is not this case; but the following language of Mr. Presiding Justice Lumpkin (page 344, 112 Ga., page 359, 37 S. E.) bears closely upon the question now under discussion: "It is scarcely reasonable to expect a clerk to duly file papers left upon his desk or elsewhere in his office, when his attention is not in some way directed to the fact that the person depositing them in or upon his office furniture wishes him to assume charge thereof and file the same." As laying down a different rule from the one now announced, the cases of Floyd v. Chess-Carley Co., 76 Ga. 752, and McDaniel v. Columbus Fertilizer Co., 109 Ga. 284, 34 S. E. 598, are cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error. A careful reading of these cases, however, will show that they do not support this contention, and that they are in entire harmony with what is here laid down. In both of these cases the papers were placed in the custody of the clerk with the expressed intention of filing them, and in neither was there any question raised as to the communication to the clerk of the parties' intention to file the papers. The Floyd Case simply holds that, where affidavits to foreclose laborers' liens were in fact filed in the office of the clerk, the failure of the clerk to mark them "Filed" did not authorize the dismissal of the executions issued on them. It is, of course, quite plain that, where a party has in reality filed a paper, his rights will not be prejudiced by the failure of the clerk to perform the purely clerical duty to mark it "Filed"; but this has no bearing on the question of what constitutes a legal filing. In the McDaniel Case, the second headnote reads as follows: "Causing a bill of exceptions to be actually placed in the hands of the clerk of a trial court within the time prescribed by law for filing the same in his office is all that is, in this respect, required of a plaintiff in error or his counsel." It appeared in that case that the clerk received the bill of exceptions by mail, that he was at the time sick in bed, and that when he returned to his office, several days later, he marked the bill of exceptions "Filed" as of the latter day. The question involved was not whether there had been a legal filing, but whether the clerk should have marked the paper "Filed" as of the date that it reached him, or the date when he returned to his office. It will be seen at a glance that this ruling does not affect the question whether, to constitute a legal filing, it is necessary that the party tendering the paper to the clerk shall call the attention of the latter to his intention to file.

2. Holt testified that it was his invariable custom, when a bill of exceptions was filed with him, to make a pencil memorandum on it and hand it to the clerk, and that there was no such memorandum on the bill of exceptions involved in this case when it was found in the files. For the purpose of rebutting or impeaching this testimony, the plaintiff offered in evidence a motion to dismiss the certiorari made when the case was pending in the superior court, together with the order of the court overruling the motion; it appearing that there was no pencil memorandum or entry of filing on this paper. The rejection of this evidence is assigned as error in the motion for a new trial. This complaint is obviously without merit. Even admitting that it had been filed in the clerk's office, it was not a bill of exceptions, and had no probative effect whatever on the witness' testimony as to what his custom was with reference to bills of exceptions. Regardless of this, however, there was not a particle of evidence that the motion to dismiss had ever been filed in the clerk's office; but, to the contrary, there was positive evidence that it had not been filed. The only basis for its introduction was that it was taken from a bundle of papers containing the record in the case which had been handed by the clerk to one of the attorneys. It is not, of course, competent to prove the filing of a paper by introducing another paper in the same case which bears a physical similarity to it, but which, as to filing, is not shown to be on any different footing from the paper the filing of which is sought to be proven.

3. Error is also assigned on the failure of the court to charge that the finding of the bill of exceptions in the filing case in the clerk's office, with other papers in the case to which it related, would show prima facie that it had been filed with the clerk, and would put the burden on him of showing that it had not been filed, but came into the filing case in some other way than by having been filed. It does not appear that any written request to charge on this subject was made on the trial. The motion also complains of the charge which the court actually gave on this subject, which was as follows: "If you believe the fact to be true that the bill of exceptions introduced in evidence in this case was found in the filing case with the other papers in the case, you may take, if you see proper to do so, that evidence, together with the other testimony in the case, for the purpose of determining the true question in the case at issue between these parties—as to whether or not, in point of fact, Mr. Jones tendered that bill of exceptions to Mr. Holt to file it." We see nothing in this charge of which the plaintiff can justly complain; nor, indeed, is there an appreciable variance between it and the instruction which it is contended the court should have given, but failed to give. The charge as given, we think, states more correctly the principles of law and the rule of evidence applicable to the case than that which the plaintiff insists should have been given without request.

The foregoing disposes of every material issue raised by the record. Other grounds of the motion complain of the failure of the court to give certain instructions alleged to have been pertinent to the case, but, as there was no written request by counsel to give these instructions, and as they were not demanded in the absence of such a request, the failure to give them will not be held ground for a new trial. The judge's charge, taken as a whole, was eminently fair, and correctly stated the principles of law applicable to the case, and whatever inaccuracies it may have contained were not of sufficient materiality to require the grant of a new trial. As before pointed out, the evidence was sharply conflicting on the vital points at issue. The jury resolved this conflict in favor of the defendant, the trial judge was satisfied with their finding, and this court will not interfere with his order overruling the motion for a new trial.

CULBERSON v. STATE.

WEAPONS—CARRYING TO HOUSE OF WORSHIP.

1. An accusation which charged the accused with carrying a pistol about his person to a place of public worship, the same being a designated church, where a congregation was then assembled for public worship, was not supported by proof that he came into possession of the weapon at a spring from which the congregation was using water, and which was so near the church as to be, in legal contemplation, at the church. "Coming into possession of a pistol at a place of public worship is not carrying a pistol to a place of public worship."

Error from City Court of Hamilton; J. B. Burnside, Judge.

Anderson Culberson was convicted of carrying a pistol to a church, and brings error. Reversed.

B. H. Walton, for plaintiff in error. R. A. Russell, Sol., for the State.

FISH, P. J. An accusation was preferred against Anderson Culberson in the city court of Hamilton, charging that on July 19, 1908, in Harris county, he carried "about his person a pistol to a place of public worship; the same being Jehovah Colored Baptist Church, Whitesville, Ga., where a congregation was then assembled for the purpose of public worship." Upon the trial the evidence for the state was to the effect that, on the day named, a congregation was assembled at such church for public worship; that there was a public spring about 200 yards from the church, but not on the church ground, where it was customary for the congregations which assembled at this church to get water, there being no other source of water supply; that during the noon recess, when many of the congregation were going to and fro between the church and the spring, the accused was seen with a pistol in his hand, going from the direction of the spring towards the church, and that he so carried it to within 15 or 20 steps of the church; that when asked, at the time, by several of the witnesses, what he was doing with the pistol, he replied that he had taken it from a man by the name of Hodo at the spring, and, at the request of one of the witnesses, he immediately turned it over to him. The accused introduced no testimony, but made a statement in which he said that he took the pistol from Hodo at the spring because Hodo seemed to want to shoot some one with it, and that he (the accused) carried it in his hand towards the church till Hood, one of the state's witnesses, asked him for it, when he delivered it to him. The jury found the accused guilty. He moved for a new trial upon both general and special grounds. His motion was overruled, and he excepted.

Pen. Code 1895, § 342, makes it a misdemeanor for any one, except certain designated officers of the law, to carry about his person a pistol, or any kind of deadly weapon, to any place of public worship, or any other public gathering, in this state, except militia muster grounds. The declaration of the accused, to the effect that he took the pistol from another person at the spring, made while he was in the act of carrying the weapon, was a part of the res gestæ of the transaction, and, moreover, was put in evidence by the state. There was nothing to show that it was not true. The question, therefore, is whether the accused, having become possessed of the pistol at the spring, which was 200 yards from the church, and having carried it to within 15 or 20 steps of the church, was guilty of the offense charged. In Modesette v. State, 115 Ga. 582, 41 S. E. 992, it was held that "one who goes to a public gathering, having no pistol upon his person at the time he arrives at the place where the gathering is to be, and, after having reached there and mingled with the other persons assembled, becomes possessed, innocently or designedly, lawfully or unlawfully, of a pistol, is not guilty of any offense under this section [Pen. Code 1895, § 342], although after having become possessed of the pistol he may retain possession thereof, and move about from place to place, and use the pistol for purposes of offense or defense. Coming into possession of a pistol while at a public gathering is not carrying a pistol to a public gathering." In Minter v. State, 104 Ga. 743, 30 S. E. 989, it was held: "A charge in an indictment that the accused disturbed a congregation of persons lawfully assembled for divine service 'at' a named church is sustained by proof that he disturbed a congregation so assembled for such purpose at a bush arbor near such church; both places being within the jurisdiction of the court." There it appeared that the bush arbor was 175 or 200 yards from the church. So, in McCrigh v. State, 110 Ga. 261, 34 S. E. 368, it was held: "An indictment which charged the accused with disturbing an assemblage of a public school at a named schoolhouse was supported by evidence showing that, though the assemblage of the school which was disturbed was not in the school building, it was at a bush arbor near thereto." The record in that case shows that the arbor was from 75 to 100 yards from the schoolhouse. According to the rulings made in these last two cases, we think that the spring which was so near the church, and from which the congregations which there assembled were in the habit of procuring water, should be held, in contemplation of the statute alleged to have been violated, to be at the place of public worship. Although the services in the church building had been temporarily suspended for the purposes of rest and refreshment, the people who had assembled at the place of public worship, and who at the time of the alleged violation of the statute by the accused were going to and fro between the church and the spring for the purpose of getting drinking water, were still a part of the "public gathering" which had assembled for public worship; and it is the "public gathering," and not the precise spot where the services or proceedings for which it has assembled may be held, which the law intends to protect. The law throws its protection around the "public gathering," whether the same be assembled at a court of justice, an election precinct, or ground, a place of public worship, "or any other [place] of public gathering in this state." And this protection continues until the public gathering has finally dispersed. A mere temporary cessation of the services or exercises at a country church or schoolhouse, during which the people composing the public gathering which has assembled there scatter about the grounds for the purpose of eating their lunches, getting drinking water, caring for their horses, etc., does not so terminate the public gathering as to render it not unlawful for a person to carry a deadly weapon about his person to the place or grounds where the gathering has assembled. Hence one who, during such an intermission of the services or exercises, carries a pistol about his person to a point so near the precise spot where the services or exercises are held as that he will come in contact with a considerable portion of the people who constitute such public gathering, during the time that the assemblage for the purpose which has brought the people together may be said to still exist, violates this section of the Penal Code. It is he who thus brings the weapon to the public gathering, and not one who may there become possessed of it, who violates this statute. When the accused took the pistol from another at the spring, he, in effect, came into possession of it after it had been carried to the place of public worship; and, under the case of Modesette v. State, supra, he was not guilty of the offense charged, and the court erred in not granting a new trial on the general grounds of the motion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

THOMAS v. H. C. BAGLEY & CO.

NOTE.—SEPARATE AGREEMENT—EVIDENCE—DEFOULATIONS OF AGENTS.

1. In an action on an unconditional promissory note, a separate agreement signed by special agents of the holder in their individual capacity, and which does not purport to bind the holder, by the terms of which it is stipulated that if, at the maturity of the note, the maker is unable to pay it, he may surrender the life insurance policy for the premium of which it was given, and cancel the note, is not admissible in evidence to bind the holder.

2. Nor, in such a case, is it competent to prove, as a part of the res gestae of the transaction, declarations of the special agents that their representations were made by authority of their principal; these representations having been reduced to writing, and the writing showing on its face that it bound only the agents in their individual capacity.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by W. B. Thomas against H. C. Bagley, trading under the name of H. C. Bagley & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Felder & Rountree, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Dent and Mark J. McCord, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. This was a suit on a promissory note for $241.50, brought against W. B. Thomas, as maker, by H. C. Bagley, trading under the name of H. C. Bagley & Co., the payee. The defendant admitted the execution of the note and his refusal to pay it, and denied his indebtedness thereon. He averred that the note was given for the first premium on a policy of life insurance issued to him by the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company; that the insurance was solicited by two agents of the plaintiff, Laird and Nelms, who were desirous of having him take a policy in their company, in order that certain of his employes might be influenced to take policies also; and that at the time they took his application they entered into a written agreement with him as follows: "Atlanta, Ga., January 1st, 1902. This agreement witnesseth that we agree with W. B. Thomas that if his note, given this day for $241.50, premium on policy No. 200, 357, in the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, due at six months, is not paid, or his condition is such that he cannot pay same, he may surrender said policy and cancel said note. L. J. Laird, T. H. Nelms." The answer further set up that when the note matured the defendant offered to surrender the policy to the plaintiff, and demanded, in pursuance of the agreement already set out, that the policy be accepted and his note canceled. This demand was refused, and, because of the facts set out, he denied indebtedness. On the trial (the execution of the note, as before stated, having been admitted, and the defendant having assumed the burden of proof) the only evidence introduced was that of the defendant, which was substantially in accord with the averments of his plea. The court, on motion, directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. The assignment of error mainly relied on in this court is based on the refusal of the court to admit in evidence the agreement made by Laird and Nelms with the defendant, which was set out in the plea, and to which we have already referred. It appears that the first time the existence of this agreement came to the knowledge of the plaintiff was after the maturity of the note sued on, and after the policy of insurance for the premium of which it was given had been in force for six months. It also appears that Thomas, the defendant, was aware that Laird and Nelms were special agents, appointed for the sole purpose of soliciting insurance and collecting the premiums thereon by taking either notes or money. No principle of law is better established than that persons dealing with an agent appointed for a particular purpose are bound to inquire as to the extent of his authority. The application for insurance, and the policy issued thereon, contained the terms of the contract between the defendant and the company for which the plaintiff was general agent. The sayings of neither of them were admissible to change that contract. The note taken by Laird and Nelms, and payable to the plaintiff, expressed the contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, by the terms of which time was given to the defendant for the payment of the first annual premium. The agreement sought to be introduced in evidence, although made contemporaneously with the note, was clearly an individual undertaking on the part of Laird and Nelms, neither of whom was a party to the note sued on. It did not purport to bind the plaintiff in any way, and it was wholly irrelevant on the trial of this case.

2. Nor was it material to inquire how far Bagley, as principal, was bound by the representations of Laird and Nelms, his special agents, because the agreement made by them is clear and unequivocal, and in no way involves the plaintiff. It does not even purport to have been made by Laird and Nelms as agents of Bagley, but was clearly their own act, done in their individual capacity. If the defendant, who appears to have had the benefit of the life insurance for the full period represented by the premium for which the note was given, has been damaged in any way, his remedy would seem to be against Laird and Nelms for a breach of their contract. Civ. Code 1805, § 3041. The defendant sought to prove by declarations of Laird and Nelms made prior to the delivery of the policy and the signing of the application, the note, and their private agreement, that in making that agreement they were acting within the scope of their authority as agents of Bagley. There are several good reasons why this evidence was inadmissible. It is well settled that an agency cannot be established by proof of declarations of the alleged agent. In this case the declaration as finally made was in writing, and this writing, as has been seen, did not purport to be an agreement in any but their individual capacity. This case is clearly distinguishable from that of Williamson v. Tyson, 105 Ala. 644, 17 South. 336, where it was held that declarations of a party assuming to act as agent for another are admissible as res gestæ to establish the agency where the principal is suing on the contract, and thereby ratifying the methods used by the party in securing it. Here all the representations made were reduced to writing, and this writing showed on its face that the agreement in question was the individual act of the parties making it. In order to constitute a ratification, it is necessary that the party should have knowledge of the act that he is ratifying, and in this case it appears that the first intimation the plaintiff had of the separate agreement made by Laird and Nelms was when it was exhibited to the agent who presented the note for collection. If Bagley had accepted the note with knowledge of this separate agreement, though not expressly countenancing it, his conduct might have constituted such a ratification of the means used by Laird and Nelms to secure the note as to prevent him from recovering on it. That, however, is not this case. There is likewise nothing in conflict with this ruling in the case of Andrews v. Robertson (Wis.) 87 N. W. 190, 54 L. R. A. 673, 87 Am. St. Rep. 870, where it was held that the holder of a promissory note, taken for him of the maker by an agent upon a condition not disclosed to such holder, and outside the scope of the agent's authority, cannot repudiate the condition and insist upon holding and enforcing the note, but that he is bound, if he does not intend to abide by the condition, to restore or offer to restore the note within a reasonable time after discovering the facts. It can be seen at a glance, without giving the facts upon which the ruling was based, that the holder of the note had full knowledge of the facts and the circumstances under which his agent obtained the note, and this clearly distinguishes it from the case at bar. We think it is clear that Thomas could not testify to declarations made by Laird and Nelms which contradicted the written agreement made by them, even though it should be held that their declarations were admissible to bind the plaintiffs, as having been made contemporaneously with the execution of the note, and as part of the res gestæ of the transaction involved. See Abel v. Jarratt, 100 Ga. 732, 28 S. E. 453; Holland v. Van Bell, 89 Ga. 223, 15 S. E. 302; Harris Co. v. Elliott Co., 110 Ga. 302, 34 S. E. 1003.

WOOD et al. v. CALLAWAY.

SUMMONS—RETURN—PERSONAL SERVICE—TRAVERSE.

1. A return of service of a justice court summons which alleges that the constable served the defendant "by serving him at his most notorious place of abode, * * * personally, by calling at the door" of his residence and handing the summons to a man who answered to the name of the defendant, is a return of personal service.

2. A finding by a jury in favor of a traverse to such a return is demanded, when the evidence shows that no personal service was had upon the defendant, even though it may also appear from the evidence that service was perfected by leaving a copy of the summons at his usual and most notorious place of abode.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by I. M. Wood and others against R. C. Callaway. Judgment for defendant. From an order of the superior court overruling a certiorari, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

W. J. Speairs, for plaintiffs in error. Bishop & Ripley, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. A justice court summons was sued out against Callaway, and the constable returned the summons, with an entry thereon that he had served a copy thereof upon the defendant personally. The defendant not having appeared, judgment was entered against him. During the pendency of a garnishment which had been issued on the judgment, the defendant made an affidavit traversing the return of service. When the issue made by the traverse came on for a hearing before a jury in the justice's court on appeal, the constable amended his return of service as follows: "I served R. C. Callaway by serving him at his most notorious place of abode, to wit, at No. 314 Luckie street, Atlanta, Georgia, on October 18, 1898, personally, by calling at the door; and a man came to the door and answered to the name of R. C. Callaway, and I handed him the copy of the suit." On the trial the undisputed evidence showed that the defendant was not in Atlanta on the day when the service was purported to have been made, and also that the constable did leave a copy of the summons at the defendant's residence, by handing the same to a person who came to the door. The jury found in favor of the traverse, and the judge of the superior court overruled a certiorari sued out by the plaintiff in the suit and the constable jointly. They excepted.

Service of a justice court summons may be made by handing the defendant a copy of the same in person, "or by leaving such copy at his usual and most notorious place of abode." Civ. Code 1895, § 4118. If, therefore, the amended return of the constable is to be construed as a return of personal service, then the undisputed evidence showed that no such service was made, and the traverse was properly sustained. On the other hand, if such amended return is to be construed as a return of service by leaving a copy at the usual and most notorious place of abode of the defendant, then the uncontradicted evidence showed that such service was made, and the verdict of the jury in favor of the traverse cannot be sustained. We think it clear that the amended return was a return of personal service. The constable does not aver that he served the defendant by leaving a copy at his usual and most notorious place of abode, as the statute requires, but he alleges that he served the defendant "by serving him at his most notorious place of abode, * * * personally by calling at the door," etc. Evidently the constable intended by the amendment simply to amplify and explain his original return. He had construed his act in handing a copy of the summons to a man who answered to the name of the defendant to be personal service on the defendant; and he amended by simply setting forth what he actually did, and expressly averred this to be personal service. Inasmuch as the evidence showed that there had been no personal service on the defendant, the jury properly sustained the traverse, and the judge of the superior court properly overruled the certiorari. It is wholly immaterial that there may have been a good service upon the defendant by leaving a copy of the summons at his residence. In order for the court to obtain jurisdiction of a defendant, he must not only have been served in the manner pointed out by law, but there must be a legal return of such service. Callaway v. AUGUSTA SOUTHERN R. CO. v. CITY OF TENNILLE.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ACTION—CORPORATE NAME.

1. The act of December 15, 1900, incorporating the city of Tennille, in express terms declares that no suit shall be brought against that municipality save in its corporate name, to wit, "The City of Tennille." Acts 1900, p. 448, § 3.

2. It follows that a petition brought apparently with a view to seeking relief as against that municipal corporation, but in which process is prayed against the "Mayor and Council of the City of Tennille, a corporation," is not maintainable. *Boon v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. RAGSDALE, HARPER & WEATHERS.

CARRIERS—TRACING ACT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The tracing act of 1891 (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2317, 2318), properly construed, applies only to initial and connecting carriers doing business within this state, and, when so interpreted, is not such a discrimination against such carriers as to render the act unconstitutional on the ground that it denies to them the equal protection of the laws.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Ragsdale, Harper & Weathers against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, Sanders McDaniel, and J. D. Bradwell, for plaintiff in error. J. F. Golightly, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. This was an action under the tracing act of 1891 (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2317, 2318). The shipment originated outside of the state, and the notice to trace was served upon a connecting carrier within this state, which had undertaken to deliver the freight at the point of destination. The defendant, by demurrer to the petition, raised many, if not all, of the questions in reference to the act which were involved and decided in the case of Central of Georgia Railway Company v. Murphey, 116 Ga. 863, 43 S. E. 285, 60 L. R. A. 817. So far as any questions determined in that case are concerned, counsel for the defendant state in their brief that they do not desire to again press them upon the court. In fact, counsel insist upon the determination of but one question which the demurrer raises, conceding that the decision just referred to is controlling upon all the others. It is contended that the act should be construed to be applicable only to initial and connecting carriers who are engaged in the business of common carriers within the limits of this state, for the reason that the lawmaking power of this state has no authority to regulate or impose duties upon common carriers who operate entirely without the limits of the state. We think this is the proper construction of the act. See Philadelphia Ry. Co. v. Venable, 117 Ga. 142, 43 S. E. 407. It is argued that, if this be the proper construction of the act, the law imposes upon initial and connecting carriers doing business within this state duties and responsibilities which are not imposed upon other carriers connected with the same shipment who are engaged in business without the limits of this state, and that this is such a discrimination against the local carriers as to deprive them of that protection of the law which the nonresident carrier handling the same shipment receives, and that for this reason the act is violative of that portion of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which guaranties to all persons the equal protection of the laws. The law applies with equal force to every carrier engaged in business within the limits of this state which may be one of the links in a line of carriage either beginning in this state and terminating beyond its limits, or originating without this state and terminating within its limits. The state certainly has authority to make reasonable regulations controlling the conduct of those engaged in the business of a common carrier within its limits; and it was held in the Murphey Case that this act was reasonable in its terms, and was not such a regulation of interstate commerce as to be beyond the power of the General Assembly of this state. When this conclusion is reached, it seems to follow that the act does not deprive any carrier within its terms of the equal protection of the laws in such a way as to be subject to the objection that is urged against it at this time.

It was argued that, if the General Assembly had no power to impose the duty of tracing upon nonresident carriers, it had no right to impose upon resident carriers a penalty for a failure to obtain information from such nonresident carriers, when no means were furnished or could be furnished to the resident carrier for compelling the nonresident carrier to give the information necessary to enable the resident carrier to comply with the requirements of the act. This contention was made in the Murphey Case, and it was there said, in substance, that if a case should arise where the evidence showed that it was really impossible for the carrier upon whom the notice to trace was served to obtain the information required within the time prescribed by the act, it would then be decided whether this would constitute a defense to a suit under the act. So we say now that if, in a given case, it should appear that the resident carrier upon whom the notice to trace has been served has exercised due diligence in attempting to get the information, and that the failure to obtain it was not the result of its own fault or failure to use all of the means at its command to do so, a question might arise as to whether the defendant would be liable under the act. But no question of that character was involved in the Murphey Case, nor is it involved in the case now before us. The petition alleges that no reply whatever was made to the plaintiff's demand to trace. It might be that, if it was really impossible for the carrier to obtain the information, it could, with propriety, be held that it had not violated the provisions of the act, on the theory that it is not to be presumed that the lawmaking power intended to impose a penalty for a failure to do a thing which was impossible of performance. But we will not now decide whether this is a proper construction of the act, or whether it amounts to a legislative determination that the information can be obtained, and that the carrier will not be heard to say that it cannot.

PEARSON v. NEWTON COUNTY.

COUNTIES—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS.

1. In order for the bringing of a suit against a county to constitute a presentation of the claim to the county officials, within the meaning of Pol. Code 1895, § 362, the petition must not only be filed, but served, within 12 months after the claim accrues. In Dement v. De Kalb County, 25 S. E. 882, 97 Ga. 733, the petition was filed and served within the 12 months.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by S. M. Pearson against Newton County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

L. L. Middlebrooks and James F. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. J. M. Pace and G. H. Conwell, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. A petition in a suit for personal injuries against the county of Newton was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court on August 2, 1902, and was duly served on August 6, 1902. The injuries for which the suit was brought occurred on August 3, 1901. At the September term, 1902, the case, on motion, was dismissed, on the ground that the claim was not presented to the county commissioners of the county within 12 months after it accrued; the order of dismissal reciting that plaintiff's counsel admitted that the claim had not been so presented. The granting of the order of dismissal is assigned as error.

"All claims against counties must be presented within twelve months after they accrue or become payable, or the same are barred, unless held by minors or other persons laboring under disabilities, who are allowed twelve months after the removal of such disability." Pol. Code 1895, § 362. It is most probably true that when this statute was enacted the General Assembly had in mind the presentation of claims otherwise than by a suit. But in Dement v. De Kalb County, 97 Ga. 733, 25 S. E. 382, it was held that "the bringing of the suit within the time limited was a sufficient presentation of the claim, within the meaning of" this statute. In the opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Lumpkin uses this language: "The main object of the law was doubtless to provide that the county officials should have timely notice of all demands against the county, in order that they might intelligently and advisedly take proper action concerning the same. The giving of such notice is as effectually accomplished by the filing of a declaration against the county, and having the same duly served, as could be done by handing to the ordinary or board of commissioners a written statement setting forth the nature of the claim. Indeed, it is more than likely that the information contained in a declaration would be fuller and more satisfactory than in a less formal document tendered by the claimant in person." It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that this case is controlling in his favor, while counsel for the county ask that the decision be reviewed and overruled. An examination of the facts of the case referred to, as they appear in the original record, will show that the petition was not only filed, but served, within 12 months after the cause of action accrued, whereas in the present case service was not had until after the expiration of 12 months. It is argued, however, that this does not constitute any valid distinction between the cases, because the filing of the petition is the commencement of the suit, and stops the running of the statute of limitations. This principle has no application to the present case. The sole question to be determined here is, what constitutes a sufficient presentation of a claim, within the meaning of the statute above quoted? Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in the above-quoted language from the De Kalb County Case, says that the main object of the statute was to provide that the county officials should have timely notice of all demands against the county, and that the giving of such notice is as effectually accomplished by the filing of a petition, and having the same duly served, as by a written statement setting forth the nature of the claim. Manifestly the mere filing of the petition does not give the county officials any notice of the claim, and certainly cannot constitute a presentation of the claim, unless followed by service of a copy of the petition. As stated above, the question is not what effect the filing of the ordinary petition has with reference to the statute of limitations, but whether a claim can be said to be presented to the county officials within 12 months after the claim accrued, when nothing more is done than to file suit, and the county officials have had no notice of the claim, either by service of the suit or otherwise. When the question is thus stated, there certainly cannot be any difficulty in deciding it adversely to the contentions of the plaintiff in error. The decision in 97 Ga., 25 S. E., is not only not controlling in his favor, but the language in the opinion contains a very clear intimation that service of the petition would be necessary to constitute the bringing of a suit a presentation of the claim, within the meaning of the statute.

ABATEMENT—DEATH OF PARTIES—TRIAL DE NOVO—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

1. As a general rule, the death of a party pending the trial causes a mistrial, and no further proceedings can be had in the cause until parties have been made, when the case must be tried de novo. This rule applies to a case pending before an auditor.

2. When the competency of a witness depends on the determination of a question of fact, the decision of the judge will not generally be disturbed, if there is any evidence to authorize his finding.

Error from Superior Court, Clayton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Carroll against one Barber. On his death his personal representatives, Sally Barber and others, were made parties. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Anderson & Thomas, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Berner and W. L. Waterson, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Carroll sued Barber, and the case was referred to an auditor. Pending the case, Barber died, and his legal representatives were made parties in his stead. The auditor made a report, to which the plaintiff filed exceptions both of law and fact. All the exceptions of fact were withdrawn, as well as all of the exceptions of law, except four. The court overruled these four exceptions, and the plaintiff brings the case here in a bill of exceptions assigning error upon this ruling.

1. During the lifetime of Barber the auditor proceeded to hear the case, and, after having heard several witnesses for the plaintiff, including the plaintiff, the hearing was adjourned until a future day. Before this day arrived, Barber died, and nothing further was done by the auditor until the defendant's legal representatives were made parties to the case by an order of the judge of the superior court. After parties were thus made, the auditor proceeded to hear the case, and a motion was made to exclude so much of the testimony of the plaintiff which had been delivered at the former hearing as related to transactions or communications between her and Barber, the deceased. The auditor sustained this motion, and this ruling was made the subject of one of the exceptions of law. In the argument here, there was a disagreement between counsel as to whether the testimony of the plaintiff was completed at the former hearing, or whether the adjournment was had with a reservation of the right of the defendant to further cross-examine the plaintiff. For the purposes of this decision, we will treat the matter as if the contention of the plaintiff in error was correct; that is, that, at the time the auditor adjourned the hearing, the examination of the plaintiff in her own behalf had been completed. Such being the case, should the auditor, at a subsequent hearing, after the defendant had died, and his legal representatives had been made parties in his stead, have excluded this testimony, so far as it related to transactions or communications between the plaintiff and the deceased? While the case is dealt with upon the assumption that the testimony of the plaintiff in her own behalf had been completed, it must be kept distinctly in mind that the testimony in the case was not completed, and that the defendant had not been heard in his own behalf, at the time the adjournment took place. The general rule seems to be that if, pending a reference, one of the parties dies, the effect upon the proceeding is the same as if the trial had been in progress before the court making the order of reference. 17 Enc. P. & P. 1042. If the case had been on trial before a jury in the superior court, and the plaintiff had testified in her own behalf, had been fully cross-examined, and had retired from the stand, and, pending a recess of the court, without reference to the time of the recess—whether one hour, one day, or longer—the defendant had died, the effect upon the proceeding would have been that a mistrial would have been declared; and, after parties had been made, the case would have been for trial de novo. The result would be similar in the event the trial was proceeding before the judge without the intervention of a jury. We see no reason why the death of the defendant would not have a similar effect upon the case when it was pending before the auditor. The auditor would be powerless to proceed until parties were made by an order of the court in which the case originated. While the authority of auditors has been very much enlarged by legislation in recent years, there is, so far as we know, no law authorizing an auditor to make parties where one of the parties dies pending the reference. Even if the death of a party does not revoke the order of appointment, the auditor has no authority to proceed with the case until parties have been made in the manner above referred to. When the auditor proceeds with the hearing after the making of parties, the case is to be dealt with just as if a new order of reference had been made. If testimony has been heard at a former hearing, that testimony is not to be considered, unless by consent of the parties as they exist at the time of the new hearing; and objections to the competency of witnesses may be made upon grounds which exist at that time, without regard to whether they existed at the time of the former hearing. When the hearing was had before the auditor after parties had been made in the place of the defendant, the plaintiff was an incompetent witness as to transactions or communications between her and the deceased, and, by the very terms of the statute, her evidence was to be excluded. Civ. Code 1895, § 5269 (1). The judgment of the auditor was therefore right, and it is immaterial upon what ground he based his ruling, or upon what ground the judge overruled the exception to this ruling.

2. The three remaining exceptions relate to the exclusion of testimony of the plaintiff's husband. The auditor held that, under the evidence, the plaintiff's husband was her agent, and that he was incompetent to testify to any transactions or communications between himself and the deceased. When the competency of a witness depends upon the determination of a question of fact, the judge whose duty it is to pass upon the question of competency determines this question from the evidence before him, and his decision on such question is to be treated as his decision on other questions of fact would be, and is not generally to be interfered with by a reviewing court, if there is any evidence to support his conclusion on the question of competency. See, in this connection, Dowdy v. Watson, 115 Ga. 42, 41 S. E. 286. In reference to the fourth exception of fact, which relates to a conversation between the plaintiff's husband and the deceased concerning certain cotton which the former had delivered to the latter, there appears to have been in the evidence objected to, without reference to other portions of the evidence, enough for the auditor to find that, so far as the delivery of the cotton was concerned, the plaintiff's husband was acting on her behalf, and was her agent for this purpose. What was the motive of the wife in sending the cotton, is another question. Whether she was influenced by interest in her husband's welfare, or by a previous agreement that had been made between him and the deceased, in which he had promised to carry her cotton to the deceased, to be applied to his debt, is immaterial. The husband was carrying the wife's cotton to his creditor with the authority and under the direction of the wife, and whether this was in pursuance of a lawful or unlawful agreement, so far as the delivery of the cotton was concerned, the husband was the wife's agent; and what was said by either party pending the delivery constituted communications between the deceased and the agent of the living party, and was therefore properly excluded under the very terms of the evidence act. Civ. Code 1895, § 5269 (5). The objection was not under paragraph 4 of the section just cited, which provides that a person not a party, when interested in the result of the suit, is incompetent under certain circumstances; and therefore the decisions in Hidell v. Dwinell, 89 Ga. 532, 16 S. E. 79 (2), and Crawford v. Parker, 96 Ga. 156, 23 S. E. 196 (2), are not in point. While it does not distinctly appear in the evidence set forth in the second and third exceptions that the plaintiff's husband was acting as her agent at the time of the communications therein referred to, we do not think the exclusion of this testimony was erroneous, for the reason that it simply related to an agreement between the husband and the deceased that the wife's cotton should be used in payment of the husband's debt. But no cotton was delivered at the time of these communications, and what was then said would have little or no material bearing on the question as to whether cotton which was subsequently delivered was or was not the wife's cotton, or, if it was, whether the deceased knew the fact. The husband might have agreed to deliver the wife's cotton, and still the cotton actually delivered have been his own. We do not think there was any error in excluding any of the evidence objected to.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO. v. MAYOR, ETC., OF TOWN OF UNION POINT.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—OPENING STREET—RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—COMPENSATION—EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. Where, in the charter of a town, the Legislature has granted to the municipal corporation authority "to require any railroad running through said town to make such crossings as may be needed for public conveniences," this does not confer upon the municipal authorities power to open a new street across the right of way and tracks of a railroad company whose railroad runs through such town, against the consent of the company, and without making compensation for the taking or damaging of its property for such purpose. Nor does the grant of such authority confer upon the municipality the right to exercise the power of eminent domain for this purpose.

2. The right to exercise the power of eminent domain for the purpose of laying out and opening a new street cannot be implied from the grant, in a municipal charter, of authority, "to establish and lay out new streets as public necessity requires."

3. The laying out and opening of a public street across the right of way and track of a railroad company without the consent of the company is a taking or damaging of private property for a public purpose, which requires the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company against the mayor and council of Union Point. From the judgment both parties bring error. Reversed on first bill of exceptions, and writ of error dismissed.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and J. B. Park, for plaintiff. Samuel H. Sibley, for defendant.

FISH, P. J. The town of Union Point undertook to open a street at a designated point within the incorporate limits of the municipality across the tracks and right of way of the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, without instituting any condemnation proceeding for such purpose, and without the consent of the railroad company. The railroad company brought a petition to perpetually enjoin the town "from taking or undertaking to take the land of petitioner" for this purpose, alleging that the municipality had no authority to do so, and that, if certain provisions of its charter, which will be hereinafter considered, were intended to give it such authority, they were unconstitutional. At the interlocutory hearing the following judgment was rendered: "Upon hearing evidence and argument in the case, * * * it is concluded that the defendant has power under its charter to open said crossing, or to have the petitioner to do so; that the charter of the defendant is not unconstitutional. It is further concluded that such legal damages as the railroad may suffer should be assessed and ascertained under the provisions of the general law for condemning property. It is therefore ordered that the defendant be enjoined from opening up said crossing until it shall have had an inquiry into the damages as aforesaid." Neither side to the controversy was satisfied with this judgment, and we have before us two bills of exceptions, one sued out by the petitioner and the other by the defendant. The railroad company excepted to so much of the judgment as held that the defendant has power, "under its charter, to open the crossing described," or to have the railroad company do so, and for specific assignment of error alleged that "such portion of the judgment is contrary to law." For further assignment of error it alleged that so much of the judgment as held that the charter of the town was not unconstitutional was erroneous, in that the portion of the defendant's charter alleged in the petition to be unconstitutional is so "for the reason that it fails to provide for the paying of just compensation for opening of any street across the lands of petitioner or others." The municipality excepted to so much of the judgment as held that, in order for it to cross the tracks of petitioner with its street, condemnation proceedings must be had, and damages paid, and that an injunction should issue till this be done.

Section 10 of the charter of the town of Union Point provides that the mayor and council of the town shall have power "to require any railroad running through said town to make such crossings as may be needed for public conveniences," and shall have power "to establish and lay out new streets as public necessity requires." Acts 1901, p. 669. The main question in the case is whether, under these provisions of the charter, the state has granted to the municipal corporation the right to exercise the power of eminent domain for the purpose of laying out and opening streets. The exercise of the power of eminent domain being in derogation of common right, the power cannot be inferred or implied from vague or doubtful language, but must be given in express terms or by necessary implication. Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 240. Another eminent author has said: "The right to appropriate private property to public uses lies dormant in the state until legislative action is had pointing out the occasions, modes, conditions, and agencies for its appropriation." Cooley's Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 653. The fact that the Legislature has undertaken to confer upon the municipal corporation authority to require any railroad company whose railroad runs through the town to make such crossings over the road as may be needed for public convenience, does not necessarily imply that the Legislature intended to confer upon the municipality the right to exercise the power of eminent domain for this purpose. It is rather a negation of such an intention, for it contemplates, not a necessity for the exercise of a power which cannot be exerted without compensation for the property taken or damaged by its exercise, but a right to compel a given thing to be done without compensation. So the town construes its own charter, for its bill of exceptions is based upon the idea, and it contends here, that it has the right to open the street across the right of way and tracks of the railroad company without paying the railroad company any compensation whatever. Authority to require a crossing to be made does not involve the idea of purchasing the right to cross, either under condemnation proceedings or otherwise, but presupposes the existence of such right. The clause now in question seems to contemplate the exercise by the municipality of the police power of the state, which is exercised without compensation for the loss occasioned thereby, instead of the power of eminent domain, which cannot be exercised without compensation. Certainly, there is nothing in this provision of the charter which by clear and necessary implication confers upon the municipality the right to exercise the power of eminent domain.

2. It has been decided by this court that power granted to a municipal corporation to lay out and open streets when there is no grant of power to take or damage private property for the purpose or to make compensation therefor, does not enable the municipality to lay out and open a street over the land and tracks of a chartered railway company without the consent of the company. Brunswick & Western Railway Co. v. Waycross, 94 Ga. 102, 21 S. E. 145. In the opinion the present chief justice said: "Such authority cannot be implied from the grant of power to lay out and open streets. In the absence of any further provision authorizing the municipal authorities to condemn property for that purpose, the presumption is that the Legislature intended that the necessary property should be acquired by contract." A similar ruling was made by the Supreme Court of Washington in City of Tacoma v. State, 4 Wash. 64, 29 Pac. 847. In delivering the opinion of the court, Stiles, J., said: "It may be contended that the seventh subdivision of section 5 of the act, which is a grant of power to 'lay out, establish,' etc., 'streets, alleys, avenues,' etc., necessarily includes the implied power to condemn lands for those purposes. But there have been many such contentions in the courts, and they have been, with entire uniformity, resolved the other way, as there is nothing in such a grant which may not be accomplished by purchase of necessary lands by agreement with the owners. A very strong case of this kind is that of Chaffee's Appeal, 56 Mich. 244, 22 N. W. 871. An act of the Legislature of Michigan authorized the city of Detroit to open, extend, widen, or straighten streets and alleys, and to take private property therefor, under proceedings further specified in the act. But, although the jury were instructed by the act how they were to award compensation for the opening of streets and alleys, nothing was said about compensation for widening; and it was held that the whole act, so far as concerned widening of a street, was inoperative. The authority remained, but the method of taking was completely paralyzed, because no compensation was provided." The Supreme Court of Illinois took the contrary view, holding that the power to lay out and open a new street necessarily implies and includes the power to institute a condemnation proceeding to carry such power into effect. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co. v. Cicero, 154 Ill. 656, 39 N. E. 574. The decision of this court in the Waycross Case is in line with the decision in Markham v. Howell, 33 Ga. 508, where it was held: "Authority by the Legislature to inferior courts of this state to establish smallpox hospitals does not authorize those courts to impress private property of citizens. This power, to be exercised by individuals, etc., does not arise by implication, but must be specially conferred by the Legislature." In the opinion Lyon, J., said: "This is too dangerous and extraordinary power to be conferred by implication. It must be expressly granted, and must provide in the grant the mode of compensation," etc. This ruling was adhered to in Markham v. Brown, 37 Ga. 277, 92 Am. Dec. 73, in which Walker, J., said: "The right of the inferior court to provide hospitals for smallpox patients, under the law, is one thing; but their right to seize or impress the private property of the citizen for that purpose is another, and quite a different thing. No express power is given them in the law to do so, and we cannot give it to them by implication." The Supreme Court of Missouri held broadly that "the power to take private property for public use is in derogation of property and the right of the citizen, and the authority so conferred by law must not be implied or inferred, but must be given in express language." Schmidt v. Densmore, 42 Mo. 225. So, in Phillips v. Dunkirk, Warren & Pittsburgh R. Co., 78 Pa. 177, it was held: "The right of eminent domain will not be presumed to exist in a corporation unless by express legislative grant." In Boston & Lowell Railroad Corporation v. Salem & Lowell Railroad Co., 2 Gray, 36, Chief Justice Shaw said: "It must appear that the government intend to exercise this high sovereign right by clear and express terms or by necessary implication, leaving no doubt or uncertainty respecting such intent. It must also appear by the act that they recognize the right of private property, and mean to respect it; and under our Constitution the act conferring the power must be accompanied by just and constitutional provisions for full compensation to be made to the owner. * * * In general, therefore, when an act seems to confer an authority on another to take property, and the grant is not clear and explicit, and no compensation is provided by it for the owner or party whose rights are injuriously affected, the law will conclude that it was not the intent of the Legislature to exercise the right of eminent domain, but simply to confer a right to do the act or to exercise the power given on first obtaining the consent of those thus affected." The decision of this court in the Waycross Case is in accordance with the great weight of authority; and, even if it were not, it would be controlling authority in the case under review. It is contended by the defendant in error, however, that the decision in that case is not controlling in the present one, because at the time it was rendered there was no statutory authority to which the municipality could resort for the purpose of having compensation for property taken or damaged by the opening of a street assessed; while at the time the charter of the town of Union Point was enacted there was in existence a general law providing the method for condemning private property for public uses, which went into effect on December 18, 1894. Acts 1894, p. 95; Civ. Code 1895, § 4657 et seq. Undoubtedly, there is that difference between the two cases. Still we do not think the contention is sound. If the right to condemn private property cannot be implied from the grant of authority to lay out and open streets, then a municipal corporation, which, in reference to streets, has been granted no more authority than this, is not authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain for the purpose of opening a street, and it is only corporations or persons who are authorized to exercise this power who can resort to the provisions of the act of 1894 in order to condemn private property. The purpose of that act, as declared in its title, was "to provide a uniform method of exercising the right of condemning, taking, or damaging private property," and its first section declared that "all corporations or persons authorized to take or damage private property for public purposes shall proceed as herein set forth." The codification of the act did not enlarge its purpose, for Civ. Code 1895, § 4657, adopts literally the language above quoted from the first section of the act. This statute was certainly not intended to confer power, or to enlarge or supplement the meaning of any statute then in existence or which might thereafter be passed, but was simply intended to provide a general and uniform method of exercising a power which had been or should thereafter be given. It applies only to "corporations or persons authorized to take or damage private property for public purposes." The authority of a given corporation "to take or damage private property for public purposes" must be looked for in its charter. If it is not expressed there, it must be necessarily implied from what is expressed there. When the authority is found in the charter, the method of its exercise is found in the provisions of the Civil Code taken from the act of 1894. If the right to exercise the power of eminent domain had been conferred by the Legislature upon the town of Union Point, the method for the exercise of such right would be found in the provisions of the act of 1894, but, as this right has neither expressly nor by necessary implication been conferred upon the municipality, the provisions of this statute have no application to anything contained in its charter.

3. The contention of the municipal corporation that the opening of the street across the right of way and tracks of the railroad company is not a taking or damaging of private property, "but is a mere subjection of the railroad right of way and tracks to another consistent public use, which the Legislature may lawfully authorize the town authorities to impose, without any compensation or provision therefor," is contrary to the decisions of this court upon the subject. Undoubtedly, the right of way and tracks of a railroad company may be subjected to another and consistent public use, provided the power to condemn the property of the railroad company for such a purpose exists, and just compensation is first paid the railroad company for the damage its property will thereby sustain. But this court has held that the right of way and tracks of a railroad company cannot be subjected to another and consistent public use, against the consent of the company, except under condemnation proceedings duly authorized. Georgia Midland R. Co. v. Columbus R. Co., 89 Ga. 205, 15 S. E. 805; Brunswick Ry. Co. v. Waycross, supra; Atlantic & B. R. Co. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 116 Ga. 412, 42 S. E. 761. While all three of the cases just cited are directly in point so far as the principle involved is concerned, the ruling in the Waycross Case is especially applicable here; for, if the contention that there is nothing to condemn when a municipal corporation seeks to open a street across the right of way and track of a railroad company were sound, this court would not have decided that the city of Waycross could not open a street across the right of way and tracks of the Brunswick & Western Railroad Company, because it had no power to condemn the property of the railroad company for this purpose. There is nothing to the contrary in Cleveland v. Augusta, 102 Ga. 233, 29 S. E. 594, 43 L. R. A. 633, upon which the municipal corporation relies to sustain its contention. There the railroad corporation constructed its railroad across an existing public highway or street, while here the effort is to construct a public street across an existing railroad. The learned counsel for the municipality says in his brief: "For the correctness of the proposition that the requirement of the railroads to construct crossings is an exercise of the police power, and not a taking of private property, no better proof or argument can be presented than the opinion of this court in the" Cleveland Case. We are entirely satisfied with the decision of this court in that case, and think the compliment paid by counsel to the able opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Little is well deserved. But there is as much difference between requiring a railroad company to maintain a street crossing over its track at a point where such track has intersected an existing public street and requiring a railroad company to extend a public street over its right of way and tracks as there is between the exercise of the police power and the exercise of the power of eminent domain. In the one case the municipal authorities do not have to acquire the right to subject the property of the railroad company to a new public use, as the railroad company acquired its right of way and constructed its track across the street subject to the existing public use; while in the other the position of the parties is reversed, and it is the municipal corporation which seeks to subject the property of the railroad company to an additional public use. Whenever municipal authorities have lawfully subjected the property of a railroad company to the public use for street purposes, then, and not until then, can the railroad company be required to maintain a street crossing over its tracks. In this case it has only been necessary to decide whether the municipality, under its charter, has the power to lay out and open a street across the right of way and tracks of the railroad company, against the consent of the company. But in determining this question it was necessary to decide whether the railroad company had any property right which would be taken or damaged by the laying out and opening of the street across its right of way and tracks. This last question, as we have seen, was already settled by decisions of this court which are cited above. As the municipality has no power to exercise the right of eminent domain for the purpose in question, it has, of course, not been necessary for us to determine what would be the amount of damages, in such a case, under condemnation proceedings, or what elements would go to make up the damages. There are many cases which hold that the expense of maintaining a street crossing over a railroad cannot be taken into consideration in determining the amount of damages to be assessed for acquiring the right to lay out and establish a street across the right of way and track of a railroad company; but that, after the street has been lawfully laid out and established over the property of the railroad company, the company is bound, under statutes requiring it to maintain in good order street crossings over its tracks, to keep up such crossings at its own expense, such statutes being held to be a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. So it may be that in most cases the damages to be awarded for acquiring the right to subject the right of way and track of a railroad company to the public use for street crossing would be merely nominal in amount.

SEARS v. JEFFORDS et al.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—AMENDMENT—NEW PARTIES—SERVICE.

1. While a bill of exceptions is amendable by the record so as to introduce the names of parties, it is futile to thus make new parties defendant in error unless they will waive service, and consent that the case be heard by the Supreme Court on its merits.

2. An acknowledgment of service upon a bill of exceptions does not relate to or bind any person not actually named or sufficiently designated therein as a defendant in error when the acknowledgment is entered.

Error from Superior Court, Coffee County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by Hiram Sears, Sr., against S. V. Jeffords and others. Pending the action plaintiff and Jeffords died, and their executors were substituted. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

S. W. Hetch and Quincey & McDonald, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Sweat and L. A. Wilson, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. "Hiram Sears, Sr.," brought an equitable petition against S. V. Jeffords, praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting timber, for the cancellation of a lease, for damages for timber already cut, and for general relief. By an amendment, which was offered in the name of "Hiram Sears," it was alleged that S. P. Jeffords and Bailey had combined and confederated with S. V. Jeffords to cut and remove the timber before certain notes given by S. V. Jeffords were due; and the prayer of the amendment was that S. P. Jeffords and Bailey be made parties, and that the plaintiff have an accounting with them for the timber cut and removed by them from the land in controversy. An order was passed granting the prayer of the amendment, and making the persons named parties defendant to the case. While the case was pending, plaintiff and S. P. Jeffords died. Hiram Sears, as administrator of the estate of Hiram Sears, deceased, was made a party plaintiff; and Mrs. S. P. Jeffords, as executrix of the will of S. P. Jeffords, was made a party defendant. After parties were thus made, the case came on to be heard on demurrers to the petition filed by the three defendants. The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the petition. The case is here upon what is claimed to be a bill of exceptions sued out in the case. This bill of exceptions recites that "the case of Hiram Sears, Sr., v. S. V. Jeffords, S. P. Jeffords, and J. S. Bailey, the same being a petition for injunction," etc., came on to be tried, etc., and, after reciting the filing of the demurrers and hearing of the same, avers that the demurrers were sustained, and the case dismissed; and this ruling is assigned as error. Upon this bill of exceptions appears an acknowledgment of service, signed as follows: "J. L. Sweat, L. A. Wilson, Attorneys for Plaintiffs." When the case was called here, a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error because it was sued out in the name of a dead person, and because one of the persons described as defendant in error was dead at the time the bill of exceptions was sued out. In reply to this motion to dismiss the plaintiff in error moved to amend the bill of exceptions by adding after the name of the plaintiff in error the words, "as administrator of estate of Hiram Sears," and by prefixing to the name of the defendant in error S. P. Jeffords the abbreviation "Mrs.," and following the name with the words, "as administratrix of estate of S. P. Jeffords."

If it appears from the record that one who should have been joined as a defendant in error to the bill of exceptions has not been named as such therein, he may be made a party by amendment, provided he is willing to waive service and consent that the case be heard on its merits. An acknowledgment of service of a bill of exceptions, entered prior to the time such an amendment is made, will not be construed as an acknowledgment of service by the party thereafter made. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 551, 38 S. E. 859. An acknowledgment of service in behalf of "defendants in error" has been held not to be a sufficient acknowledgment of service for a defendant in error who was made a party to the bill of exceptions after the date of the acknowledgment. Orr v. Webb, 112 Ga. 303, 38 S. E. 93. If this rule is sound, certainly an acknowledgment of service by attorneys describing themselves as "attorneys for plaintiffs," when it appears from the record that they were not attorneys for any one who was a plaintiff in the court below, would not be held to be a sufficient acknowledgment of service for a defendant in error who was not a party to the bill of exceptions at the date of such acknowledgment. It follows that Mrs. Jeffords, as administratrix of the estate of S. P. Jeffords, could be made a party to the bill of exceptions, provided it was made to appear that she was willing to waive service and consent that the case be heard. This has not been made to appear, and it would therefore be useless to allow the bill of exceptions to be amended. The writ of error must be dismissed for want of proper parties defendant in error. Under this view of the case, it is unnecessary to determine whether the bill of exceptions was sued out in the name of the dead plaintiff, Hiram Sears, or in the name of the living administrator, Hiram Sears, and, if in the name of the latter, whether the bill of exceptions is amendable by adding his representative capacity.

Writ of error dismissed. All the Justices concurring.

GREENE v. BARRON et al.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES—DISMISSAL—SERVICE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. When in an action on a bond against the principal and his sureties the petition was dismissed on joint demurrer of all the defendants, the sureties were necessary parties defendant to a bill of exceptions sued out by the plaintiff, alleging error upon the judgment sustaining such demurrer and dismissing the petition. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 36 S. E. 859, 111 Ga. 551, 556, 557, and citations.

2. Where persons who are essential parties defendant to a bill of exceptions are neither named nor designated therein as such, and the only attempt to do so is by using with reference to them the abbreviation "et al.," following the name of one who is a proper defendant in error, a motion to dismiss the writ of error for want of necessary parties thereto will be sustained. Farr v. Farr, 38 S. E. 962, 113 Ga. 577.

3. An acknowledgment of service upon a bill of exceptions does not relate to or bind any person not actually named or sufficiently designated therein as a defendant in error when the acknowledgment is entered. Orr v. Webb, 38 S. E. 98, 112 Ga. 806 (3); Sears v. Jeffords (Ga.) 47 S. E. 186.

HUMPHREYS v. BROWN.

FRAUD—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. The case presented an issue of fraud. The evidence was of such a character as to authorize a finding either way. The judge submitted the Error from Superior Court, Jefferson County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Claim case between Henry Humphreys and O. B. Brown, executor. From the judgment, Humphreys brings error. Affirmed.

Henry C. Roney and Phillips & Phillips, for plaintiff in error. Cain & Hardeman, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. This was a claim case. The issue was one of fraud. The transaction involved a sale of land by the defendant in execution to her sister, made while the suit on the debt of the plaintiff in execution was pending. The issue as to whether the deed made in pursuance of this sale was valid or fraudulent was fairly and fully submitted to the jury. The evidence was of such a character as to have authorized a verdict either way; and, such being the case, this court will not interfere with the judgment refusing a new trial, unless some material error of law was committed. Complaint is made that the court erred in admitting certain evidence. Even if this assignment of error is presented in such a way that it can be dealt with, there was no error in admitting the evidence. The requests to charge, so far as they were legal, pertinent, and appropriate, were sufficiently covered by the general charge. After a careful examination of the record, we find no reason for reversing the judgment refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

HOLLY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

CARRIERS—LOSS OF BAGGAGE—PASS.

1. One who receives of a railroad company a gratuitous pass over its line, which by its terms is "issued only on condition that the person accepting it assumes all risks of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable, under any circumstances, for any injury to the person, or loss or damage to the property of the person using it," cannot recover of the company the value of baggage lost while traveling on such pass.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by A. I. Holly, as next friend of Lillian Leslie Holly, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Anderson & Thomas, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, Sanders McDaniel, and J. D. Bradwell, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The plaintiff, as next friend of her minor daughter, Lillian Leslie Holly, sued the Southern Railway Company for damages on account of the loss of a trunk and its contents. The original petition set out merely the delivery of the trunk to the defendant in Washington, D. C., and the receipt of a check therefor, a demand for it in Atlanta, and the failure then and subsequently to comply with that demand, and charged that the trunk was lost by reason of the negligence of the defendant company. By an amendment the allegation of negligence was stricken, and in lieu thereof it was alleged that the plaintiff demanded the trunk of the defendant, and its delivery was refused. From another amendment it appeared that, at the time the trunk was alleged to have been lost, the plaintiff and her daughter were riding over the defendant's line of railroad on a free pass. The defendant, in its answer, denied liability, and averred, "by way of plea in bar" to the action, "that plaintiff was not its passenger in the sense alleged in said declaration, so as to make it legally liable for any loss of her baggage, for that plaintiff at the time was gratuitously on its train, and without the payment of fare; she being allowed to ride upon said train by virtue of a complimentary pass gratuitously furnished her, without any consideration whatever to defendant. Such pass from Atlanta to Washington was allowed her upon the following conditions, which it contained: 'This ticket is issued only on condition that the person accepting it assumes all risk of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable, under any circumstances, for any injury to the person, or loss or damage to the property of the person using it.' * * *. These conditions are binding upon the plaintiff, and bar her right to recover for the alleged loss of her baggage." The plaintiff demurred to the portion of the answer which we have quoted, but the demurrer was overruled. At the trial the plaintiff proved the delivery of the trunk to the defendant in Washington; that, upon presentation of the check for it at the baggage depot in Atlanta, it could not be found; that diligent search was made for it then and afterwards by the employees of the defendant company, without result; and that the trunk had never been returned to its owner. It was not shown how the trunk was lost, or that the agents of the railroad company had been in any manner negligent in handling it. The only evidence introduced by the defendant was in support of that portion of its plea which we have already set out. The court, on motion, directed a verdict for the defendant. To this ruling, and to the overruling of her demurrer to the answer, the plaintiff excepted.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the only question presented for our determination is whether, in an action against a railroad company, by one who has ridden over its line on a free pass, to recover the value of baggage alleged to have been lost by it, it is a complete defense to show that, as a condition of the gratuity extended him, the plaintiff agreed that the defendant should not be liable for any loss of property or damage to person which he might sustain while using the pass. In the present case the plaintiff seems to have recognized that the ordinary relation of carrier and passenger did not exist between her and the defendant, for by an amendment she struck the allegation of negligence in her original petition, and stood squarely on the bailment of her property, which, by her own showing, was entirely gratuitous. Regardless of any agreement or condition involved in the issuance of the pass, the defendant, as a gratuitous bailee, could only be held liable for gross negligence, which, under ordinary circumstances, it would be bound to disprove upon the introduction by the plaintiff of evidence of the bailment, and the loss of the property bailed. Civ. Code 1895, § 2896. Stated a little differently, then, the question now before us is, may a gratuitous bailee, as a consideration of the gratuity, stipulate against his own gross or wanton negligence? The precise point involved seems never to have been squarely decided in this state, and, while there are numerous authorities on the subject to be found in the Reports from other states, the conclusions reached by the various courts present, unfortunately, a hopeless conflict of opinion.

It is well settled in Georgia that a railroad company may, by a special contract, change the nature of its liability, provided the contract be founded upon a sufficient consideration, be reasonable, and be not void as against public policy. It has been held that it may stipulate that it shall be liable only as a private carrier, and not as a common carrier; the consideration of the stipulation being the grant of a reduced rate of freight. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Glascock, 117 Ga. 938, 43 S. E. 981. Upon a like consideration a contract has been held valid which provided that the company should be liable only for gross negligence. Cooper v. Raleigh R. Co., 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240. These cases are in entire harmony with the principle ruled in Georgia R. Co. v. Keener, 93 Ga. 808, 21 S. E. 287, 44 Am. St. Rep. 197, where a contract was held invalid which did not seek to change the nature of the company's liability, but named an arbitrary amount which might be recovered in the event of loss or damage by the defendant's negligence. In the present case the railroad company, in the absence of any agreement, condition, or stipulation, could, as a gratuitous bailee, only be held liable for gross negligence. The plaintiff paid it no fare, and offered to pay it none, but solicited of it the favor of free transportation for herself and her baggage over its line of railroad. This favor it was under no obligation whatever to grant. Why, then, could it not legally impose as a condition to the extension of this favor that she should assume all the risks of the journey, and that it should not be held liable for any loss to her property or injury to her person? Why may not the railroad company say: "I will give you a free ride, and carry your baggage for you, but I will not assume responsibility for the security of your property or the safety of your person. The duties imposed upon me by law to safeguard the persons and property of those whom I am obliged to carry give me all that I can do, and, while I do not object to your riding on my train without the payment of fare, I cannot undertake to assume a responsibility as a result of my courtesy."

The only reason that can be urged against the validity of such conditions to the grant of a free pass is that it is opposed to public policy, and we confess our inability to see the force of this argument. If gratuitous transportation by railroads were of such common occurrence as to involve the public, or any considerable proportion thereof, it might well be said that considerations of public welfare would forbid that the company should in any way restrict its liability in a matter of this sort. But for every gratuitous passenger carried by a railroad company, many are carried who have paid full fare, and to whom the company is due the full measure of extraordinary diligence; and it is a self-evident proposition that negligence as to gratuitous passengers would involve the greater consequences of negligence to passengers who have paid fare. The person riding on a free pass is, in a sense, protected by the fact that on the same train and in the same car with him are others to whom the railroad company owes the highest degree of care known to the law, and the further fact that any negligence to him necessarily involves the safety of those around whom the law throws a more ample protection than he would otherwise enjoy. In this view of the case, we fail to see how the question of public policy can affect the imposition of conditions to the grant of a free pass, by the terms of which the company is exempted from liability. What we now hold is in no way in conflict with the ruling of this court in the case of Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Lippman, 110 Ga. 665, 38 S. E. 202, 50 L. R. A. 873. In that case it was held that section 2276 of the Civil Code of 1895, which provides that a common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold, but that he may make an express contract, by which he will be governed, has no application to a carrier of passengers; and it was further decided that a carrier of passengers for hire cannot by contract exempt himself from liability for his negligence. A broad distinction is to be noted between the Lippman Case and the case now under consideration. There the relation of carrier and passenger existed between the defendant and the plaintiff in its full sense, while here there was no consideration whatever for the carriage, and the plaintiff herself, by her petition as amended, treated the transaction out of which the suit arose as a mere bailment, entirely gratuitous in its nature.

As before stated, the various courts of this country hold widely divergent views on the subject now under consideration. We will call attention to a few of the cases which support the ruling now made, and which, in our opinion, afford excellent reasons for our position. In the case of Quimby v. Boston R. Co. (Mass.) 23 N. E. 205, 5 L. R. A. 846, it was held that "an agreement by one who accepts a railroad pass purely as a gratuity, that he will assume all risks of accident, of every name and nature, is not against public policy, and will prevent a recovery by him for injuries occasioned by the negligence of the railroad company's servants." It appeared in that case that the pass was issued with a proviso that the plaintiff sign the agreement referred to, but, as a matter of fact, he did not sign it, not having been required to do so by the conductor; and the court held that his failure to sign the agreement was unimportant, for, it was said, "having accepted the pass, he must have done so on the conditions fully expressed therein, whether he actually read them or not." It was further said in the opinion that the reasoning that the agreement or condition involved was void as against public policy "can have no application to a strictly free passenger, who receives a passage out of charity or as a gratuity. Certainly the carrier is not likely to urge upon others the acceptance of free passes, as the success of his business must depend on his receipts. * * * The instances cannot be so numerous that any temptation will be offered to carelessness in the management of their trains, or to an increase in their fares, in both of which subjects the public is interested." In Kinney v. Central R. Co., 82 N. J. Law, 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, it was held that a contract that, in consideration of a free passage, a passenger will assume the risk of injuries to his person from the negligence of the servants of the railroad company, is valid in law, and that a passenger who receives knowingly a free ticket, with an indorsement of such a contract upon it, will be bound by its terms, and cannot recover for injuries sustained from the cause specified. A well-reasoned case on this subject is that of Muldoon v. Seattle R. Co., 7 Wash. 528, 35 Pac. 422, 22 L. R. A. 794, 38 Am. St. Rep. 901, wherein it was held: "A passenger riding upon a free pass which contains conditions limiting the liability of the carrier on account of negligence cannot recover for injuries received through the negligence of the carrier's servant." On the question of public policy, Stiles, J., delivering the opinion, said: "When the intending passenger proposes to the carrier that it do something for him which it is not, under any conceivable circumstances, required by law or duty to do, viz., to carry him without any compensation whatever, and when the whole matter is at the option of either party to agree or not, it is difficult to see why public policy should step in and deny the right of the carrier to limit its chances of loss in the operation, even though a careless servant cause unintentional injury to the passenger. The theory that the granting of passes upon condition like this will tend to demoralize the servants of railway and other carriers, and thereby imperil the limbs and lives of paying passengers, seems to us mere fancy; and yet this is about the only consideration urged by those courts which hold that there is a public policy in the way of such agreements. Absolutely gratuitous passes represent but an infinitesimal portion of the mileage actually traveled, and, of all the passengers carried, but an infinitesimal number are injured by the carrier's negligence. The precautions adopted by managers and employees of land and water transportation companies are not gauged by the fact that there may be free passengers aboard, and never will be, while the doctrine of respondeat superior has its present healthy existence." See, also, Griswold v. New York R. Co. (Conn.) 4 Atl. 261, 55 Am. Rep. 115; Wells v. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 181; Perkins v. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 196, 82 Am. Dec. 281; Bissell v. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 442, 82 Am. Dec. 369; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Adams (decided February 24, 1904) 24 Sup. Ct. 408, 48 L. Ed. —.

In conclusion we will say that, reasoning by analogy, it seems to us clear that if, as has been held by the Georgia cases to which we have already referred, a railroad company, acting in its public capacity as a common carrier, may by special contract relieve itself from liability for any but gross negligence, it may, as a consideration for doing something which it is under no obligation to do, and in the performance of which it would under no circumstances be liable for anything less than gross negligence, require that it shall, in the event of loss or damage, be held liable under no circumstances whatever. It follows that in the present case the railroad company made out a complete defense, and that the court properly directed a verdict in its favor.

LAMAR, J. (with whom concur FISH, P. J., and TURNER, J.). It appears that the trunk was lost, and there is neither allegation nor evidence of any negligence by the gratuitous bailee. The case at bar does not, therefore, involve a decision on the effect of gross, willful, or criminal negligence, nor do the cases cited deal with injuries or losses occasioned by such negligence. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, but not in all the reasoning of the foregoing opinion.

APPEAL—REVIEW—KILLING STOCK—CONFLICT-ING EVIDENCE.

1. The defendant admitted the killing and value of the stock, assumed the burden of proof, and made out a defense by the testimony of the engineer and fireman. The testimony in rebuttal, as to the rate of speed, the time when the brakes were applied, the position of the cattle, and the distance at which they could have first been seen, was in conflict with that for the company, and sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by H. A. Turner against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Turner sued the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company for $100, being the value of three cows killed by the company's train on March 15, 1902. The defendant admitted the killing, and that the animals were of the value claimed, and assumed the burden of making out the defense that it was impossible, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to avoid the injury complained of. It successfully carried the burden in chief by the testimony of the engineer and fireman, who testified that a lookout was kept; that the animals were in a cut, and on a curve distant from a crossing; that the train was running between 40 and 50 miles an hour; that the cows could not have been seen more than 200 feet from where they were struck; that as soon as seen the stock alarm was given, the emergency brakes were applied, and everything possible done to avoid the injury; and that the train did not stop when it was seen that they had been knocked from the track. But the evidence for the plaintiff by passengers on the train and eyewitnesses standing near the track was to the effect that the train was not checked when the whistle was blown; that there was no slackening of speed until about the moment of striking the cattle; that the cattle were at the mouth of the cut when first seen; and that they were in full view of the engineer for as much as 300 or 400 yards. There was also some evidence that the cattle ran a considerable distance along the track and away from the approaching train.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, G. M. Beasley, and M. A. Candler, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Milner, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. From the statement of facts it will be seen that the effect of the admission by the company, and the consequent presumption of negligence, was not necessarily removed. On consideration of all of the evidence introduced by both parties, it appears that there was sufficient to sustain a verdict in plaintiff's favor, and the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BORUM v. GREGORY.

EJECTMENT—WHO MAY MAINTAIN—LIFE TENANT—DEATH.

1. One who has no estate in land, but who is entitled to a support therefrom, which, so far as appears, is being received, cannot maintain an action for the recovery of such land.

2. Upon the death of one who has a life interest in land such interest ceases, and her administrator cannot maintain an action to recover the land.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by D. M. Borum, administrator for use, against J. H. Gregory. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. F. Strozler and Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. Hall & George and Whipple & McKenzie, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Complaint for land was brought against Gregory by Mary S. Borum, who claimed a life estate in such land under the will of Alexander Borum. The plaintiff died, and D. M. Borum, her administrator, was made a party and allowed to amend the petition by alleging that the land sued for was "charged with a comfortable support of Mary S. Borum during her life, the support to be provided by the executor"; that the executor had been discharged and D. M. Borum appointed administrator cum testamento annexo; and "that this land is necessary for the support of said Mary S. Borum." The prayer of the amendment was that D. M. Borum, as administrator of Alexander Borum, recover the land for the use of Mary S. Borum's administrator. The defendant moved to dismiss the petition as amended, and the court sustained the motion. The plaintiff excepted.

1. The will of Alexander Borum, attached as an exhibit to the petition, shows that no life estate was thereby left to Mary S. Borum, but that the land was charged with her support, to be provided out of the estate by the executor. The original petition therefore set out no cause of action. Mary S. Borum was entitled to a support out of the estate, but to no more than this. If the estate yielded more than was necessary for her support, she had no interest in the surplus. The executor was charged with the duty of providing such support, and to him she was to look for it. She had no estate for life or for years, and no interest on which could be based an action of ejectment in her name. She did not even allege that the executor had failed to provide her with a support out of the estate.

2. Whatever may be D. M. Borum's rights, as administrator of the estate of the testator, in a proper proceeding as such administrator to recover the land, he cannot, by amendment to Mary S. Borum's petition, maintain an action to recover her interest in the land for the use of her administrator. The amendment does not allege that she was entitled to any payments which should have been made to her, but which were not in fact made. The suit is simply for her interest for the use of her administrator. That interest continued only while she was in life, and ceased at her death. See Sawyer v. Flemister, 29 Ga. 347, where it was said that the interest of a certain person "was but an interest for her life. It follows that at her death there was none of it to pass to her administrator, and therefore that he had no right to sue for the property, or any interest in it." The court below was right in sustaining the motion to dismiss.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

DEED—COMPLETION—NAME OF GRANTEE.

1. An incomplete deed, being without a grantee, cannot be completed in this respect without authority from the grantor.

Suit by Mary J. Van Dyke against Alice M. Van Dyke. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. W. Haden and R. O. Lovett, for plaintiff in error. Culberson, Willingham & Johnson, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. An equitable petition was brought by Mary J. Van Dyke against Alice M. Van Dyke to establish the plaintiff's claim of title to a certain tract of land described in her petition, to have a deed under which the defendant held possession of the premises delivered up and canceled, and for other relief. The petition set forth the following allegations of fact: During the year 1895, and prior thereto, the plaintiff owned in fee simple the tract of land above mentioned. In April of that year she decided to give to her son, E. A. Van Dyke, some of her property, being moved to do so by natural love and affection, and by the fact that, in her opinion, under a division which had been made of his father's estate, the share thereof allotted to him was of less value than were the shares set apart to the other heirs of her husband. In furtherance of this design she signed a paper in the form of a deed, a copy of which she attached to her petition. At the time she signed this paper it was not completed and perfected, because no grantee was named therein, the space designed for the insertion of the name of her grantee being left blank. She never afterwards filled in this blank space, or caused it to be filled in, with the name of the defendant (which now appears in that instrument, as grantee), nor did she (the plaintiff) ever direct or authorize any person whomsoever so to do. She is informed that her son, or some other person, did fill in said blank space with the name of Alice M. Van Dyke; but this was done without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, long afterwards, to wit, on November 30, 1895. The defendant bases her claim of title solely upon this instrument, notwithstanding "said paper, even in its incomplete form, was never delivered to the said Alice M. Van Dyke, nor to any one for her." The "recital in said paper of a consideration of twelve hundred dollars is not true or correct. * * * No consideration was paid or intended to be paid to petitioner by any one," but, on the contrary, it was her intention that this paper, when completed, should "be a gift to said E. A. Van Dyke, and not a sale to his wife, the said Alice M. Van Dyke," and plaintiff never intended to convey the land, or any interest therein, to the defendant. For the above reasons "said paper was inoperative and void, and passed no title, * * * and said land is the right and property of" the plaintiff. The defendant "has incumbered said land to the extent of $2,000 to Mrs. Belle Berk, who loaned said Alice M. Van Dyke said sum on said land in good faith, as petitioner is advised, believing that said Alice M. Van Dyke owned said land; and as said sum was, as petitioner is advised, expended on said land," she admits that the land is rightly chargeable with that sum. The prayers set forth in the plaintiff's petition were that she recover possession of the land; that the paper referred to as having been signed by her be delivered up and canceled, etc. To this petition the defendant demurred generally on the ground that it did not set forth either a legal or an equitable cause of action, and also specially on the ground that, as the instrument attached to the petition and alleged to be a copy of the deed signed by the plaintiff showed that it was made for a valuable consideration, to wit, the sum of $1,200, it was "not competent for the plaintiff to thus impeach her own deed." The court below, after hearing argument on the defendant's demurrer, sustained the same, and dismissed the plaintiff's suit, whereupon she sued out a bill of exceptions to this court, assigning as error the disposition thus made of her case.

1. "The great question in this case," as Nisbet, J., said in the opinion delivered by him in Ingram v. Little, 14 Ga. 182, 58 Am. Dec. 549, "is upon the validity of the deed. It was duly signed, sealed, attested, and written out, except as to the name of the feoffee." This instrument, "before its completion and delivery, was inoperative, because made to no person." Id., 183 (2). Judge Nisbet also said in that case: "We put our decision upon authority, conceding that the books in England and in this country are in 'distrressing' conflict, and with some misgiving whether reason and common sense do not condemn it. This is, however, just the kind of a case in which it is safest to be guided by the weight of authority. The rule, although a technical one, is single, clear, and easy of observance. If abrogated, the title to property might be left too much to the mistakes of memory, or to the corruptions of humanity." Chief Justice Marshall and Lord Mansfield both seem to have entertained this view, though they intimated doubts and difficulties on the subject. Whether or not the precedent established by the case in 14 Ga. 182, 58 Am. Dec. 549, just referred to, has been practically overruled by later decisions of this court in Brown v. Colquitt, 78 Ga. 59, 54 Am. Rep. 867, Weaver v. Carter, 101 Ga. 213, 28 S. E. 869, and Smith v. Ins. Ass'n, 111 Ga. 737, 36 S. E. 957, suffice it to say that in the present case, which was decided on demurrer, it does not appear from the plaintiff's petition that she ever in fact delivered the incomplete deed to her son, or authorized him or any one else to perfect it. She distinctly negatives any authority on the part of her son or other person to fill the blank space left in the deed with the name of her daughter-in-law. None of the cases last above cited can be properly regarded as authority for the proposition that such an incomplete deed can, without some sort of authority, be completed by any other person than the grantor.

There was no merit in the defendant's contention that it was not competent for the plaintiff to assert that the instrument signed by her was not, in fact, based on the valuable consideration therein recited. The doctrine of estoppel by deed in any respect does not apply to an incomplete deed. We accordingly hold that the judgment of the court below, dismissing the plaintiff's case on demurrer, was erroneous.

LOGGING LIEN—FORECLOSURE—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—REVIEW.

1. When, in the trial of a proceeding to foreclose a sawmill man's lien, the jury return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed, with interest, the verdict will be construed to be a finding in favor of the lien claimed.

2. Objection to a judgment that it does not follow the verdict cannot be properly made a ground of a motion for a new trial.

3. The evidence was conflicting, and probably preponderated in favor of the defendant, but there was some evidence from which the jury could find that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien for the amount claimed; and, if there was any error in any of the charges complained of, such error was not of a character requiring the granting of a new trial.

Action by West & Baggett against Mary Eubanks. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Evans & Evans, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. This was a proceeding to foreclose a sawmill man's lien. The evidence was sharply conflicting, both as to what was the contract and as to whether the contract, even as claimed by the plaintiffs, had been substantially complied with. The evidence authorized a finding in favor of either party, and hence the judgment refusing a new trial will not be reversed unless some error of law was committed which was prejudicial to the losing party. The judge charged the jury that if they found in favor of the plaintiffs they should return a general verdict for so many dollars, with interest. This charge amounted to an instruction that such a finding as that indicated would be construed to mean a finding in favor of the lien claimed. A finding in favor of the plaintiffs for a given sum, especially when that sum is the exact amount claimed, is equivalent to a finding in favor of the lien sought to be set up. Under this view, the grounds of the motion for a new trial, which complain that the judgment did not follow the verdict, are without merit. In any event, however, these grounds are without merit, for such an objection cannot be made the ground of a motion for a new trial. Berry v. Clark, 117 Ga. 964, 44 S. E. 824 (4); Chason v. Anderson, 119 Ga. 495, 46 S. E. 629. Even if the charge in relation to the change in the terms of the agreement as to the time when the money for the sawing would be due was subject to the criticisms made upon it, the error was not of such a character as to require a reversal of the judgment, for the reason that the judge distinctly told the jury that the plaintiffs would not be entitled to enforce the lien claimed until after the work was completed. Under the charge of the judge the jury could not find in favor of the lien unless they believed the work had been finished. None of the other charges complained of were erroneous for any reason assigned. After a careful examination of the entire motion for a new trial, we find no reason which would justify us in reversing the judgment.

SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. v. PARKER.

CORPORATIONS—SERVICE ON AGENT—RETURN—DEFAULT—OPENING—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—NEW TRIAL.

1. This court cannot say, as matter of law, that the court below erred in holding that the person served with copy and process in this case was an agent of the defendant, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 1899, 1900.

2. Nor did the court err in holding that the sheriff's return of service, as amended, was legally sufficient.

3. The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to open the default for any of the reasons assigned in the motion presented by the defendant.

4. The amendment to the plaintiff's petition allowed by the court at the trial did not materially change his cause of action, and therefore did not open the petition to demurrer or plea.

5. The jury, under the state of the pleadings, being confined to the question of the amount of the damages suffered by the plaintiff, and no complaint being made in the motion for a new trial that their finding was excessive, the court below committed no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Macon County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Burton Smith, Greer & Felton, Roland Ellis, Hall & Wimberly, Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, and Sanders McDaniel, for plaintiff in error. Lane & Maynard, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. The plaintiff below, Roy Parker, brought suit against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company in the superior court of Macon county, and in his petition set forth the following allegations: The defendant company is a corporation duly chartered under the laws of Georgia, and had and operated on the 2d day of April, 1901, a line of telephone wires and telephones in said county for the use of the public and for hire, and also had on that day, and still has, in that county, an agent for the transaction of its business. Plaintiff is a merchant and is engaged in business in the town of Oglethorpe, Ga. Prior to the 2d day of April, 1901, the defendant company placed one of its telephones in plaintiff's store, at his instance and request, for use in his business; he having paid therefor the usual charges.

This telephone was negligently, carelessly, unskillfully, and unscientifically placed in his store by said company, in this: that said company neglected and failed to attach and connect a ground wire to said telephone, and also neglected and failed to attach and equip the telephone apparatus with the necessary and usual appliances to prevent injury and damage from lightning or electricity, all of which was usual and necessary for the safety of one using the telephone. Plaintiff applied to the agent of the company to have the aforesaid appliances attached and placed and connected with the telephone in his store, and gave warning of the dangerous condition in which the telephone had been left by the company; but, notwithstanding this notice and warning that the telephone was incomplete and dangerous, the company continued to neglect to attach the necessary appliances to render the use of the telephone safe, and thus prevent injury to persons near the same at all times. On April 2, 1901, the plaintiff, while standing about four feet distant from the telephone, was suddenly struck by a volt of electricity transmitted and conveyed over said telephone wires to this telephone, and from it to him, by which volt of electricity plaintiff was knocked senseless to the floor, and from the effect of which he remained unconscious for a considerable time. For several days his suffering was so intense as to require him to have medical attention; the shock to his entire system was so severe as to leave him partially paralyzed; and although some 10 months had elapsed since his injuries were received, he had not fully recovered from the effects of said shock, continued to suffer from his injuries, and feared that they might prove permanent. By reason of the aforesaid gross negligence on the part of the defendant company, he had been damaged in the sum of $1,900, for which amount he prayed judgment against it. The process attached to the plaintiff's petition was directed against the defendant company, and the entry of service made by the sheriff was as follows: "I have this day personally served Dr. M. F. Crumley, agent of the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company at Oglethorpe, Ga., with a copy of the within writ and process. This February 27, 1902." No appearance was made by the defendant at the first term of the case, which was on the second Monday in May, 1902. At the November term following, the sheriff was allowed to amend his entry of service so as to make it read as follows: "By permission of the court, I hereby amend my entry of service by saying that I served the defendant by personally serving Dr. M. F. Crumley, agent in charge of the office of the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company at Oglethorpe, Ga., with a copy of the within writ and process. This November 10, 1902." At the November term, 1902, the defendant appeared and filed a traverse to the return of service on the grounds (1) that service had not in fact been made upon any officer or agent of the company; and (2) that, even if there had been an attempt to perfect service in the manner recited in the sheriff's return, Dr. Crumley was not such an agent of the company as that service on him would bind it. The sheriff was made a party to the traverse, and was duly served. Counsel for the respective parties agreed that the issues thereby raised should be passed on by the court without the intervention of a jury. A hearing on the traverse was had at the May term, 1903, at which time the judge, after the evidence relied on by the defendant company had been submitted, announced his decision that the traverse had not been sustained. Thereupon the defendant challenged the sufficiency of the service, as shown upon the face of the sheriff's return; conceding, for the purposes of its contention, that his entry was true, but denying its legal sufficiency, because it did not disclose that the company had any place of transacting its usual and ordinary public business in Macon county, or elsewhere within the jurisdiction of the court, nor that the office of which Dr. Crumley was alleged to be in charge was the place of transacting the usual and ordinary public business of said corporation, nor that service was perfected upon the defendant in accordance with the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 1899. The court held the return of the officer to be legally sufficient, and declined to quash the entry of service or to dismiss the suit for want of proper service. Counsel for the defendant then made a motion to open the judgment of default which had been rendered at a previous term. This motion recited that, while the company had branch offices located at several named cities in this state, the defendant had never established a telephone exchange or had an operator or regular agent or place of transacting its usual and ordinary business in Oglethorpe, Ga., though it did have at that point a long-distance telephone toll station, located in the drug store of Dr. Crumley, who was authorized to receive toll from customers using the telephone placed in his store, and who was paid a commission on the tolls received at that station. The grounds on which this motion was based were, in substance, that it was never contemplated by the company that he should represent it in the matter of receiving notices of suits; that none of the company's officers, or any person authorized to act for it, had any notice of the plaintiff's suit until a short time before the November term, 1902, of the court wherein it was pending; that, if service was ever made upon Dr. Crumley, he wholly failed to advise the defendant of such service; that the company had a meritorious defense, and that, unless the judgment of default were opened, and it was allowed to file a plea to the merits, a great hardship would be worked upon it, amounting to a denial of the protection guaranteed it by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. After argument had upon this motion to open the judgment of default and allow the defendant to file an answer, the presiding judge entered an order overruling the motion. Immediately thereafter, and before the case proceeded to trial on its merits, counsel for the defendant moved orally to dismiss the plaintiff's petition on the ground that there was no allegation therein that his alleged injury occurred in Macon county, and therefore the jurisdiction of the court was not made to appear. The court, after announcing that he would sustain the defendant's motion to dismiss the suit, permitted the plaintiff to amend the second paragraph of his petition by inserting an allegation disclosing that the store wherein he was injured was located at Oglethorpe, in Macon county, Ga. Counsel for the company then asked leave of the court to answer the petition, insisting that the amendment thereto was material, and accordingly it was the right of the company to then interpose its defense. The judge declined to permit the company to file its proposed answer, but stated to counsel that they could, if they so desired, answer that paragraph of the plaintiff's petition which had been amended so as to allege the necessary jurisdictional facts. The case was thereupon submitted to the jury and tried upon the only issue presented for determination by the pleadings, viz., the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, and a verdict for $807.08 was returned in his favor. The defendant company subsequently filed a motion for a new trial, and, upon its being overruled, sued out a bill of exceptions to this court; therein assigning error upon each of the several rulings mentioned above as having been invoked by the defendant during the progress of the case, and also complaining of the refusal of the judge to grant it a new trial.

1. The evidence introduced in support of the traverse showed that the defendant company had in the town of Oglethorpe, Ga., what is known as a "long-distance telephone toll station," which was placed in the charge of Dr. Crumley, whose duty it was to collect fees or tolls from patrons of the company, and to give such patrons desired connections with the telephone system which had been established in the city of Americus. The operators in charge of the exchange located in that city connected the telephone at Oglethorpe, when called on to do so by Dr. Crumley, with other telephones located in Americus and in adjacent towns, so that the company's patrons at Oglethorpe could get into communication with parties at Americus and at other points where telephone service had been established by the company. "A toll station is a station where your message is paid for, for talking, at a certain rate of toll, governed by the location or distance of the station at which the party is." There were a number of toll stations under the management of the central office at Americus. The company "never ran a toll station without some one in charge of it as collector," who was in that sense the company's agent, and was, as such, held responsible for the tolls he received from its patrons. The manager at the central office would "check him up each morning." Dr. Crumley, who was the collecting agent at the toll station established in Oglethorpe, looked after that "little station, in the way of managing the business," but he had "no authority whatever to make contracts for defending suits, or anything of that sort." The telephone was placed in a booth in his store, and he was "in charge of the protection and care of the instrument, to see that it was not abused or harmed," and he was under a duty "to do such work about the instrument as would assist the Americus office in keeping the line in good shape." He attended to the "cleaning of the carbons on the lightning arrestors," but probably did "nothing else, unless it was to change fuses in the office. All the rest was done by the lineman from the Americus exchange, and that only was done for the purpose of saving the expense of sending a lineman from the Americus office to do those things. There was no responsibility resting upon Dr. Crumley to report all things arising as necessary or important. As a matter of accommodation," the company's manager "expected him to do that, but only as a matter of accommodation." He was paid for receiving such tolls as he was directed to collect, and was furnished with a printed list "of charges from one station to another," to which he could refer. If a patron talked longer than the time limited for the minimum toll, the extra charge was fixed at the Americus office, the operators in which did "the timing" in all instances. On February 26 and 27, 1902, the company had two telephones at Oglethorpe—one "a regular toll station," and the other what was called "a switch-service station," which was also a toll station, at the store of Roy Parker," the plaintiff. Dr. Crumley was paid a small amount per month "for switching service to the station of" Parker, who, it would seem, could get into communication with the central office at Americus only through the toll station placed in Dr. Crumley's drug store. It appears from the recitals of a written contract between the company and Dr. Crumley, which was offered in evidence, that he was "to furnish the necessary office room for the instruments and accommodation of patrons; * * * to facilitate and encourage the use of the telephones, and promote the business as much as possible; * * * to collect a toll, at the schedule rate, for every talk through the instruments" placed at his station; "to keep records and make reports and pay over or remit balances of money due the company, in accordance with such instructions" as might from time to time be given him from the central office. The contract further stipulated that the telephone instruments were to

"receive proper care," and were "not to be removed from one place to another except by a duly authorized employé of the company," and that Dr. Crumley was to receive, for the services rendered by him, certain commissions on all tolls paid by patrons of the company at his station. His understanding of the relation he bore to the company is indicated by the following statement which he made as a witness in its behalf: "There was an office of the company in my store. I was the agent of the company and transacted the company's business," being held responsible for all the receipts of this office at Oglethorpe. In view of the evidence above set forth, the question presented for determination is whether or not Dr. Crumley was an "agent" of the company, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 1899, 1900, which provide how service may be perfected on corporations of the class to which the defendant company belongs. If so, personal service on him as its agent would undoubtedly bind the company, and the return of the sheriff, as amended, should be held to be legally sufficient. This question is a close one. But we cannot say that the court below erroneously held that Dr. Crumley was such an agent as the above-cited sections of the Code contemplate. Of course, it was never intended that a corporation should be bound by service on a mere employé or a mere servant of the corporation, in a limited sense. At the same time, it is not necessary that service should be made upon one who is, in a technical sense, an official of the corporation to be served, for section 1899 expressly declares that service "may be perfected by serving any officer or agent of such corporation." While Dr. Crumley was certainly not an officer of the company, equally clear is it that he was not its mere servant, nor one to whom the term "employé," as commonly understood, could properly be said to apply. Apparently he belongs to that large class to the various members of which the broad term of "agent" is indifferently applied, without any attempt to distinguish one type from another. The cardinal rule of construction to be looked to and followed in giving effect to a statute is, as stated in Pol. Code 1895, § 4, that the "ordinary signification shall be applied to all words, except words of art," etc. There is nothing in the language of either of the sections of the Civil Code above referred to which suggests that the word "agent," as therein used, was intended to be understood in any unusual, limited, or restricted sense, or otherwise than is justified by its ordinary signification. Had the governing officials of the company so understood the statute, doubtless they would have frankly accorded Dr. Crumley recognition as its "agent," and instructed him as to his duty with respect to notifying them when service was made on him as the local representative of the company at Oglethorpe, through whom it conducted all the business with its patrons at that point. Counsel for the company do not, as we understand their argument, for a moment contend that the term "agent," as commonly employed, cannot fairly be applied to one occupying the position of trust and confidence which was filled by the company's representative in that town, but, on the contrary, merely insist that it is unreasonable to suppose that the legislative will was that this term should be understood according to its ordinary signification or in its broad and popular sense. In other words, the argument of counsel was addressed to the consideration of the possible, if not probable, hardship which an application of the cardinal rule of construction above referred to would necessarily impose upon their client and other corporations. While, perhaps, we are authorized to take for granted that statutes are not intended to operate harshly or unreasonably, still we cannot ignore the well-established rules of construction, with reference to which statutes must be deemed to have been framed; else we might fall into the error of substituting our own views of the reasonableness of a statute for those of the General Assembly, by which the measure was supposedly deliberately discussed and considered before being enacted into law.

2. Read in connection with the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 1899, 1900, the entry of service made by the sheriff was, in its amended form, legally sufficient, for it showed that service had been perfected in one of the modes prescribed, viz., by personally serving an agent of the company who was in charge of its office at Oglethorpe. This being so, it was wholly unnecessary that the return of the officer should show at what point within the county of Macon the company transacted its usual and ordinary business, or that the agent served was the company's representative having charge of such business. The trial judge therefore properly refused either to quash the entry of service or to dismiss the suit for want of legal service upon the defendant.

3. The motion made by the defendant to open the default recited that it was presented more than 30 days after that judgment was entered. Indeed, it was for the first time made at the term at which the trial was had. If, as we are constrained to hold, the company was bound by the service made upon its representative at Oglethorpe, we cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to open the default for any of the reasons assigned in that motion. See Civ. Code 1895, § 5072. This court has held that while, by statute, a judge is given much latitude in this respect, he has no power to act arbitrarily, but must exercise a sound and legal discretion. See Deering Harvester Co. v. Thompson, 116 Ga. 418, 42 S. E. 772, and citations.

4. The amendment to the plaintiff's petition which the court allowed him to make at the trial did not materially change his cause of action, but merely served to set forth facts disclosing that the court had jurisdiction to entertain his suit. Therefore the making of this amendment did not open the plaintiff's petition to demurrer or plea. Civ. Code 1895, § 5068; O'Connor v. Brucker, 117 Ga. 451, 43 S. E. 731.

5. As the pleadings stood when the case came on for trial before the jury, the only question presented for determination was as to the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff. Lenney v. Finley, 118 Ga. 427, 45 S. E. 317. The evidence bearing on this question demanded a finding in his favor in some amount, and fully warranted the verdict returned by the jury. Indeed, there is in the defendant's motion for a new trial no complaint that their finding was excessive. The motion raises no question not covered by the foregoing discussion, and no reason appears why the company should have been granted a new trial.

On the argument before us, counsel for the company called attention to the fact that the return of service originally made by the sheriff was not such as would authorize the entering of a judgment of default at the first term of the case; and, in this connection, counsel insisted the company should have been permitted to file its defense, inasmuch as the judgment of default was to be treated as a mere nullity. But we cannot undertake to pass upon this matter, as no question of this kind appears to have been raised in the trial court, and certain it is that there is in the bill of exceptions no assignment of error which brings the matter under review.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

BROWN v. RAWLINGS.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—CLAIM CASE—EVIDENCE—USURY.

1. Where one who was the sole devisee under a will and executor thereof undertook to convey, with covenant of warranty, realty of which his testatrix died seised and possessed, designating himself as grantor, and executing the deed in his own name, such conveyance was properly admitted in evidence as his personal deed, notwithstanding the recital therein that "this sale is made by me to pay the indebtedness of [the testatrix], I being the executor of the will, and to clear the estate of debts it is necessary to make this sale."

2. Where, in a claim case, the claimant relied upon such a conveyance, the duly probated will of the testatrix was admissible in evidence to show that the grantor in the deed was the executor and sole devisee. Evidence that he had paid all the debts of the testatrix from the proceeds of such sale was also admissible. While, as an abstract proposition, this evidence was admissible, its introduction in the present case simply established a fact which neither party to the issue on trial was in a position to dispute.

3. There was evidence sufficient to authorize a finding that the security deed from the defendant to the plaintiff was made as a part of an usurious contract, and therefore was void.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by R. W. Brown against R. B. Jackson. Judgment for plaintiff was levied on certain realty, and C. G. Rawlings interposed a claim. Judgment for claimant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Evans & Evans, for plaintiff in error. B. T. Rawlings, T. W. Hardwick, and Rawlings & Howard, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. An execution in favor of R. W. Brown against R. B. Jackson was levied upon certain realty, to which C. G. Rawlings interposed his claim. When the claim case came on for trial, the claimant made the following written admission in open court, and assumed the burden: "Claimant admits that on the 3d day of May, 1895, the premises levied on * * * were conveyed to the plaintiff in fi. fa. as security for debt, and that at the time of said conveyance said defendant in fi. fa. had a legal title to said premises, and was in possession of same; that the debt secured by said conveyance was regularly reduced to judgment, with a special lien upon said premises, and the execution proceeding in the case * * * was regularly issued thereon; and that before the levy in this case was made the plaintiff in fi. fa. had filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of Washington superior court an escrow deed to defendant in fi. fa., in accordance with the provisions of section 2724 of the Civil Code 1895." The claimant put in evidence the will of Sarah L. Jackson, duly probated in January, 1895, in which it appeared that R. B. Jackson was the sole legatee of the testatrix, and that he was nominated as her only executor; also a warranty deed from R. B. Jackson to Wilson R. Rawlings, conveying the land in question, dated November 5, 1895; also a warranty deed subsequently executed by Wilson R. Rawlings to C. G. Rawlings, conveying the same property. There was also evidence in behalf of the claimant from which the jury could find that there was usury in the debt secured by the deed from Jackson to Brown. There was a verdict finding the property not subject. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

1. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in admitting, over the objection of the plaintiff in execution, the deed from Jackson to Wilson R. Rawlings. This was an ordinary warranty deed in the usual form, except that following the description of the property conveyed, and immediately preceding the habendum clause, there was this recital: "This sale is made by me to pay the indebtedness of Miss N. L. Jackson, I being the executor of the will; and to clear the estate of debts it is necessary to make this sale." The deed recited that R. B. Jackson was the party of the first part, and it was signed "R. B. Jackson." The objection urged to its admissibility was that it appeared on its face to be an executor's deed, and that no authority was shown, either in the will or by an order from the court of ordinary, for the executor to sell the property. We do not think that the objection was well taken, as, in our opinion, the deed was not an executor's deed, but was the personal deed of R. B. Jackson. Where the grantor acts in a trust relation, it should appear that the conveyance is made by him in his representative capacity, "for, unless apt words are used to transfer the title from the real party in interest, the deed, though it be signed by the trustee or executor, and designates him as such, will be held to be his own personal deed." 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 210, citing Bobb v. Barnum, 59 Mo. 394. In the deed under consideration there are no words of conveyance which indicate a purpose on the part of the grantor to convey the title as executor, and the deed is not even signed by him as executor. In Endsley v. Strock, 50 Mo. 508, it was held that where an heir undertook to convey inherited land, and described himself as agent for the heirs of the decedent in one part of the deed, but in the other portions designated himself as grantor, and executed the deed in his own name, the conveyance was admissible in evidence as his own deed. While the recital in the deed under consideration states that the grantor is executor of the will of Miss Jackson, it seems that his intention was to sell the property as his own, he being the sole legatee under her will, and with the proceeds of the sale to discharge the debts against her estate. But, granting that his intention was to sell the property as executor, he did not accomplish that purpose by executing a conveyance as an individual. In this connection, see Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 278, 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep 420.

2. The motion for a new trial further complained that the court erred in admitting in evidence the will of Miss Jackson, over the objection of the plaintiff that it was irrelevant, because it conferred no authority upon the executor to sell the property belonging to the estate; and that the court also erred in permitting the witness B. T. Rawlings to testify that, as the representative of R. B. Jackson, he had, with the proceeds of the sale of the land in question by Jackson to Wilson Rawlings, paid all the indebtedness of the estate of Miss Jackson. While, for reasons which will presently appear, we do not think it was necessary for the claimant to introduce this evidence, it was clearly not subject to the objection urged against it by the plaintiff. As an abstract proposition, it was admissible, but its introduction simply proved something which needed no proof. As we have ruled that the deed from Jackson to Wilson Rawlings was not an execu-tor's deed, it is immaterial whether the will conferred any power upon the executor to sell the property or not. The will did devise the property to R. B. Jackson, and it was admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing this. While there is no positive and direct evidence in the record that the land levied upon and claimed ever belonged to Miss Jackson, the deed from R. B. Jackson to Wilson Rawlings contained recitals which might be construed into an admission by the grantor that this was true. These recitals were as follows: "The lot herein conveyed is fully set out and described in a deed of conveyance from Wm. Watkins to Miss N. L. Jackson, recorded in Book H of Deeds, clerk superior court Washington county, Dec. 18th, 1885. This sale is made by me to pay the indebtedness of Miss N. L. Jackson, I being executor of the will," etc. The will was therefore admissible in evidence both for the purpose of showing that R. B. Jackson was the sole legatee of Miss Jackson and for the purpose of showing that he was the executor of her will; and the testimony of B. T. Rawlings that all the debts of the estate had been paid with the proceeds of the sale of the land by R. B. Jackson to Wilson Rawlings was also admissible. If the land belonged to Miss Jackson, and she devised it to R. B. Jackson, and he was the executor of her will, no one but creditors of her estate could object to his selling the land as an individual, instead of as executor; and if he took the proceeds of such sale, and fully satisfied all such creditors, even they could not attack the validity of the sale. When Jackson executed and delivered the deed to Rawlings, he certainly conveyed to the latter whatever interest in the land he had at that time. If he then had an interest as sole legatee under the will of Miss Jackson, such interest passed to Rawlings; and when the debts of her estate were all paid the unincumbered title vested in Rawlings. But, aside from this, neither the plaintiff in execution nor the claimant was in a position to deny that R. B. Jackson had held the legal title to the land. The plaintiff was seeking to subject the land as the property of R. B. Jackson under a judgment against him which had been made a special lien on this land by virtue of a security deed given by Jackson to the plaintiff, while the claimant was claiming under a deed from Jackson to Wilson Rawlings. It was admitted that the legal title was in Jackson at the time he executed the security deed to the plaintiff in execution. One side made this admission and the other relied upon it. Neither could deny it. So we do not see how the admission in evidence of the will of Miss Jackson could have hurt the plaintiff or benefited the claimant. The effect of the admission being that the legal title was out of the estate of Miss Jackson and in R. B. Jackson at the time he made the security deed to the plaintiff, and his individual deed to Rawlings being made subsequently to that date, we do not see how the will of Miss Jackson could injure one side or benefit the other. As both parties were relying upon Jackson's title, it was unnecessary for either to prove title in him. Rogers v. Bates, 19 Ga. 545.

3. As the case was submitted to the jury, the question for them to consider and determine was whether there was usury in the consideration of the security deed from the defendant in execution, Jackson, to the plaintiff in execution, Brown. If there was, this deed, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2892, was void, and, as the plaintiff's judgment was obtained after Jackson had conveyed the property to Wilson Rawlings, and he having conveyed it to the claimant, the verdict finding the property not subject to the plaintiff's execution naturally followed. As there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the deed from Jackson to Brown was infected with usury, the verdict was not without evidence to support it.

NORTHINGTON-MUNGER PRATT CO. v. FARMERS' GIN & WAREHOUSE CO.

SALE—CONTRACT—FAILURE TO DELIVER—PAYMENT.

1. One may contract to convey property in the future conditionally upon his being able to acquire title thereto.

2. If he contracts absolutely to convey property not then owned by him, he will be liable in damages for a breach, even if he is not able to secure the same so as to make delivery.

3. A written offer of $1,000 for a described gin outfit, and "to pay for same upon the other party giving possession and a good title," when duly accepted, is an absolute contract of bargain and sale, and not conditional upon the vendor being able to acquire title so as to make delivery.

4. Under such contract the purchaser was bound to pay if, within a reasonable time, the vendor delivered the property and tendered good title thereto.

5. The seller was bound within a reasonable time to tender such title and make delivery.

6. If the impossibility of making title would prevent a decree for specific performance, it would not prevent the vendee from recovering damages for a breach.

7. If the vendor sold to a third person, and thereby disabled itself to convey according to the terms of the contract, it would be liable in damages.

8. The pleading, correspondence, and evidence established the agency and terms of the sale. The evidence sustained the verdict as to the quantum of damages, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' Gin & Warehouse Company against the Northington-Munger Pratt Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Northington-Munger Pratt Company sold a cotton gin outfit to Freeman & Williamson for $1,500, payable in installments, retaining title until the purchase money was paid. The first note fell due December, 1899, and after the default had continued for about a month the company instructed Baker, their agent, to get possession of the gin outfit and sell. He notified Bates, president of the Farmers' Gin & Warehouse Company, of the default, and that he had to retake the gin, and thereupon negotiated for a sale of the gin plant to the Farmers' Company. It offered $1,000. The offer was reported by wire to the Northington Company, which instructed Baker forthwith to accept the same. Thereupon the terms of the contract were reduced to writing, by which Bates, as president, offered "1,000 for the gin outfit, including the house located at Rover, and will pay for same upon the Northington Company giving possession and a good title to the same." This offer was marked "accepted," and signed by Baker for the Northington Company. Soon thereafter Baker demanded possession of the gin from Freeman & Williamson, who declined to surrender the same, explaining that one of the members of the firm was willing to pay his proportion of the purchase price, while the other was not. After further negotiations, Freeman, for $1,250, took a transfer of the purchase-money notes, and took or retained the gin. Baker and the Northington Company reported these facts, and the refusal of Freeman & Williamson to deliver, in explanation of their failure and refusal to comply with the contract with the Farmers' Company, and insisted that the sale was not absolute, but conditional on the Northington Company obtaining possession from Freeman & Williamson, and being able to make good title. The Farmers' Company brought suit for damages. The judge of the superior court instructed the jury that the contract of sale was binding, that the breach was established, that the Northington Company could not sell to Freeman and then use that as the legal excuse for failure to comply with the agreement, and instructed the jury that the only question for their consideration was the amount of the damages. The jury found a verdict for $750 for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts to the refusal to grant a new trial.

C. J. Lester and W. W. Lambdin, for plaintiff in error. Thos. F. Corrigan and Jas. L. Mayson, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. There was no plea of the statute of frauds, and the pleadings of the defendant, as well as the correspondence, written contract, and undisputed evidence, leave no room to question the making of the contract on the terms stated or the authority of the agent to sell. The offer and acceptance made a complete contract, the obligation of each furnishing a sufficient consideration for that of the other. Civ. Code 1895, § 3661. The defendant insists that, construed in the light of the circumstances when the contract was made, it appears that the acceptance was with full knowledge by the buyer that the vendor was not in possession of the gin, and that it would be obliged to secure the property before it could comply. One cannot make good title to that which he does not own. But that does not prevent him from contracting to convey property to be acquired by him in the future. He may make the obligation conditional upon his being able to acquire title from some one else (Lacy v. Hall, 37 Pa. 360; Forsyth v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28; Civ. Code 1895, § 3537); but, if he contracts absolutely, he will be bound by the terms of his agreement. And even if, because of the want of title, a decree for specific performance could not be rendered, this would not deprive the purchaser of his right to damages for the breach. Here the contract was not conditional. The offer to buy and the acceptance were absolute. The only uncertainty was as to the time when the payment should be made. That, instead of being fixed by the date of the month, was postponed until the vendor made a good title and delivered possession. The 'Farmers' Company was bound to pay $1,000 for the gin outfit, if within a reasonable time the seller tendered a good title and made delivery. On the other hand, the Northington Company was bound within a reasonable time to tender such title and surrender possession. If a destruction of the property sold, or other fact, had operated to release the vendor from its liability under the contract, it is elementary that the Northington Company could not sell the gin to Freeman, and claim that it had become impossible to comply with its agreement. It could not disable itself, and then take advantage of its own wrong when sued for the consequent breach. Civ. Code 1895, § 3725; Pomeroy on Contracts, Specific Per. (2d Ed.) § 475. There was evidence to sustain the verdict as to the amount of the damages.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

RIDDLE v. SHEPPARD.

PROCESSIONERS—POSSESSION OF LAND—CLAIM OF RIGHT—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—EVIDENCE.

1. The possession which the Civ. Code 1895, § 3248, requires processioneers to respect is a possession existing at the time the lines are marked.

2. There was evidence to authorize the judge to submit to the jury the question as to whether the protestant had not abandoned possession of the land in controversy before the institution by him of proceedings for the appointment of processioneers.

3. An assignment of error that a specified portion of a charge is erroneous because "misleading," without stating in what way it was calculated to mislead the jury, is too general to be considered.

4. Mere naked possession, with no intention of asserting ownership, is not such actual possession under a claim of right as is contemplated by Civ. Code 1895, § 3248.

5. The evidence, though conflicting, was sufficient to authorize the verdict, and there was no error requiring the granting of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Application by W. H. Riddle against C. H. Sheppard for a processioneing. From the judgment, applicant brings error. Affirmed.

E. W. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Rawlings & Howard, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was a case of processioneing. Riddle, the applicant, being dissatisfied with the return of the processioneers, filed a protest as to the line marked between his land and that of Sheppard. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the line as marked by the processioneers, and Riddle complains that the court erred in overruling his motion for a new trial. There was ample evidence to sustain the finding, and the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial will not be interfered with, unless there was some error of law which was prejudicial to the rights of the losing party.

1. In one part of the charge the judge instructed the jury that if Riddle, "at the time of the processioneing, was in actual possession of any part" of the property in controversy, such possession should have been respected by the processioneers, and a line run otherwise should be set aside; and in another part of the charge instructed the jury to determine "whether or not, at the time of the survey, Mr. Riddle was in actual possession of the land under a claim of right." The error assigned upon these charges is that in one the possession is limited to the time of the processioneing and in the other to the time of the survey, whereas actual possession prior to the institution of the proceeding for processioneing should be respected, although such possession may have terminated before the institution of the proceeding. We do not think there was any error in these charges. The Code declares: "Where actual possession has been had, under a claim of right, for more than seven years, such claim shall be respected, and the lines so marked as not to interfere with such possession." Civ. Code 1895, § 3248. The possession referred to in this section is undoubtedly a possession existing at the time the line is marked by the processioneers. This is clearly inferable from the concluding words of the section, "and the lines so marked as not to interfere with such possession"; that is, not to interfere with the possession which the processioneers and the surveyor find existing at the time the line is marked. The processioneers are not required to investigate into any question growing out of a claim of possession prior to the time the lines are to be marked, but they are to respect the possession as they find it at that time. See, in this connection, Bowen v. Jackson, 101 Ga. 817, 29 S. E. 40; Amoss v. Parker, 88 Ga. 754, 16 S. E. 200.

2. Complaint is made that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question as to whether Riddle had not abandoned possession of the land in controversy. There was sufficient evidence to authorize this issue to be submitted. It appeared that the land of an estate had been divided by partitioners; that Riddle acquired a portion of the land as an heir of the deceased; and that Sheppard acquired another portion, adjoining the lot of Riddle, by purchase from one of the heirs. It seems to have been agreed between Riddle and Sheppard that the true line between them was a line which had been drawn by Clark, a surveyor, and was known as the "Clark line"; that Riddle had placed his fence upon what he claimed was the Clark line, and had maintained it there for seven years or more; that Sheppard claimed that the fence was not upon the Clark line, and that Riddle was in possession of a portion of Sheppard's land. This controversy resulted in an application by Sheppard for the appointment of processioneers. When Riddle was notified of this application, and before any action was taken on the same, he moved the fence from the line on which it had been maintained back to what was claimed by Sheppard to be the Clark line. When this was done, Sheppard dismissed his application for the appointment of processioneers. We think this evidence was sufficient to shew, prima facie, an abandonment of the land in controversy. Riddle's explanation of his conduct that he did not intend to abandon the possession, but merely to move his fence in order to save the rails in the event the controversy in regard to the line was decided against him, and that he had continued to cultivate the land after the fence was moved back, was for the consideration of the jury, in connection with the other evidence, in determining whether there had been such an abandonment of the possession, prior to the time that the lines were marked by the processioneers, as to require them to treat the land as being no longer in the actual possession of Riddle.

3-5. Error is assigned upon the following charge: "If Mr. Riddle, at the time of the processioning, was in possession of said land, with no intention of asserting his occupancy beyond the limits of the survey made in the partition of the Seney Ann Riddle land, such possession would not interfere with the processioneers remarking the lines made by the partitioners in that division." Error is assigned upon this charge on the ground that it is "misleading" and misstates the law. As the assignment does not state in what way the charge is misleading, that part of it is too general to be considered. The only question, therefore, to be determined is whether the charge complained of contains a proposition of law which is sound in the abstract; the assignment of error containing no suggestion that the charge is inapplicable to the facts of the case. Properly construed, this charge states simply that, if Mr. Riddle was in possession of the land in controversy, with no intention on his part to set up this possession as evidence of ownership, the possession was not of that character which the processioneers were required to recognize in marking the lines. When so construed, we think it embodies a correct and sound proposition of law. The possession that the processioneers are required to recognize is a possession under a claim of right, and a possession by one who has no intention whatever of making a claim of ownership resulting from such possession is not a possession under a claim of right. It is not actual possession alone that the processioneers are bound to respect, but it is actual possession accompanied with a claim of ownership; and when it appears to them that one having a mere naked possession is not asserting ownership the possession is not of that character which the law requires them to respect in marking the lines. Nothing here said is in conflict with the ruling in Christian v. Weaver, 79 Ga. 406, 7 S. E. 261. In that case the coterminous proprietors agreed that one should hold up to a certain boundary, and that holding continued for more than seven years under a claim of right. The case was not dealing with permissive possession under the law of prescription, but the permission referred to was the permission or consent involved in the agreement which the coterminous proprietors entered into, by which one was permitted to hold up to a certain boundary.

It is not necessary, under our view of the case, to discuss the question as to what would be the effect of a possession under a claim of right, but under a mistake of fact as to the location of the true line. Whether such possession would be adverse possession is a question upon which there is a decided difference of opinion among courts of respectable standing. See Buswell on Limitations and Adverse Possession, § 250; Preble v. Central R. Co., 85 Me. 260, 27 Atl. 147, 21 L. R. A. 829, and notes, 35 Am. St. Rep. 306; Tiffany's Mod. Law of Real Prop. § 443, p. 1014. Our own decisions do not seem to be in accord with each other on this question. There are decisions which appear to hold that possession under a mistake of fact as to the identity of the land or the location of the boundary is not such adverse possession as will, after seven years, ripen into a prescriptive title, where the claim of prescription is set up under color. See Riley v. Griffin, 16 Ga. 141, 60 Am. Dec. 726; Keel v. Pace, 20 Ga. 190; Howard v. Reedy, 29 Ga. 152, 74 Am. Dec. 58. In Shiels v. Roberts, 64 Ga. 370, there was a distinct ruling that possession under a mistake of fact as to the true boundary was such an adverse possession as would, in 20 years, ripen into a title. We find no reason for reversing the judgment.

PEAVY v. McDONALD.

REFERENCE—ORDER TO FILE REPORT—EXCEPTIONS—JURISDICTION.

1. When, by an order of court referring a case to an auditor, he is directed to make his report at or before the next term of the court, and by subsequent orders duly passed the time within which he is authorized to file his report is limited to a given date, he is without power thereafter to act in the premises, his control over the case having become exhausted under the express terms of the orders conferring upon him jurisdiction over the same.

2. As the office of exceptions to an auditor's report is to assign reasons why it should not be adopted and made, the judgment of the court, the point that the auditor at the time he filed his report had lost all control over the case may, under the liberal practice which obtains in this state, be raised by way of an exception to his report, though the better practice would seem to be to, present an independent objection to its consideration by the court by way of a motion to disregard it, based on the ground that it amounted to a mere nullity, and should be treated as such.

3. That counsel for each of the parties may, after the time within which the auditor was authorized to make his report had expired, have requested him to file the same notwithstanding, "as each party was anxious to dispose of the case," did not have the effect of conferring upon the auditor jurisdiction to do so, nor estop either party from subsequently objecting to the consideration of the report, it not being within the power of the parties to waive his want of jurisdiction over the case, and the conduct of counsel not being such as to mislead either party, or to deprive him of any right which he otherwise might have asserted.

DIERKS v. SMITH.

WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—ADMINISTRATION—OBJECTIONS.

1. Where the only ruling complained of in the bill of exceptions is based on technical objections to the pleadings in the court below, and it appears as a matter of necessary inference that no evidence was introduced on the trial, the writ of error will not be dismissed on the ground that the certificate of the trial judge "does not state that the bill of exceptions contains or specifies all of the evidence necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of."

2. One who has acquired by purchase the entire interest of an heir in the estate of a deceased person, and who is interested in preventing the waste incident upon an unnecessary administration, may object, upon proper grounds, to the grant of letters of administration by the ordinary; and this is true though the objecting party be neither an heir nor a creditor of the estate.

Error from Superior Court, Campbell County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Petition of T. J. Smith for appointment as administrator of James M. Lofton. A. J. Dierks filed a caveat. From a judgment dismissing the caveat, the caveator brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Longino, for plaintiff in error. J. F. Golightly, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. On October 6, 1902, T. J. Smith filed in the court of ordinary of Campbell county a petition alleging that on February 21, 1875, James M. Lofton died, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property of the probable value of $1,500; that under the law it was necessary that the estate should be administered; and that the petitioner, by written agreement of the heirs, had been selected as administrator. The petition prayed for his appointment accordingly. Dierks filed objections to the grant of letters of administration, averring that the estate of Lofton owed no debts; that the property consisted mainly, if not entirely, of 100 acres of land; that there were five shares of the estate, and five distributees, all of whom were of full age; and that no administration was necessary for the purpose of distribution. He further set up that one share of the estate, consisting of a one-fifth undivided interest in the 100 acres of land referred to, which was the interest of W. H. Lofton, one of the original distributees, had been purchased by him, and that the estate could be divided in kind. By amendment he averred that by reason of his purchase of the interest of W. H. Lofton he had the same right to object to the appointment of an administrator that W. H. Lofton would have had. The ordinary granted the application, and appointed Smith administrator, whereupon the caveator appealed to the superior court. On the call of the case in that court Dierks further amended by averring that the estate of J. M. Lofton consisted entirely of the 100 acres referred to in the original caveat. A motion was then made by counsel for Smith to dismiss the caveat on the ground that Dierks was neither an heir nor a creditor of the decedent, and therefore had no right to object to the appointment of an administrator. This motion was sustained, and the caveat excepted.

1. On the call of the case in this court a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the certificate of the trial judge to the bill of exceptions "does not state that the bill of exceptions contains or specifies all of the evidence necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of." As it affirmatively appears that the ruling sought to be reviewed was based on technical objections to the pleadings, and as there could not have been any evidence introduced after the striking of the caveat and dismissal of the appeal, the motion to dismiss is entirely without merit.

2. On the merits of the case the sole question presented for our determination is whether or not the caveator, Dierks, had such an interest in the estate of Lofton as to give him the right to object to the appointment of an administrator. It is worthy of note that more than 27 years had elapsed after the death of J. M. Lofton before the filing of the petition in this case. From the caveat as amended it appears that Dierks is the owner by purchase of one-fifth of the entire estate. There is no question that under our law a caveat to an application for letters of administration must show that the caveator is interested in the estate, and in Williams v. Williams, 118 Ga. 1006, 39 S. E. 474, it was held that, "in order for one to be heard in a proceeding before the ordinary for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of a deceased person, he must show that he has an interest in the choice of an administrator, either as heir or creditor of the deceased"; and that "a claim to own the property named in the petition for administration is not sufficient; some interest on the part of the objector in the assets and their distribution must appear." The reason of this rule, as was explained by Mr. Justice Cobb in Towner v. Griffin, 115 Ga. 966, 42 S. E. 262, is "that a mere interloper should not be allowed to interfere where a proper application has been made for letters of administration upon the estate. A person who is not concerned in any way in the question should, of course, not be heard before the court." We are clear that in the case at bar Dierks is not an interloper. He is vitally interested. He stands in the shoes of W. H. Lofton, who, as one of the children of J. M. Lofton, was entitled to one-fifth of the estate, which, according to the amended caveat, consisted entirely of the 100 acres in question. It is further claimed that the five persons interested are all sui juris, and can, without expense, divide the estate among themselves. Dierks having acquired all the interest that W. H. Lofton had in the estate, he has every right that Lofton would have had to come in and object to the waste which it is averred is threatened.

There is nothing in any of the cases cited by counsel for the applicant which is contrary to this view. Tanner v. Huss, 80 Ga. 614, 6 S. E. 18, was a contest for appointment as administrator between Huss, a creditor, who had been nominated by other creditors, and Tanner, who was the heir of an heir to the estate. It was held merely that Tanner, not being a creditor, could not be nominated by the creditors to administer; and that Huss, who was nominated by other creditors, being himself a creditor, was eligible for appointment. Tanner, in addition to being supported by some of the creditors, was supported also by the divorced husband of the intestate; but the latter was not himself an heir of the intestate, his only interest in the estate being as heir of an heir. Nor is there anything in the case of Augusta R. Co. v. Peacock, 56 Ga. 146, which is in conflict with what is now held. In that case Peacock applied for letters of administration on the estate of his nephew, a child two years old, who was killed by the Augusta & Summerville Railroad Company, the petition alleging that the deceased had personal property in the county of Richmond. The railroad company objected on the ground that the deceased left no creditors in Georgia, nor any property at all; that he was killed by the railroad company without negligence; that the entire estate of the deceased consisted of a claim for damages for this homicide, and that the administrator would have no cause of action for that. The case was tried on appeal, when the applicant demurred to the objections, insisting that the railroad company could not be heard. This demurrer was sustained, and the judgment was affirmed on writ of error, this court holding that apprehension of suit by an administrator when appointed would not authorize a person to appear as a party in the court of ordinary to resist the grant of letters; and that, "before one can be heard as a party to the proceeding before the ordinary, he must show that he has an interest in the choice of administrator, either as heir or creditor; some interest on the part of the objector in the assets and their distribution must appear." Clearly, under the averments of the caveat in this case, Dierks has a one-fifth interest in the assets of the estate, and he is interested in not having them wasted by an unnecessary administration.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LANDLORD AND CROPPER—TITLE TO CROPS—LABORER'S LIEN.

1. Where, under the terms of a contract between an owner of land and another, who agrees to cultivate it on shares, the relation of landlord and cropper is created, the title to all crops grown on the land remains in the landlord until there has been an actual division and settlement whereby he receives in full his share of the produce. Civ. Code 1895, § 3131; Wadley v. Williams, 75 Ga. 272; Almand v. Scott & Co., 4

¶ 1. See Landlord and Tenant, vol. 22, Cent. Dig. § 1268.

S. E. 892, 80 Ga. 95, 12 Am. St. Rep. 241. That the cropper furnishes the labor necessary to the making of the crops, and is to receive a portion thereof as compensation for his services, does not place him in the situation of a partner having an undivided interest in the product of his labor. Padgett v. Ford, 43 S. E. 1002, 117 Ga. 510, and cases cited. So, if the owner of the land wrongfully refuses to comply with his obligations in the premises, the remedy of the cropper is to assert a laborer's lien on the crops grown by him (McElmurray v. Turner, 12 S. E. 359, 86 Ga. 215); for he cannot maintain against the landlord an action of trover, the title to the crops being in the latter (Bryant v. Pugh, 12 S. E. 927, 86 Ga. 525, 529).

2. In no view of the evidence in the present case was the plaintiff entitled to prevail in the action of bail trover brought against the defendants; and, this being so, the court below erred in not setting aside, on certiorari, the verdict returned against them in the city court wherein the suit was instituted.

RAY v. ANDERSON.

ACTION ON NOTE—TITLE OF HOLDER—PURCHASE-MONEY NOTE—DEFENSES—PLACE OF PAYMENT—INTEREST—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. The defendant in a suit on a promissory note cannot inquire into the title of the holder, unless it is necessary for his protection, or to let in the defense which he seeks to make. Civ. Code 1895, § 3698.

(a) Under section 5432 of the Civil Code of 1895 the assignee or holder of a note given for the purchase money of land may, in appropriate proceedings, subject the land to his debt. Hence, in a suit brought on promissory notes of the character mentioned, and payable to named persons or bearer, it is not a good defense that title to the notes has (since the passage of the act of 1894, codified in the section above cited) been transferred without indorsement to other persons, and an amendment to a plea seeking to set up this defense, and claiming that the alleged owners of the notes would not, in a suit against the defendant, be entitled to a lien against the land for the purchase money of which the notes were given, was properly disallowed.

(b) Nor can the defendant, in defense to an ordinary common-law suit on a promissory note, set up a claim arising ex delicto. Hecht v. Snook, 114 Ga. 923, 41 S. E. 74, and authorities cited. The fact that the defendant might have this right in an equitable proceeding which has not been instituted will not avail him as a defense to a pending suit at law.

2. Statement of the place of payment in a promissory note does not affect the liability of the maker. "It is the duty of such party to come and pay." Bigelow, Bills, Notes & Checks (2d Ed.) 35. Therefore, in a suit on a note in which no place of payment was stipulated, evidence that the payee resided in Chicago, and that the contract was to pay the note in that city, was properly excluded as immaterial. It was also immaterial that one of the payees was sui juris.

3. The interest on the debt sued for was properly computed. Ray v. Pease, 97 Ga. 618, 25 S. E. 360. The amendment to the defendant's plea, for reasons set out in the first headnote, was properly disallowed. A finding for the plaintiff was, under the undisputed evidence, legally necessary, and the direction by the trial judge of the verdict complained of will not be held error.

KENNESAW GUANO CO. v. WAPPOO MILLS et al.

FACTORS—CONVERSION—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

1. Where goods have been delivered to an agent to be sold by him on commission, and he subsequently, from time to time, ships varying quantities of the same, along with similar goods of his own, to numerous customers, without in any instance keeping or attempting to keep a record of the quantity, purchase price or destination of such of the goods as belonged to his principal, or of the name of the purchaser thereof, but taking from the purchaser a promissory note covering the price of the entire shipment, such agent is chargeable with at least a technical conversion of his principal's goods, and cannot escape the resulting legal liability to account for the fair market value of the same, irrespective of the motives which actuated him in thus indiscriminately dealing with the goods sold as though they belonged exclusively to himself. Mechem on Agency, § 529; Hobbs v. Chicago Packing Co., 25 S. E. 584, 98 Ga. 576, 58 Am. St. Rep. 320.

2. Though the contract between the principal and his agent may have stipulated that the latter was not to be held responsible for the price of goods sold to such of his customers as might not be solvent, and that, as to all sales of the principal's goods of more than a specified quantity, he and his agent were to equally divide the excess over the minimum price at which all orders were to be filled, yet, before the agent could avail himself of these stipulations, he would have to successfully carry the burden of showing which of the customers to whom he sold goods of his principal were insolvent, and in what quantities the goods were sold. Clafin v. Continental Works, 11 S. E. 721, 85 Ga. 28 (4), 47.

3. Under the undisputed acts of the present case, as disclosed by the report of the auditor to whom it was referred with a view to bringing about an accounting between the parties, the defendant company was liable for an amount greater than that for which a decree was entered against it in the court below; and the judge of that court did not commit any error which was prejudicial to that company, either in his rulings upon the questions raised by the exceptions of law to the auditor's report or in ordering an accounting upon an equitable basis more favorable to the defendant than it had any right, under the strict terms of the law governing its liability, to demand or expect.

APPEAL—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY.

Action by Curry, Arrington & Co. against E. J. Friar. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order overruling a certiorari, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. Alexander and J. Z. Jackson, for plaintiff in error. Hendricks & Harrison, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The trial of a case in a justice's court having resulted adversely to the plaintiffs, they entered an appeal to a jury in the same court. A motion was made to dismiss this appeal on the ground that it had been filed by the attorney at law of the appellants, and that he had failed to file any written authority to do so, or to show a ratification by the appellants. This motion was overruled, and a verdict found for the plaintiffs. Upon certiorari, complaint was made of the overruling of this motion. The judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari, and the plaintiff in certiorari excepted.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 4457, "an appeal may be entered by the plaintiff or defendant in person, or by his attorney at law or in fact, and, if by the latter, he must be authorized in writing, which authority shall be filed," etc. "Under this section an appeal can be entered only by the party, his attorney at law, or his attorney in fact; and it is essential to the validity of an appeal entered by an attorney in fact that the authority to enter the appeal should be in writing and filed." Lovelady v. Franklin Davis Nursery Co., 113 Ga. 326, 38 S. E. 748. The requirement as to written authority is very clearly applicable to attorneys in fact only, and not to attorneys at law. The latter are also given express authority by Civ. Code, § 4417, to bind their clients in entering appeals. See, also, section 4428. That an attorney at law may enter an appeal without written authority thus clearly appears, and the judgment below must be affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

HARP v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

CARRIERS—EXPULSION OF PASSENGER—LOST TICKET—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. As many tickets entitle the bearer to transportation, they might be used by the finder, with the result that two could ride for one fare, if the carrier were required to carry a passenger who has lost the ticket purchased by him.

2. A passenger who loses his ticket has no right to be carried upon making or offering to make proof that the one paid for has been lost. The loss falls on him, and not on the carrier.

3. It affirmatively appears from the allegations of the petition that the plaintiff neither had paid nor offered to pay the fare. On his failure to produce a ticket, he was lawfully evicted.

4. Where a petition has been dismissed on general demurrer, and the judgment thereon has been affirmed, there is nothing to amend by; nor do the facts here call for the exercise of any discretionary power by this court to grant an order allowing the plaintiff to amend before the entry of the remittitur in the trial court.

Error from Superior Court, Clayton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by E. D. Harp, by his next friend, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Harp, a minor of 16, sued the Southern Railway Company for a wrongful ejection. He alleges that he bought a ticket entitling him to ride from Atlanta to Topeka Junction, in Upson county, on the line of defendant's road, passing through Clayton; that while on the rear platform of the train an employé of the company asked him how far he was going, whereupon the plaintiff showed him the ticket; that the employé looked at it and handed it back to the plaintiff, when the ticket was blown out of plaintiff's hands; that shortly thereafter the conductor asked the plaintiff for his ticket, and he, in the presence of the employé, explained the circumstances of its loss, the employé corroborating his statement; that notwithstanding this fact the conductor ordered the plaintiff to leave the train, and put his hand on him for the purpose of removing plaintiff from the moving car, and, to prevent being violently ejected, the plaintiff leaped from the car, running at from 10 to 15 miles an hour, about half a mile before reaching Riverdale; that, when plaintiff handed the ticket to the employé, he thought the latter was the conductor; that he was compelled to walk to Atlanta, 14 or 15 miles; that there were few passengers for Topeka, and that it would have been easy on arriving at Riverdale for the conductor to have telegraphed to Atlanta, and verified petitioner's statement that he had purchased the ticket to the station named; that petitioner was young and unaccustomed to travel, and did not have sufficient money to pay his fare from Atlanta to Topeka at the time a ticket was demanded; and that the manner of his ejection was aggravated by the threats and commands of the conductor. The defendant demurred generally and specially, on the grounds that there was no cause of action set out; that the petition was duplicitous; that it was uncertain whether the action was for an illegal eviction, or for an abuse of duty in a lawful eviction. After argument the court passed an order rectifying that "the plaintiff admitted that the suit was only for the wrongful expulsion, and that the company had a regulation authorizing conductors to eject passengers who neither paid fare or produced a ticket," and directing that the general demurrer to the original and amended petition be sustained, and the case dismissed. In plaintiff's brief, he requests that, if the judgment be affirmed, leave be granted him to amend by alleging that the conductor failed to demand the cash fare.

M. D. Womble and W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, Arthur Heyman, and J. B. Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. This suit was for wrongful expulsion, and not for damages inflicted upon the plaintiff as a result of his being compelled to alight from a moving train. The fact that one actually purchased a ticket, and that this was known to the agent who sold it, or to the gatekeeper who examined or to employes on the train who saw it, would not relieve the passenger of the obligation to surrender it to the conductor. Tickets vary in their terms. Some are good only on certain trains; others only on particular dates; others require validation. The mere fact that the plaintiff has a ticket does not, therefore, necessarily establish his right to be transported on a given train. These matters must be passed on by the conductor, and not by other employes who are not charged with this duty by the company. When the conductor makes his demand, he is entitled to have the ticket surrendered. He cannot be required to hear evidence or investigate the bona fides of the passenger's excuse for its nondelivery, nor to wait until he arrives at the next station, and, by telegraphic correspondence with the selling agent, undertake to verify the correctness of the plaintiff's statement, or determine the character and validity of the ticket sold. It is manifest that such course would necessarily give rise to delay, and seriously interfere with the operation of trains and the rights of the traveling public. Had the plaintiff's money blown out of his hand, it is evident that his misfortune would have to fall upon himself, and not upon the company. Such loss would not have prevented his lawful eviction. The same result would follow where the ticket itself was lost, for it might have come into the hands of another, and the company might thereby have been compelled to carry two passengers for one fare. Besides, any rule allowing an excuse as a substitute for a ticket would give rise to so much uncertainty and so many possibilities of fraud that the courts have uniformly held that the failure to pay the fare or produce the ticket warrants an eviction. In fact, the plaintiff in error concedes the general rule to be that the passenger must produce his ticket, pay his fare, or suffer expulsion. He insists, however, that the special circumstances take this case out of the general rule. We fail to find any case warranting such a holding. Those cited by him, including Sloane v. Railroad Co. (Cal.) 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193, and Scofield v. Pennsylvania Co., 112 Fed. 455, 50 O. C. A. 553, 58 L. R. A. 224, as well as Pullman P. Co. v. Reed, 75 Ill. 125, 20 Am. Rep. 232, were on facts essentially different. See, on the general subject, L. & N. R. Co. v. Fleming, 14 Lea, 128; Rogers v. Atlantic City R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 34 Atl. 11; Fetter on Carriers, § 279. Compare Southern Ry. Co. v. De Saussure, 116 Ga. 53, 42 S. E. 479; G. S. & F. Ry. Co. v. Asmore, 88 Ga. 529, 15 S. E. 13, 16 L. R. A. 53.

Pleadings are to be more strictly construed against the pleader. Here it affirmatively appears that plaintiff did not have funds with which to pay the cash fare. The general demurrer having been sustained, and the judgment affirmed here, there is nothing to amend by. It is not like the case where the demurrer was overruled in the lower court, and the judgment reversed, nor like the case where the demurrer was sustained or should have been sustained only on a special ground, not concluding the merits. Central R. v. Patterson, 87 Ga. 646, 13 S. E. 525; Savannah Ry. v. Chaney, 102 Ga. 817, 30 S. E. 437; Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153, 48 S. E. 410. There is nothing in the facts here to require the exercise of any discretionary power by this court to permit such amendment.

BANKS—GENERAL DEPOSIT—FAILURE OF BANK—PRIORITIES.

1. One desiring to purchase goods which had been pledged as security for a debt was required by the pledgee, as a condition precedent to the release of the goods, to deposit the purchase price to his account in a named bank, and to "save him harmless in the transaction." Accordingly the purchaser deposited to the credit of the pledgee in the bank designated a draft drawn on a bank in another city for the amount in question. It was known to the officers of the bank first mentioned that the sole purpose of the draft and deposit was to obtain the release of the goods from the custody of the pledgee, but no special instructions were given them in regard to the funds so deposited. The draft was forwarded for collection and was duly paid, but, before the money was returned to the bank in which it was deposited, that bank failed, and was placed in the hands of a receiver. The purchaser of the goods, in accordance with his agreement, paid the amount of the draft to the pledgee, and brought suit against the depository bank. Held, that the deposit to the account of the pledgee was a general, and not a special, deposit, and did not entitle the purchaser, who was subrogated to the rights of the pledgee, to priority over the claims of other general depositors.

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Proceedings between the Schofield Manufacturing Company and T. W. Cochran, receiver of the New South Savings Bank. Judgment for receiver, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. W. Lambdin and Erwin & Callaway, for plaintiff in error. Allen & Tisinger, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The Schofield Manufacturing Company, of Macon, desired to purchase some yarns of a manufacturer in Barnesville. The goods, however, were in the possession of the Barnesville agent of the Export Storage Company, of Cincinnati, who held them as security for a loan, and the consent of that company was necessary to the completion of the sale. A representative of the Schofield Company, who had gone to Barnesville in the interest of his company, drew a draft on a Macon bank for $306.36, the purchase price of the yarns, payable to the order of the cashier of the New South Savings Bank, of Barnesville. The Macon bank having notified the bank in Barnesville by telegraph that the draft would be paid when presented, a duplicate deposit slip was issued to the agent in Barnesville of the Export Storage Company for the amount of the draft. Notwithstanding this deposit, the agent refused to release the goods until express authority to do so was given him by his superiors. The president of the Schofield Company then had a communication by telephone with Black, the Atlanta representative of the Export Storage Company, who seems to have had authority in the matter; and Black agreed to release the yarns, provided the Schofield Company would place the amount of the purchase price to his credit in the New South Savings Bank, and agree to "save him harmless in the transaction." In accordance with this agreement, the president of the Schofield Company directed the president of the New South Savings Bank to transfer the deposit already made to the account of Black, and duplicate deposit slips were accordingly made out for the amount in question in the name of C. H. Black, agent. The purpose of the draft and the deposit seems to have been made known to the president of the Barnesville bank. The draft was forwarded by the New South Savings Bank to its Atlanta correspondent, which in due course forwarded it to Macon, where it was paid; but before the money was returned to Barnesville the New South Savings Bank was placed in the hands of a receiver. The Schofield Manufacturing Company paid Black the amount of the draft, and filed an intervention in the suit against the New South Savings Bank, claiming that the deposit was received while the bank was in an insolvent condition, and known so to be by its officers; that it was a special deposit, in the nature of a bailment, which did not create the relation of debtor and creditor between the parties; and that it was entitled to preference over the creditors of the bank in the payment of the amount of the draft. By agreement the case was heard by the judge without a jury, and it was "ordered, considered, and adjudged that the intervener, the Schofield Manufacturing Company, is not entitled to a preference over the other creditors of the New South Savings Bank in any of the funds in the hands of the receiver, and judgment is therefore rendered in favor of the receiver, T. W. Cochran, on the question of priority; but the intervener, having paid to C. H. Black, agent, the amount of said deposit, is subrogated to the rights of said Black, agent, which are simply to have a general judgment against the New South Savings Bank for the sum of $306.36." The intervener excepted, assigning error on the refusal of the court to give its claim priority over the other claims against the bank.

We are clear that the judgment complained of was in exact accord with the law as applied to the facts disclosed by the record. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the deposit made to Black's account was a special deposit, or even what is sometimes called in banking law a "deposit for a specific purpose." A special deposit is a bailment, and implies a setting apart of the specific money or chattel deposited, to be itself returned on demand. 1 Morse, Banks & Banking (4th Ed.) §§ 191, 193. Plainly, there was no such understanding between the parties in the present case. Nor was the deposit one for a specific purpose, any more than is every general deposit which is made for the specific purpose of having the bank keep the money safely and return it on demand to the one for whose account the deposit was made. No special instructions were given the bank officials as to how, when, or under what circumstances the money deposited was to be paid to Black. From aught that appears, it was to be held subject to his check, and he was at liberty to withdraw it in whole or in part, or to add to it by making other deposits, as he might see fit. The fact that the president of the bank knew that the payment to Black was being made for the sole purpose of releasing the yarns purchased by the plaintiff has no bearing upon the character of the deposit. The reasons which influenced the plaintiff to make the deposit to Black's credit were, in the absence of special instructions on the subject, of not the slightest concern to the bank, and could not alter its relation to Black, or affect the nature of the transaction as a general deposit in the ordinary course of business. Consequently Black became its creditor to the amount of the draft collected, on the same footing with other general depositors of the bank; and the Schofield Manufacturing Company, which, by virtue of its agreement with Black, simply stepped into his shoes, had no right to a preference over the other creditors of the bank. See, on this general subject, Tiedeman v. Imperial Fertilizer Co., 109 Ga. 661, 34 S. E. 999; Ober v. Cochran, 118 Ga. 396, 45 S. E. 382.

In view of this ruling, it is unnecessary to go further and discuss questions argued in the briefs of counsel on the assumption that the deposit was a special one. If it was not a special deposit, it can, of course, make no difference whether the fund in question was sufficiently traced to permit of the judgment prayed for by the plaintiff. We find no error in the judgment rendered by the court below.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except SIMMONS, C. J., disqualified.

BENTLEY et al. v. CRUMMEY & HAMILTON.

LIMITATIONS—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—EJECTMENT—DEED—FORGERY—EVIDENCE.

1. When, in an action of ejectment, the declaration is amended by laying an entirely new demise, the statute of limitations, relatively to the plaintiff's right to recover, runs in favor of the defendant until the date of the filing of such amendment.

2. Where a proceeding in the superior court, brought under our uniform procedure act, is partly legal and partly equitable, the legal branch of the case should be controlled as far as possible by the legal principles which would have applied, had it been the basis of a separate proceeding.

3. Where such a proceeding for both legal and equitable relief embraces what amounts to a suit in ejectment for land, and an amendment is subsequently filed which lays an entirely new demise, such amendment, relatively to the statute of limitations, does not relate back to the date of the filing of the original petition, but should be tried as of the date of the filing of the amendment.

4. Where a deed is introduced in evidence and attacked as a forgery, and it is shown by strong and uncontradicted evidence that the blank on which it is written was printed long after the death of the party by whom the deed purports to have been executed, a finding that such deed is genuine is without evidence to support it, and should be set aside.

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Bentley and others against Crummev & Hamilton. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed in part.

J. W. Haygood and Eldridge Cutts, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Bankston and J. H. Martin, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Wilcox county by William H. Bentley, F. A. Bentley, Mary E. Denison, Roxie A. Lynd, and the children of Elizabeth Higgins, seeking to recover certain lots of land hereinafter designated as lots 11, 12, and 13, to have certain deeds canceled as clouds upon petitioners' title, to recover damages for alleged trespasses upon the land, and to restrain further trespass by the defendants. This petition was amended by "inserting" another lot (No. 10), adopting as to this lot the prayers made in the original petition for the recovery of the other lots and for damages. Upon the trial there was a verdict for the defendants. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence and without evidence to support it. The motion was overruled, and the plaintiffs excepted.

At the outset it may be stated that the defendants did not show a good paper title to the land involved in this case. As to lots 10, 11, and 12, they showed a chain of title from a man who was not shown ever to have had either title or possession. As to lot 13, they introduced deeds showing a chain of title from the state of Georgia, but the deed from the state's grantee was attacked as a forgery, and the evidence was such that the jury could not lawfully have found the deed to be genuine. The court below, however, overruled the motion for new trial, upon the ground that the defendants showed a good prescriptive title.

The original petition was filed on March 4, 1895, and the amendment adding lot 10 to those sued for was allowed on September 24, 1895. Under these pleadings, the petitioners claimed as heirs at law of M. A. Bentley, to whom the state had granted these lots of land. It was alleged that the petitioners were his only heirs at law, except O. S. Bentley and M. A. Bentley's mother, and that the latter had died prior to the bringing of the suit. There was no allegation that the mother, Rachel H. Bentley, had died testate or intestate, or as to who were her heirs. There was certainly no express claim to her share of the estate by the petitioners as her heirs, and no intimation that she had ever had any interest in the lands, except as her son's heir. The abstract of title attached to the petition was thoroughly consistent with the body of the instrument. It showed the grant by the state to M. A. Bentley, the latter's death, and that petitioners were his heirs at law. On the trial of the case the defendants introduced in evidence a deed conveying lots 10, 11, and 12 to Rachel H. Bentley, executed by four of the petitioners, the parents of the other three, under whom they claimed, and O. S. Bentley. The petitioners thereupon filed an amendment to their petition, which alleged that the deed was a forgery, and that at the time of its date (1856) two of the petitioners whose names appeared as signing it were minors. This amendment also alleged that petitioners were the only heirs at law of Rachel H. Bentley, except O. S. Bentley and one Harriet Dimmick, and that, if the lands were ever conveyed to Rachel H. Bentley, they were inherited from her by the petitioners as her heirs. The amendment prayed that, if the conveyance to Rachel H. Bentley be upheld, petitioners recover as her heirs all of the lands, except the undivided interest of O. S. Bentley and Harriet Dimmick. This amendment was allowed on September 18, 1902—more than seven years after the filing of the original petition. In the original petition it was alleged that the defendants were in possession of the lands sued for, and were asserting title thereto. It is true, the petitioners referred to the defendants as holding under a "pretended claim of right," and alleged that the title of defendants was "fraudulent and void in so far as it may affect the title of petitioners"; but the petition, taken as a whole, clearly means simply that the defendants' claim was not good as a paper title against the better title of the petitioners. It shows that the defendants entered under a claim of right, exercised acts of ownership and control, and held adversely under deeds which were good as color. These allegations were admitted by the answer. The amendment, allowed in September, 1895, was by consent. While it is very brief and not very explicit, it was clearly intended to adopt as to lot 10 all the allegations made as to the other lots in the original petition. The evidence showed that the defendants held under deeds which were good as color of title. The jury, by the verdict, found that the deed to Rachel H. Bentley by the other heirs was genuine. Such a finding was fully authorized by the evidence, as was also a finding that, if two of the petitioners were minors when they signed this deed, they were estopped by long acquiescence to set up their minority to defeat it. Thus as to the lots embraced in this deed—lots 10, 11, and 12—the plaintiffs must be held to have no rights as heirs of M. A. Bentley, but must rely upon the title, as set up in their amendment, derived from Rachel H. Bentley. Against this the defendants set up a prescriptive title based upon the deeds to them introduced in evidence, and dating back many years, together with the possession under a claim of right alleged by the petitioners, and admitted by the answer. If the amendment made in 1902 related back to the filing of the original petition, then there was not sufficient evidence to show a prescriptive title in the defendants prior to that time. If, however, the amendment amounted to a new demise, and the case should be tried as to it as though the action had been commenced at the date of its filing, then the defendants' title by prescription had ripened as to the lots to which this amendment related.

In the first place, we are clear that the amendment amounted to a new demise. As above stated, the original petition did not show who were the heirs of Rachel H. Bentley, nor whether she had died testate or intestate; the petitioners did not set up any claim under her as her heirs; and the abstract was based upon their inheritance from M. A. Bentley. The amendment under consideration set up that the petitioners were her heirs, and that there were no other heirs except O. S. Bentley, who had been named in the original petition as an heir of M. A. Bentley, and Harriet Dimmick, to whom no reference had been made in the original petition. The original petition claimed under M. A. Bentley directly upon the ground that the petitioners were his heirs at law. The amendment set up a claim by petitioners under a deed by them to Rachel H. Bentley, and their inheritance from her as her heirs. Hence the amendment clearly set up a new demise. It is well established that when, in an action of ejectment, "the declaration is amended by laying an entirely new demise, the case as to it should be tried as though the action had not been commenced until the date upon which the amendment introducing this demise was filed, and, relatively to the plaintiff's right to recover, the statutes of prescription would run in favor of the defendant until that date." Burbage v. Fitzgerald, 98 Ga. 582, 25 S. E. 554. Does this rule apply in any save suits in ejectment? Does it apply in the present case? The uniform procedure act of 1837 conferred upon the superior court jurisdiction to hear and determine any cause of action, whether legal or equitable or both. If the cause of action is purely legal, it is tried upon legal principles. If it is purely equitable, equitable principles are applied in the trial. If it is partly legal and partly equitable, both legal and equitable principles are applied. De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 229, 9 S. E. 1052. The present proceeding was partly equitable, for it sought an injunction, and prayed that certain deeds be canceled. It was also partly legal, for it sought damages and prayed for the recovery of land. Its legal features should be governed by legal principles. One of these features amounted practically to a suit in ejectment, and in its trial the court should apply the legal principles applicable to suits in ejectment. That the plaintiffs, instead of filing several suits, have seen fit to combine their suit for land with certain equitable proceedings, and bring all in one action, is no reason for changing the rules and principles applicable to each branch of the cause of action. On the contrary, each should be controlled as far as possible by the principles which would have been applicable, had it been made the basis of a separate proceeding. We think that the rule above stated as applicable to suits in ejectment should be none the less applied when the action is not only for the recovery of land, but also for other relief which is of an equitable nature. The amendment setting up a new demise should be treated, as to the ejectment feature of the case, as not relating back to the filing of the original petition, but, relatively to the plaintiffs' right to recover on the new demise set up in such amendment, as though the suit had been filed at the time the amendment was allowed. In the present case, therefore, relatively to the petitioners' claim as heirs at law of Rachel H. Bentley, prescription ran in favor of the defendants until the date of the allowance of the amendment. As this was more than seven years after the filing of the original petition, when the pleadings showed the defendants to be in possession under a claim of right, the defendants' title by prescription under color of title had ripened, and the verdict as to lots 10, 11, and 12 was fully authorized by the evidence.

2. Inasmuch as lot 13 was not embraced in the deed to Rachel H. Bentley, the petitioners inherited an undivided interest in it directly from M. A. Bentley. This interest they were entitled to recover under the original petition, unless the defendants could show a title which would prevail against that set up in the petition. As to this lot the action was tried as of the time of the filing of the original petition, and a prescriptive title could not ripen subsequently to that time. We have carefully examined the brief of evidence, and find no evidence whatever upon which to base a finding that the defendants had acquired such a prescriptive title prior to the filing of the petition. It was argued, however, that the defendants had showed a deed from M. A. Bentley, and that, while this deed had been attacked as a forgery, the jury had decided it to be genuine. The deed was dated in 1846, and was upon a printed form or blank. It was shown that the style of type used had never been made until 1875—long after the death of the alleged grantor in the deed. Copies of the letters patent for this design of type were also introduced, and showed that they had been granted in 1875. The only other evidence relative to this issue was that of a witness who swore that the signature appearing on the deed as that of one of the witnesses was not genuine. To rebut this formidable showing there was not one word of evidence. The defendants relied upon the deed itself, and upon that alone, and now urge that this was an issue of fact which should be left to the jury. To this we cannot agree. Whether or not a deed is a forgery is a question of fact which should usually be left to the jury. But here the jury could not lawfully find that the deed was genuine. Such a finding was absolutely without evidence to sustain it, and must be set aside. It was established by uncontradicted evidence—by witnesses in positions to know—that the printed form or blank could not be older than the year 1875. This being established, the jury could not properly or lawfully find that the deed filled out thereon was executed in 1846, or at any other time prior to the death of the grantor in 1854. This is especially true where the only other evidence bearing on the issue was against the genuineness of the deed. This deed being a forgery, and the defendants having failed to show any prescriptive title to lot 13, the petitioners' title, as to their undivided interests, should have prevailed. We accordingly affirm the judgment below as to lots 10, 11, and 12, but reverse it as to the petitioners' interests in lot 13.

VOLUNTARY PAYMENTS—RECOVERY BACK.

1. Voluntary payments, though illegally demanded, cannot be recovered back. But a payment made for the purpose of recovering possession of personal property wrongfully detained is not voluntary, and may be recovered back. Especially is this true when the owner does not know and cannot ascertain who has possession of the property, but makes the payment to a third person, to be used in securing the release of the goods.

Action by Mamie Du Vall against M. J. Norris and another. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice was reversed on certiorari, and she brings error. Reversed.

J. J. Zachry, for plaintiff in error. C. Henry Cohen, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. This was an action to recover back money alleged to have been paid in consequence of an illegal demand therefor. The case originated in a justice's court, where a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. This judgment was set aside by the superior court on the hearing of a certiorari sued out by the defendants. The undisputed facts of the case, as shown by the answer of the magistrate, were, in substance, as follows: Plaintiff lost a diamond ring, and, supposing that the ring had been stolen, reported the matter to the chief of police, telling him whom she suspected. The chief put a detective to work on the case, and in a short time the ring was located in a pawnbroker's shop. Some days after reporting the loss of the ring, plaintiff met the chief of police, when he stated to her, in effect, that he knew where her ring was, and would get it for her if she would pay him $38. Plaintiff at this time refused to pay the sum demanded, and requested the chief to furnish her with the name of the person who had the ring. This the chief declined to do, asking plaintiff if she desired to prosecute the person whom she suspected to be the thief. Plaintiff afterwards saw the chief, when he again refused to give the name of the person who had the ring; again stating that he would not get the ring for plaintiff unless she would pay him $38. Thereafter plaintiff received information from an attorney at law that a pawnbroker had the ring, and that it would be necessary for her to pay the $38. Plaintiff again refused to make the payment, and again demanded from the chief of police the name of person who had the ring. This time the chief told her that "a railroad man" had the ring. She thereupon had a possessory warrant issued for a railroad man whom she suspected, but afterwards had the warrant dismissed; being unable to procure any evidence that this person had the ring. She then employed an attorney to look after the matter for her, and she and her attorney called upon the chief of police and requested him to give them what information he had as to the whereabouts of and as to the person who had the ring. The chief stated that he would have nothing to do with the matter, but would get the ring if they would pay him $38. The attorney then demanded the information of the chief, and he refused to give it. A similar conversation between the chief and the attorney took place again; and finally plaintiff, on the statement of her attorney that it was the only way to get the ring, drew a check for $38.50, payable to her attorney. On the next day after this, plaintiff and her counsel called on the chief, with the money, when he produced the ring. The chief paid the money to the defendant Schaul, a pawnbroker, to whom the ring had been hypothecated by some one—it does not appear whom. Taking the evidence as a whole, it demanded a finding that the ring was pawned without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. No errors of law are complained of, and the sole question is whether, under the facts above stated, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of money paid the chief of police.

The judge of the superior court rendered his judgment against the plaintiff on the idea that the payment was voluntary. We have been unable to take this view of the evidence. No one will, of course, dispute the right to the plaintiff, under the evidence, to recover her ring without the payment of any sum whatever; and therefore the demand of the pawnbroker, which came through the chief of police, was illegal. Voluntary payments cannot be recovered, but "it is well settled that a payment under protest, made to secure the delivery of the possession of personal property wrongfully withheld from the payor, may be recovered back, on the ground that the payment was compulsory." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 617. Numerous English and American decisions are cited in support of this text. This was the rule at common law, and has been adopted and followed by many of the American states. Thus in Ashley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 916, a person pawned plate, and, in order to recover possession thereof, paid to the pawnbroker a sum in excess of that which he had a right to demand for the redemption of the plate. It was held that the excess might be recovered. See, also, Cobb v. Charter, 32 Conn. 358, 87 Am. Dec. 178, and citations; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 137, 9 L. Ed. 373. Many other cases to the same effect might be cited. Our own court has applied the rule. In Barnett v. Central Line of Boats, 51 Ga. 489, it was held that if a carrier who has made a contract of carriage with an owner of goods pays to another carrier, who has wrongfully obtained possession of the goods, the amount of freight which the owner was required to pay under his contract, in order to obtain possession of the goods for the purpose of complying with his contract, he could recover the amount so paid. This decision is very close in point, if not controlling, in the present case. Indeed, the present case seems to be much stronger, for here the plaintiff did not know where her property was, and so could not avail herself of any of the remedies afforded by law for its recovery. See, also, in this connection, First National Bank v. Mayor of Americus, 68 Ga. 123, 45 Am. Rep. 476. Prior to 1895 we had no code provision on this subject, but in that year the general law was embodied in a section which is as follows: "Payments of taxes or other claims made through ignorance of the law, or where the facts are all known, and there is no misplaced confidence and no artifice, deception or fraudulent practice used by the other party, are deemed voluntary, and can not be recovered back unless made under an urgent and immediate necessity therefor, or to release person or property from detention, or to prevent an immediate seizure of person or property. Filing a protest at the time of payment does not change the rule." Civ. Code 1895, § 3723. It will be observed that, under the express terms of this section, money paid to release property from illegal detention may be recovered back. We are of opinion that the judgment of the justice of the peace was right, and that it was error to sustain the certiorari and render a judgment for the defendants. The chief of police and the pawnbroker were sued together as joint wrongdoers; and, while there might have been some difficulty in holding the chief liable, inasmuch as the plaintiff, in effect, instructed him to pay the money to the pawnbroker, and knew that he did so, no question of this character was raised. The chief of police was content to rest his case upon the same defense as the pawnbroker, and to stand or fall with him.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

ATLANTA RY. & POWER CO. v. OWENS.

ATTORNEY'S LIEN—ENFORCEMENT OF SUIT—EVIDENCE—STREET RAILWAYS.

1. While attorneys at law have the same right and power over suits brought in behalf of their clients to enforce their lien for fees as their clients have, and such suits may be prosecuted for the benefit of the attorney having a lien notwithstanding a settlement between the parties to the suit, made without the knowledge or consent of the attorney, still there can be no recovery in behalf of the attorney, unless the evidence is of such a character as would have authorized a recovery by the client if the suit were still proceeding for his benefit.

2. The evidence being of such a character that a recovery in behalf of the plaintiff would not have been authorized, a finding in favor of the attorneys, who were prosecuting the suit to enforce their lien for fees, was unauthorized, and the court erred in not granting a new trial.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by W. J. Owens against the Atlanta Railway & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Rosser & Brandon, Walter T. Colquitt, and B. J. Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Waites & Howard and Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The plaintiff sued the street railway company for damages. While the suit was pending, the defendant paid to the plaintiff a sum of money in full satisfaction of her demand, and she signed a paper releasing the company from all liability to her. This settlement was made without the knowledge or consent of her attorneys, and they are prosecuting the suit to enforce their lien for fees. The law authorizes an attorney who has a lien upon the suit to prosecute it for the purpose of enforcing the payment of his fees. Civ. Code 1895, § 2814 (2). When the suit is so prosecuted, there can be no recovery for fees, unless the evidence is of such a character as that a recovery in behalf of the client would have been authorized if the suit were still proceeding for his benefit. The injuries to the plaintiff were the result of a collision between a carriage in which the plaintiff was being driven and one of the cars of the defendant company. The collision occurred on the 2d day of September, 1901, about 7 o'clock in the evening, and at a point not at a street crossing. The circumstances under which the collision occurred are best told in the language of the plaintiff herself, in the following extracts from her testimony: "I was coming back along Grant street. The city lights had been lighted. I was coming in from Grant Park down Grant street, and before I got to Glenn street I saw a large covered wagon ahead of me, so I could not pass. Of course, I had to turn, and I just drove diagonally across the track, and after I got on the track I saw the car was coming so close, and I whipped my horse up, and before I got off the car struck me." "The character of that covered wagon, as to obstructing my view up the street in front of me, was such that I could see the light of the car, but could not see the car itself. I saw the light of the car before I drove upon the track. I knew the car was coming and saw the light." "I saw the light of the car coming down there, and heard the car before I turned on the track. Before I turned on the track I saw the light of the car, and heard it too. I saw the light of the car, and heard it, before I turned onto the tracks. I didn't know how close it was on me until I drove on the track. I knew the car was coming, however. I heard the car coming, and saw the light of the car itself. The car was lit up. It had a headlight on it. After I drove on the track, everything happened so quickly I don't remember much what happened." "When I first knew the car was coming I was between Glenn and Georgia avenue. The car was beyond Glenn street. What called my attention to it was I saw the reflection of the light. I didn't see the car until I drove upon the track—not until I drove on the track. I did see it then. I didn't see it until I drove on the track. I didn't look for it before I drove on the track. I couldn't see it at all, if I had. The wagon obstructed the view. After I got on the track, the wagon was not in my way. I drove diagonally across from behind the wagon. I didn't see the car until I got on the track. I heard the car, and I saw the reflection of the car. I attempted to cross the track, because I thought I had time to get across. The car, when I first saw it after I got on the track, was beyond Glenn street. I was at the corner of Glenn almost, I couldn't tell exactly. I couldn't tell you how far from the crossing I was. I was right at Mrs. Burns' house; that is all I can say. It was not 50 feet, though." "Q. You say when you first saw this car it was beyond Glenn street? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any idea, when you first drove up there, how far the car was from you? A. No, sir; it was right on me. It ran up on me before I could get across. Q. When you went to drive across, have you any idea how far it was from you? A. The only thing I know is it was beyond Glenn street." "Q. You say you heard this car coming? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see the car? A. I saw the reflection of the light up the car track."

An ordinance of the city prohibited the company from running its cars at the place where the collision occurred at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, and there was evidence from which the jury could find that the car was being run at a greater rate of speed than the ordinance authorized. In other words, there was evidence authorizing the jury to find that the company was negligent. The question to be determined, therefore, is whether the plaintiff, notwithstanding the defendant's negligence, has been guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery. In determining this question we must look to her testimony. If a person testify in his own behalf, and there are material conflicts and contradictions in his testimony, he is not entitled to recover if he be the plaintiff, unless that portion of his testimony which is least favorable to his contention is of such a character as to authorize a recovery in his behalf. The rule just referred to was first laid down in the case of Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Evans, 96 Ga. 481, 23 S. E. 494. It was recognized and approved in Freyermuth v. Railroad Co., 107 Ga. 82, 32 S. E. 668, and Southern Bank v. Goette, 108 Ga. 796 (2), 33 S. E. 974. Applying this rule to the plaintiff's testimony, the case presented shows that at the time she drove upon the track she knew the car was approaching, both from the noise and the light, though her view of the track was obstructed by the wagon. Under such circumstances, any prudent person would have taken some precaution to ascertain how near the car was from the point where the attempt to cross was to be made, and to attempt to cross under the circumstances indicated by the plaintiff's testimony, where she had full knowledge that the car was approaching, and did not know how near or how far it was, or at what rate of speed it was running, was such an act of negligence on her part as would preclude a recovery by her. She should at least have taken the precaution to ascertain how near the car was before attempting to cross the track, when she was on notice, both by the noise and the light of the car, that it was approaching. This seems to be a case where the plaintiff, knowing the danger, deliberately took the risk of being able to cross before the car could reach the point where she intended to cross, and made an error of judgment as to the time that would elapse before the crossing could be made or before the car could reach that point. Such an attempt, under such circumstances, was an act of gross negligence on her part, and evidenced such a lack of prudence as to entirely defeat a recovery by her. In her testimony she says, "I attempted to cross the track because I thought I had time to get across." And in another part of her testimony she says that she did not see the car until she drove upon the track. This case is very much like that of Southern Railway Company v. Blake, 101 Ga. 217, 29 S. E. 288, and is to be distinguished from the case of Western & Atlantic Railroad Company v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 706, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802, by reason of the fact that in the latter case the plaintiff took the precaution to look down the track before attempting to cross, and at the time he looked the train was not in sight, nor could it have reached the point where he desired to cross before he had time to cross if it had been run at a lawful rate of speed.

The plaintiff having, in our opinion, failed to take such precautions for her safety as, under the circumstances, an ordinarily prudent person would have taken, she would not be entitled to recover, notwithstanding the car may have been run at an unlawful rate of speed at the time of the collision. As the plaintiff would not have been entitled to recover for her own benefit, the attorneys had nothing upon which their lien could operate, and the court erred in not setting aside the verdict in favor of their lien.

OWENS v. ATLANTA TRUST & BANKING CO.

ATTACHMENT—LIEN—BANKS—LIEN ON STOCK—FORECLOSURE.

1. In attachment proceedings against a non-resident, who is not served, the only lien created or foreclosed is that arising by virtue of the seizure of the property levied on.

2. If the plaintiff has a lien on said property by virtue of a contract, or under its charter and by-laws, such lien cannot be foreclosed by judicial proceedings unless the defendant is duly served by an officer or by publication.

3. In the present case the only lien foreclosed was that created by the attachment, which was inferior to the title asserted by the claimant, holding under a purchase older than the attachment; and a verdict finding the property subject was contrary to law.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Atlanta Trust & Banking Company against one Runnette. Judgment for plaintiff. On levy of execution J. S. Owens filed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimant brings error. Reversed.

W. D. Thompson, for plaintiff in error.
Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Twenty-eight shares of the capital stock of the Atlanta Trust & Banking Company, standing in the name of Runnette, were levied on and sold at the sheriff's sale of March 6, 1901, and purchased by Owens. On April 8, 1902, this bank sued out an attachment, which was levied on the same stock. The declaration in attachment alleged that Runnette was indebted to the bank $2,875.98 on a note dated February 25, 1897, and that under the charter and by-laws of the company it had a lien on the stock for its indebtedness, and prayed for a judgment against Runnette, and that the judgment be declared to be a first lien upon the property levied on under the attachment by virtue of the charter and by-laws. The judgment rendered in the attachment suit is not incorporated in the brief of the evidence, but the execution issued thereon commands the sheriff to make the sum of $2,875.98 out of 28 shares of the capital stock standing in the name of Runnette. A levy was made, and a claim to the 28 shares was filed by Owens, who insisted that at the sale in March, 1901, he had purchased the same. The bank insisted that he had only purchased the equity of redemption. The jury found for the plaintiff in fi. fa., and Owens excepted.

We do not find it necessary or proper to determine the extent of the interest acquired by Owens when he purchased the stock at the sheriff's sale on March 6, 1901. Whatever interest he acquired was older than the lien created by the levy of the attachment in April, 1902, and that was the only lien which was or could be foreclosed in the present proceeding. It is true that tax liens, liens for rent, and possibly other statutory liens, may be foreclosed by a seizure, and without notice to the defendant whose property has been attached. But in a proceeding under Civ. Code 1895, § 4510, against a nonresident, the only lien foreclosed is that created by the seizure of the property. No contract or by-law lien held by the plaintiff can be foreclosed without making the defendant a party. Nor does the nonresidence of Runnette alter the case, since Civ. Code 1895, § 4976, par. 3, provides for service by publication where the suit is instituted "to establish, enforce, or foreclose liens" against property in this state belonging to a nonresident or unknown owner. If the person claiming the by-law lien desires to enforce the same by retaining possession, by refusal to transfer, by the exercise of a power to sell, or by a sale under Civ. Code 1895, § 2819, the nonresidence of the lienor would probably make no difference. When, however, an action is brought for that purpose, service upon the defendant in some of the methods prescribed by the Code is necessary. None such having been given in the present case, the lien under the by-law was not properly foreclosed. A sale under an attachment may give as much notice as that required under Civ. Code 1895, § 2819, but it certainly cannot be claimed that a sale so conducted is "one usual in the locality where the incorporated company is located." Had the sale taken place, the bank, of course, would have been estopped to complain, but Runnette would not have been bound, and this fact may have affected the selling price to the injury of Owens, who, the bank claims, was only the owner of the equity of redemption. The judgment of foreclosure was void. The stock was not subject to the execution issued thereon. The lien of the attachment was inferior to the rights acquired by Owens at the previous sale, and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the claimant was contrary to law.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

WATERS v. DURRENCE et ux.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE OF TITLE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—OUTSTANDING TITLE.

1. The plaintiff failed to show paper title to the land sued for.

2. While there was evidence that plaintiff's ancestor had been in possession under color for a short time prior to 1861, it was not such possession as had ripened into a prescriptive title.

3. There was evidence that the land sued for had been in the adverse possession of others for more than 20 years before the bringing of the suit.

4. The defendants could avail themselves of paramount outstanding title in third persons without connecting themselves therewith.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by John W. Waters against F. W. Durrence and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Waters, as administrator de bonis non of his father, John W. Waters, brought complaint for land against F. W. Durrence and his wife; alleging that William Grice, the original administrator, had disposed of all the estate of John W. Waters, except the land sued for, which had been in the possession of Nancy Waters from the death of John W. Waters, in 1860, as her dower, until her death, in 1898. From the evidence it appeared that the land sued for was a part of a tract of 200 acres granted by the state to Brazell in 1802. There was no evidence that he ever sold this land to Groom, but the plaintiff introduced a deed from Thomas Groom to John Waters, dated December 26, 1848, and recorded April 19, 1899, conveying "200 acres lying on Beard's creek, granted to Jacob Brazell, and having such shape and bounded as represented in a plat of the same." There was some evidence that John Waters had been in possession of a few acres of this land for a short time prior to his death, and that 51 acres of property immediately adjoining the same had been set apart as a dower. There was also evidence that Mrs. Waters had been in possession of the 100 acres sued for from the time of her husband's death, claiming the same as her own. There was other evidence that Mrs. Durrence had been the widow of Simon Waters, a son of John Waters, and, as such, one of his heirs at law; that Simon Waters had been in possession of the land sued for for quite a long period before his death; and that he claimed title by virtue of some contract under which he was to support his mother during her lifetime. There was no order from the ordinary authorizing the sale of this land by the administrator of John Waters. The plaintiff struck his representative capacity, and allowed the suit to proceed for the recovery of his interest as heir at law of John Waters, Sr. He moved to have certain persons, all heirs at law of John Waters, made parties plaintiff, which the court refused. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

W. T. Burkhalter and Twigg & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. James K. Hines, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. The outstanding paper title was shown to be in Jacob Brazell. There is no explanation as to the circumstances under which Groom acquired title or was authorized to make the deed to John Waters, nor was there evidence of such possession thereunder as to create a prescriptive title in Waters. There was evidence that his widow had been in possession of the land sued for more than 20 years, claiming it as her own. Nor could this be referred to the dower estate, because the only evidence on that subject showed that this consisted of 51 acres adjoining. The plaintiff sued as heir at law of his father, and not as heir at law of his mother. He failed to show that his father had title to the land in dispute at the time of his death, or, if so, he showed that the widow's adverse possession had given her paramount title. The defendants were entitled to avail themselves of this paramount outstanding title in a third person without connecting themselves therewith. Brumbalo v. Baxter, 33 Ga. 81; Jenkins v. Southern Railway Co., 109 Ga. 35, 41, 34 S. E. 355, and citations. This makes it unnecessary to consider whether there was such evidence of ouster as to warrant the plaintiff to recover in ejectment against his alleged cotenant, Mrs. Durrence, who, as an heir at law of Simon Waters, was entitled to possession of a part of any land belonging to the estate of John Waters.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

NEGOTIABLE NOTE—TRANSFER—BONA FIDE HOLDER—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

1. The innocent holder of negotiable paper may transfer the same for value to one with notice of a defense, but the transferee will take the same free from the equity.

2. Where, in consideration of her husband's indebtedness, a wife gives her note to a firm, who transfers the same before due to an innocent purchaser as collateral security for the firm's debt, and on dissolution one of the members of the firm assumes such debt, and on the discharge thereof regains the wife's note, he does not stand in the shoes of the innocent purchaser, and is not protected against the wife's defense.

3. The witnesses were competent, there being no testimony as to transactions with a deceased partner.

4. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Screven County: B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by E. A. Weil, for use, etc., against M. V. Carswell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On June 22, 1893, Mrs. Carswell gave her note to Blitch & Newton, or bearer, due October 15th after date. She claimed that it represented a debt of her husband. On this issue the evidence was in direct conflict. Before the note became due, it was transferred by Blitch & Newton to John Flannery & Co., with other security, as collateral for a debt due them by Blitch & Newton. The firm of Blitch & Newton was dissolved under an arrangement by which Blitch assumed the debt to Flannery & Co. He satisfied this indebtedness by giving his individual note for $10,600, with Weil as indorser thereon. At the request of Blitch all of the collateral held by Flannery & Co. was delivered to Weil to secure his indorsement in 1895, after the maturity of Mrs. Carswell's note. Subsequently Weil brought suit against her. She filed a plea setting up that the debt represented by the note was that of her husband, and that Weil was a purchaser after maturity. Before the case came on for trial, Blitch satisfied his indebtedness to Weil, and thereby came into possession of the note sued on, whereupon Mrs. Carswell amended her plea, setting up that Weil was not the owner of the note, but that it belonged to Blitch, one of the original payees, who stood in the position of the firm of Blitch & Newton. She again insisted upon her defense that the note was void because given for her husband's debt. The case was tried on that issue, and a verdict found for the defendant. In addition to the general grounds, the motion for a new trial assigns as error (1) that the court allowed the defendant and her husband to testify, it appearing that D. J. Newton, one of the original payees, was dead; (2) that the court erred in allowing the pleas of defendant, it not appearing that Flannery & Co. took the same after the note was due; and (3) that the court erred in holding that Blitch did not occupy the same position of innocent holder for value as that occupied by Flannery & Co. and Weil, former holders.

J. A. Brannen, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Overstreet and White & Boykin, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. Flannery & Co., being bona fide purchasers for value before the note was due, could have transferred a good title to one with notice. Civ. Code 1895, § 3938; Hogan v. Moore, 48 Ga. 156. But under the evidence Weil was not a purchaser from them, but rather from Blitch, who had assumed and was occupying the position of Blitch & Newton. The transfer being by him to Weil after maturity, the latter took the paper subject to all defenses which could have been urged against the original payee; and so, too, when the note again came into possession of Blitch, one of the original payees. There was evidence sufficient to sustain the contention that the note represented the debt of her husband, and; there being no error assigned as to any ruling of the court on this branch of the case, the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial. The assignments of error as to permitting Mr. and Mrs. Carswell to testify notwithstanding the fact that Newton was dead are incomplete, falling as they do to set out what testimony was given by the witnesses, or that it related to transactions with Newton. Even if the refusal to strike the plea can be made the ground of a motion for a new trial, there is nothing to show what motion was made, nor is any error assigned thereon which can be considered.

POUND v. WILLIAMS et al.

SALE—RESCISSION—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

Suit was brought in a city court on a draft given for the purchase of personal property. The plea admitted the sale and delivery of the article bought. It did not allege that the property was worthless, or of value less than the draft given. There was no plea of total or partial failure of consideration, or one in abatement of the purchase money. The sole prayer of the defendant was for a cancellation and delivery of the draft, and rescission on the ground of deceit and misrepresentation as to the quality of the goods, and breach of the warranty. Held:

1. Breach of warranty does not annul an executed sale, but gives the purchaser a right to damages, where the contract price has been fully paid, or he may plead in abatement of the purchase money when sued therefor.

2. A city court cannot grant affirmative equitable relief.

Error from City Court of Vienna; D. L. Henderson, Judge.

Action by J. H. & W. W. Williams against B. B. Pound. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Orum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Whipple & McKenzie and Steed & Ryals, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. J. H. & W. W. Williams brought suit against B. B. Pound on a draft for $310, alleged to have been given in payment of certain goods sold to the defendant. The defendant admitted these allegations, but set up by his plea that he owned two diamond rings, which he exhibited to the plaintiffs, with a statement that he desired to purchase two other diamonds, exactly matching in size, quality, weight, and whiteness those already owned; that the plaintiffs warranted those sold to be exact "matches"; that the comparison was made in the presence of plaintiffs, but in a store lighted by artificial light; that defendant was unskilled, and relied on the warranty and representation made by the plaintiffs. It does not appear how long the rings were retained before being re-examined, nor where this was done, but the defendant avers that, when they were examined in the natural light, it appeared that they were not of the same whiteness and brilliancy as those exhibited for comparison; that he immediately refused to "accept" the rings bought, and has since held the rings subject to the order of the plaintiffs, upon their delivery of the draft sued on; that he stands ready to tender to the plaintiffs the rings upon the delivery of the draft and the payment of the cost; that the consideration of the said draft has failed; that defendant had had little experience in the matter of buying diamonds, and was unable to discover the defects, or to know the difference which really existed; that plaintiffs expressly warranted the rings to be exact counterparts of those in defendant's possession, and, relying upon such warranty, he gave the draft. Wherefore he prays that the suit be dismissed, that the draft be delivered and canceled, and that he have judgment for the attorney's fees, costs, and expenses incurred by him. On motion of plaintiffs, these pleas were stricken. There being no defense on file, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted.

There is no allegation that the rings sold were wholly worthless, and no plea that their value was less than the amount of the draft. The defendant prayed, as his only relief, for a rescission of the contract, for cancellation and surrender of the draft, and for judgment for costs and expenses incurred in defending the suit. A city court cannot grant affirmative equitable relief. English v. Thorn, 96 Ga. 557, 23 S. E. 843. But this was an executed sale; possession of the rings had been surrendered to the purchaser; and, even if there had been a breach of the warranty, Civ. Code 1895, § 3556, expressly declares that the breach did not annul the sale as executed, though it might give the purchaser a right to damages, or it might be pleaded in abatement of the purchase money. There was no such plea here, and that setting up the equitable defense was properly stricken. It appeared that the defendant took the diamonds with him from the store—probably to his home in another city—and that when they were there examined, and found not to be of the quality represented, "he refused to accept the same, and they have been held subject to the order of petitioner upon their delivery of the draft now sued upon." This is no allegation that the rings were restored, or of an offer to restore, to the sellers, and of demand made for the return of the draft. Prompt restoration was one of the elements necessary to entitle the defendant to a rescission, or to the right of avoidance incident thereto. See Smith v. Estey Co., 100 Ga. 628, 28 S. E. 392; Clark v. Neufville, 46 Ga. 266; Martin v. Harwell, 115 Ga. 150, 41 S. E. 686; Barnett v. Spelr, 96 Ga. 762, 21 S. E. 168; Dawson v. Pennaman, 65 Ga. 698.

Error from City Court of McRae; Max L. McRae, Judge.

B. M. Frizzell, E. D. Graham, and Eschol Graham, for plaintiff in error. D. O. McLennan, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An action for damages was brought by Webb against the county of Telfair in the city court of McRae. The petition alleged that the damages resulted from injuries received by the petitioner's mare by reason of defects in a certain county bridge; that petitioner was leading her across such bridge, when, without any fault on his part, she stepped into a hole in the floor of said bridge and was damaged; that the flooring of the bridge was dilapidated, rotten, and full of holes; that this condition had existed for several months, and that the county authorities had actual notice of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the bridge; that the bridge had been constructed by the county of lumber of an inferior quality; and that the county was negligent in failing to repair the bridge. The petition also alleged that the mare was so badly crippled that, after attempting for nearly seven weeks, at great trouble and expense, to cure her, he had disposed of her as being practically worthless, and that he had been damaged in the sum of $150. The defendant, by its answer, denied all the allegations of the petition as to the manner and extent of the injuries to the mare, and as to the condition of the bridge. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $112.50. The defendant moved for a new trial, the motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

1. Under the evidence appearing in the record, there were three questions to be passed upon by the jury before reaching a determination as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all: (1) Whether the mare had been injured upon the county bridge; (2) whether this injury was caused by a defect in the bridge of which the county authorities had sufficient notice, and which they had negligently failed to repair; (3) whether the plaintiff could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. The third of these questions was submitted to the jury, the first was mentioned in stating the contentions of the parties, and the second was not referred to at all. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial of instructions in which the court assumed that the mare was injured, and there was also complaint that the court failed to charge on the matters stated above as the first and second questions for the jury to determine. It was error to assume that the plaintiff's mare was injured, when there was sufficient evidence to the contrary to require a submission of the question to the jury. It was also error, even in the absence of any request, to fail to charge on the question of the defendant's negligence. That negligence is the gist of the action; and, unless it be established that the defendant was negligent in some respect, such negligence being the proximate cause of the injury, there can be no recovery, even though it be proved that the mare was injured by reason of a defect in the bridge. For these reasons, we think the court should have granted a new trial upon these grounds.

2. Under the ruling in Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Hudson, 62 Ga. 679, approved in Atlanta Cotton-Seed Oil Mills v. Coffey, 80 Ga. 150, 4 S. E. 759, 12 Am. St. Rep. 244, the plaintiff's measure of damages, if he recovered, would include reasonable hire of the animal for the time during which she was temporarily disabled for service, as well as making good any diminution in her market value occasioned by the permanent effects of the injury; such amounts, however, not to exceed, in the aggregate, the market value of the animal, with interest thereon. Plaintiff would also be entitled to recover for any expenses incurred, during the time the mare was disabled for service, in keeping her and treating her injuries. The judge below instructed the jury much in accordance with what is here laid down, but we are not sure that his charge was in all respects accurate. Certainly it is subject to the criticism that it allowed the jury to find for the plaintiff for medical attendance, when there was no evidence, so far as the record shows, of any expense on that account. As a new trial is ordered on other grounds, it is unnecessary for us to do more than state the correct measure of damages applicable to the case.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by S. A. Cox against H. P. Tilley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Eb. T. Williams and Alex. W. Stephens, for plaintiff in error. L. F. McClelland and J. D. Kilpatrick, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. S. A. Cox sued H. P. Tilley on two promissory notes. Defendant, in his answer, admitted the execution of the notes, that they were unpaid, and that the plaintiff was the holder and owner of them at the time the action was brought. He pleaded that the notes were given for the premiums on a life insurance policy for which he had applied to the New York Life Insurance Company, through Cox, its agent; that he intended to apply for a policy providing for a participation in dividends after the second year, which would "reduce the premiums each year with paid-up insurance for the face of the policy at the expiration of twenty years"; that he did not read the application, for the reason that he could not easily do so without his glasses, which he did not have at the time; that Cox represented to him that the application was for the kind of policy he desired to obtain, and he implicitly relied upon such representation; "that when the policy was delivered it was totally different from the one he had contracted for with said Cox, it being a 20-year policy, with no dividends until the expiration of 20 years; that defendant immediately returned said policy, and demanded the surrender of his notes by said Cox, but that he refused to take the policy tendered or to surrender his notes, whereupon he mailed it to him and remailed it, and is willing now, and has always been, to disclaim any benefits under it; that on account of the aforesaid misrepresentations by said Cox he was induced to sign said notes and application, being grossly misled by fraud; that the consideration of said notes had totally and wholly failed." On the trial the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial upon various grounds, which being overruled, he excepted.

1. One ground of the motion alleged that: "Movant offered to prove by his own parol testimony the following material facts: That he did not get the kind of policy applied for by him or the insurance applied for by him, viz., a policy which would pay to him a dividend at the expiration of the second year and at stated periods thereafter, by which he could reduce his premiums." Another ground alleged: "The movant offered to prove by his own parol testimony the following material facts: That the policy which was sent him was not the kind of policy he applied for—a policy which would begin to pay dividends at the expiration of the second year, by which he could reduce his premiums—but was a policy which paid no dividends at the expiration of the second year." That the evidence last quoted was offered after the witness had testified as follows: "After he received said policy, he tendered it back to Holland, and he refused to accept it. Day or two later he tendered it to Mr. Cox, and he refused; and witness tendered it again to Mr. Cox, and he again refused. Witness then mailed it to the New York Life Insurance Company in Atlanta, and it came back. He then returned it to the company in Atlanta, and it came back to the post office again, and he refused to take it out the office, and has never seen it since. Does not know what became of it. After that witness called back at the post office, and called for the policy, and the postmaster said it was not there." The complaint was that the court erroneously rejected the evidence offered. We do not think that the court erred in ruling that this evidence was inadmissible. The plea of the defendant, as we have seen, was that the policy he received was a 20-year policy, which provided for no dividends until the expiration of 20 years, and that it was totally different from the one for which he had contracted. The policy itself was the highest and best evidence of what it contained, and as to whether or not it provided for a participation in dividends after the second year, which was the kind of policy the defendant claimed, in his plea, he had applied for. It is evident that the testimony of the witness did not show that the policy was either lost, destroyed, or inaccessible to the diligence of the defendant. The mere fact that the postmaster told him the policy was not in the post office did not show that it was lost or destroyed. The postmaster did not say that it was lost, or that he did not know what had become of it. He simply said it was not in the office. Owing to the failure of the defendant to take it out of the office, the postmaster might have returned it to the address whence it came. Some one other than the defendant might have called for his mail, and the policy might have been delivered to such person. So far as this testimony showed, the postmaster might have known exactly where the policy was, or, if it had left his possession, to whom it had been delivered, or where he had sent it. The defendant simply traced the missing document to the possession of the postmaster, without introducing the evidence of the postmaster to show that it was lost, or what became of it. Indeed, so far as the evidence showed, the defendant might have been informed as to the whereabouts of the policy, and it might have been an easy matter for him to have procured its production. Such information on his part was not at all inconsistent with his statement that the postmaster told him it was not in the post office.

2. Another ground of the motion was that the court had no legal or constitutional right to direct a verdict for the plaintiff without the defendant's consent, and that in so doing the defendant was deprived of his constitutional right of a trial by jury, and was deprived of his property without due process of law, which was contrary to the Constitution of the United States, the provisions of the respective Constitutions in reference to these matters being set out in the motion. It is well settled that the provision of the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved," applies only to the courts of the United States. Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken L. & I. Co., 18 How. 280, 15 L. Ed. 372; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294, 24 L. Ed. 436; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 8 Sup. Ct. 21, 31 L. Ed. 80; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 974, and cit., note 4. It is equally clear that the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, providing that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law," does not require a jury. Walker v. Sauvinet, supra; Hall v. Armstrong, 65 Vt. 421, 26 Atl. 592, 20 L. R. A. 366; Fant v. Buchanan (Miss.) 17 South. 371. Civ. Code 1895, § 5331, provides: "Where there is no conflict in the evidence, and that introduced with all reasonable deductions or inferences therefrom demands a particular verdict, the court may direct the jury to find for the party entitled thereto." This section does not contravene the provision of our state Constitution that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, nor the provision that no person shall be deprived of property except by due process of law. Under our procedure it is the province of the jury, in civil cases, to pass upon questions of fact, and a trial by jury in such cases presupposes an issue of fact; so, if there be no such issue, there is nothing for a jury to pass on. The jury, in such cases, has nothing to do with questions of law that may be involved, or with inferences of law from undisputed facts. A plaintiff might with as much reason contend that the court when granting a nonsuit deprived him of his right of trial by jury as a defendant could contend that he was deprived of such right by the direction of a verdict against him in a case falling within the provisions of the above-cited section of the Civil Code. The right of the court to grant a nonsuit in a proper case has never been brought in question in this court, so far as we know. In Naugatuck R. R. Co. v. Waterbury Button Co., 24 Conn. 468, it was held: "The act of 1852 [Laws 1852, p. 7, c. 4], authorizing the granting of nonsuits in civil actions where the plaintiff, who has produced his evidence and rested his case, shall have failed to make out a prima facie case, is not repugnant to the Constitution of this state, as impairing the right of trial by jury." While the plaintiff in error relies upon both of the above-mentioned provisions of our state Constitution, they are each invoked for the same purpose; that is, to sustain his contention that he was entitled to a trial by a jury, the due process of law contended for being a trial by a jury. As there was no issue to submit to the jury, due process of law did not require that the case should be tried by a jury.

3. As the defendant, in his answer, admitted, in effect, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the plea of the defendant should be sustained, and as there was no evidence to sustain the plea, there was no error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

4. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was alleged newly discovered evidence, which evidence was, in substance, that after the trial, and on the same day thereof, movant's brother informed him that the package or letter from the New York Life Insurance Company which had been directed to movant at Decatur, Ga., and which he had requested his brother to return, had not been returned, because his brother had forgotten to do so, but had been placed by his brother under his buggy cushion, where it had remained for six months, and was subsequently placed in a drawer at his house; that movant immediately went to his brother's house, and procured the letter or package, which had not been opened; that when he opened it, some time before the hearing of the motion for a new trial, in the presence of certain named witnesses, the insurance policy in question was found therein; that movant did not know during the trial where the policy was, but believed that his brother had returned it by mail to the agent of the insurance company at Atlanta. Affidavits of the movant and his counsel, in the usual form, as to the want of knowledge of the alleged newly discovered evidence at the time of the trial, and that the same could not have been procured by the exercise of proper diligence, were also submitted upon the hearing of the motion. The policy, which provided for no participation in dividends until the expiration of 20 years, was also put in evidence upon the hearing of the motion as part of the alleged newly discovered evidence. The defendant had averred in his verified plea that he had twice returned the policy by mail to the agent of the company that issued it. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial the affidavit of counsel for plaintiff was submitted, in which they deposed that some 10 days before the trial of the case they notified counsel for defendant that the policy was not in the possession, power, custody, or control of themselves, or of their client, or of the New York Life Insurance Company, but that, according to the information and belief of deponents it was in the possession, power, custody, and control of the defendant, and that deponents then notified counsel for defendant that they would demand strict proof of the policy, and defendant's counsel had better make some effort to procure it. As it appeared that the defendant had delivered the letter containing the policy to his brother, to be returned by mail to the agent of the company, and that his counsel had been notified that it was in the possession, power, custody, or control of the insurance company, the plaintiff, or his counsel, it seems that the slightest diligence on the part of the defendant would have required him to make inquiry of his brother as to whether or not he had mailed the letter containing the policy. As is well known, the granting of new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence is not favored by the courts, and the discretion of a trial judge in refusing a new trial on such ground will not be controlled unless manifestly abused. We do not think there was any abuse of discretion in this instance.

COLUMBUS FERTILIZER CO. v. HANKS.

JUSTICE JUDGMENT—DORMANCY—EXECUTION DOCKET.

1. A judgment rendered in a justice's court will not be kept in life and the running of the dormancy statute arrested by entries on the execution recorded upon the general execution docket, but not recorded upon the execution docket of the superior court of the county of the defendant's residence.

Candler and Turner, JJ., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; J. H. Worrill, Judge pro hac vice.

Action by the Columbus Fertilizer Company against L. B. Hanks to determine evidence of illegality. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. L. Bowden and J. H. Martin, for plaintiff in error. T. T. Miller, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. A fl. fa. from a justice's court was levied upon certain personal property. The defendant filed an affidavit of illegality, alleging that the execution was proceeding illegally, for the reason that more than seven years had elapsed from the time the execution was issued before either the execution or the entries thereon had been placed upon the execution docket of the superior court, and that the judgment was therefore dormant, and could not be enforced by levy. The case thus made was returned to the justice's court, and thence appealed by consent to the superior court. Upon the trial the case was submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts. From this statement it appeared that the judgment upon which the execution was based was rendered in December, 1893; that the execution was issued March 12, 1894; that a proper return of nulla bona was made on the execution on October 12, 1894, by a proper officer; that the execution and this return of nulla bona were properly recorded on the general execution docket of the county on October 20, 1896; that a proper return of nulla bona was made on the execution on May 6, 1901; that the levy to which the affidavit of illegality was filed was made on June 5, 1901; that the execution and the entries of nulla bona were entered on the execution docket of the superior court on June 8, 1901, and that they had not been entered upon that docket prior to that time. The judge ruled that the entry of the execution upon the general execution docket "did not prevent it from being dormant when the levy was made," and therefore he sustained the illegality. To this judgment the plaintiff in execution excepted.

Under the acts of 1823 (Cobb's Dig. p. 498) and 1856 (Acts 1855-56, p. 234) no judgment obtained in the courts of this state could be enforced after the expiration of seven years from its rendition when no execution had been issued, or, if the execution had been issued, after the expiration of seven years from the time of the last entry upon the execution by an officer authorized to execute and return it. By the act of 1885 (Acts 1884-85, p. 95; Civ. Code 1895, § 3761) it was enacted that no judgment should be enforced "after the expiration of seven years from the time of its rendition, when no execution has been issued upon it and the same placed upon the execution docket as now provided by law, or when the execution has been issued and seven years have expired from the time of the record upon the execution docket of the court from which the same issued of the last entry upon the execution made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same." This made it necessary, in order to continue a judgment in life, not only to have the entries made upon the execution but to have them recorded in the execution docket of the court from which the execution issued. The act also provided "that, in case any execution issues from any court having no execution docket, then said record shall be made upon the execution docket of the superior court of the county where the defendant resides." Civ. Code 1895, § 3762. The justices' courts of this state have no execution docket, and to them this last provision is applicable. In 1889 the General Assembly passed "an act to provide when transfers and liens shall take effect as against third parties." Acts 1889, p. 106. Under this act deeds, mortgages, and liens of all kinds, as against innocent third parties who have acquired a transfer or lien binding the same property, take effect only from the time they are filed for record. The clerk of the superior court is required to keep a general execution docket, and, as against such third parties who have acquired a transfer or lien binding the defendant's property, no money judgment obtained within the county of the defendant's residence shall have a lien upon his property from the date of the rendition of the judgment, unless the execution is entered on the general execution docket within 10 days from the time the judgment is rendered. When the execution is entered after 10 days, the lien shall date from such entry. As against such third parties, no money judgment obtained in this state outside of the county of the defendant's residence shall have a lien upon his property in any other county than where obtained, unless the execution is entered upon the general execution docket of the county of his residence within 30 days from the time the judgment is rendered, and when the execution is entered upon this docket after the expiration of 30 days the lien dates from the entry. See Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2778-2780.

In the present case no record of the execution or of the entries thereon was made on the execution docket of the superior court until after the expiration of more than seven years from the time of the rendition of the judgment and the issuing of the execution. If the act of 1885 was not changed by the act of 1889, the judgment was clearly dormant. Smith v. Bearden, 117 Ga. 822, 45 S. E. 59. The sole question in the present case is whether the entries upon the general execution docket served to keep the judgment in life. Prior to the act of 1889 there was no general execution docket kept. When that act provided that one should be kept in each county, this docket was not substituted in lieu of any of those already kept, but was additional. The act did not contemplate one docket, which should contain all that had been entered previously in the several dockets of the county. Each court of record had kept an execution docket as part of its records, and the act of 1889 did not change this. A plaintiff might have his execution entered upon the general execution docket or not, as he preferred. Thus the general execution docket did not show all that was shown by the other and older dockets. Again, the act of 1889 provided for the record, upon the general execution docket, of executions based on judgments obtained in other counties, and thus the general execution docket might contain matters not shown by the other dockets. The fee of the clerk for making the record upon the new docket was different from that for making entries upon the other docket. Thus we think it clear that the general execution docket was not intended as a substitute for all of the older dockets. Nor do we think that the act of 1885, as to the dormancy of judgments, was affected by it. The act of 1889 contained an express provision that "nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the validity or force of any deed, or mortgage, or judgment, or other lien of any kind, as between the parties thereto." Civ. Code 1895, § 2781. The dormancy of a judgment may be taken advantage of by the defendant as against the plaintiff or his assigns, and therefore affects the validity and force of the judgment. "An entry made by a proper officer upon an execution issued from a judgment, unless recorded upon the execution docket of the court from which the execution issued, will not, even as between the parties to the judgment, arrest the running of the dormancy statute." Nowell v. Haire, 116 Ga. 896, 42 S. E. 719. "A judgment is enforced against the defendant therein," and the act of 1885 provides that no dormant judgment "shall be enforced," and this is true without regard to whether the rights of third persons may be affected. Id. If the act of 1889 did not affect the validity or force of the judgment as between the parties, it could not affect the question as to whether the judgment was dormant, and that question must be determined without regard to it. The act of 1885 was therefore not changed or modified by the act of 1889. This view of the matter was taken by the codifiers of the Civil Code and by the General Assembly, for the provisions of both acts are embodied in that Code, evidencing a belief that both were of force. The act of 1889 merely made provision as to when transfers and liens should take effect as to third parties without notice. The general execution docket was made the means of giving notice of judgment liens by affecting third persons with notice of executions properly recorded therein. To this extent the act was well within the scope of its title. Had the act contained provisions affecting the validity or force of judgments as between the parties, it might well have been held that such provisions were unconstitutional as being beyond what was covered by the title. For these reasons we think that the act of 1889 must be held merely to fix the time when transfers and liens shall become effective as against third parties without notice, and to have no effect upon the validity and force of the judgment as between the parties thereto or upon the question of its dormancy.

It was argued, however, that the placing of the execution and the entries thereon upon the general execution docket was such a public act as would prevent the judgment from becoming dormant. This is not true. Under the ruling in Holles v. Lamb, 114 Ga. 740, 40 S. E. 751, a judgment may be prevented from becoming dormant either by proper and timely entries on the execution, duly recorded on the execution docket of the court from which it issued, or by active and bona fide efforts on the part of the plaintiff to enforce his execution by appropriate legal proceedings duly taken. In the opinion it was said that "the dormancy of a judgment is prevented either by proper entries every seven years, duly recorded on the execution docket, or by a bona fide public effort on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution in the courts of the country at such times and periods that seven years will not elapse between such attempts or between such an attempt and a proper entry." The mere record of an entry on the general execution docket is not an effort to enforce the execution, but a mistaken attempt to keep the judgment alive. Such a record is not such an active and public effort as was contemplated by that decision, and cannot be considered as sufficient to keep the judgment in life, especially as it is done under an act which, by its express terms, does not affect the validity or force of the judgment as between the parties thereto. The present case is clearly distinguishable for another reason. Hollis v. Lamb was put on the ground that the act of 1885 did not affect the question whether dormancy had been prevented by public efforts to enforce the execution in the courts of the country, but did make it necessary to properly record any entry which was relied upon to prevent dormancy. "That act," said Little, J., "made practically but one change in the law, * * * and that was that the entries made on an execution by the officer which were sufficient to prevent its dormancy should be entered upon the execution docket of the court from which it issued; and it is now declared * * * that when seven years have elapsed from the time of the record upon the execution docket of the last entry upon the execution, made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same, the judgment shall be dormant." In other words, the act of 1885 was held to apply to entries on the execution, and to make their record necessary to arrest the running of the dormancy statute, but not to apply to those other acts which by reason of their public character serve to keep the judgment alive. To hold now that the entries on the execution can be effective although not recorded in the manner prescribed would be to render the act of 1885 meaningless and nugatory. If that act means anything, it is that entries on an execution cannot serve to keep the judgment in life unless the entries are properly recorded. We hold that the record of the execution and the entries thereon upon the general execution docket was insufficient to prevent the judgment from becoming dormant, that the judgment was dormant when levied, and that the judge below was right in holding that the execution could not be enforced by levy.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except LAMAR, J., disqualified, and OANDLER and TURNER, JJ., who dissent.

TURNER, J. (dissenting). The act of 1822 was entitled "An act to amend the 26th section of the judiciary act, passed 16th day of December, 1789; and also to prevent the fraudulent enforcement of dormant judgments." Cobb's Dig. p. 496. The preamble recites that "dormant judgments, by being collusively kept open, are made the instruments of fraud on innocent purchasers; and often operate oppressively on vigilant and bona fide creditors." The third section of the act declared that "all judgments upon which no execution shall be issued, or on which no return shall be made on the execution, shall be void and of no effect." This section of the act was amended in 1823, by adding a proviso to the effect that judgments might be renewed or revived. This court, in an opinion from which the foregoing statement is taken, construing the acts according to their spirit and intention, held that "they contemplate no benefit to the defendant, but aim at the protection of innocent purchasers and vigilant and bona fide creditors from fraud." Lockwood v. Barefield, 7 Ga. 398; Butt v. Maddox, Id. 500; and subsequent cases to same effect. This view of the court, following the reason and spirit of the legislation, was reached, though the acts declared that "judgments upon which no execution shall be issued, or on which no return shall be made on the execution within seven years from the date of the judgment, shall be void and of no effect."

The eighth section of the limitation act of March 6, 1856, re-enacts the acts of 1822 and 1823 substantially, the provision that the judgments shall be null and void being changed into a provision that such judgments shall not be enforced. All the Codes prior to the present Code contained this section of the general limitation act of 1856: "No judgment hereafter obtained in the courts of this state shall be enforced after the expiration of seven years from the time of its rendition, when no execution has been issued upon it; or when execution has been issued, and seven years have expired from the time of the last entry upon the execution made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same." Code 1882, § 2914 (2863), (2855). And yet this court in 1888, considering the history of this law and its reason and purpose, held that a judgment could be enforced when there had not been within the period of seven years any entry upon it by an officer authorized to execute and return the same, but only a receipt by a notary public of his costs. Gholston, Adm'r, v. O'Kelley, Adm'r, 81 Ga. 19, 7 S. E. 107. The court said in that case: "It has always been held that section 2914 of the Code should receive an equitable construction; and it has also been held that any public act of the plaintiff going to show that the execution was still in life would be sufficient to prevent its becoming dormant." And in the opinion many cases are cited by the learned justice rendering the decision of the court. Wiley v. Kelsey, 3 Kelly, 274; Worthy v. Lowry, 19 Ga. 517; Ector v. Ector, 25 Ga. 274; Clark v. Feagan, 42 Ga. 269; Thrasher v. Foster, Id. 212; Water Lot Co. v. Bank of Brunswick, 58 Ga. 30; Nelson v. Gill, 56 Ga. 536. A careful and discriminating statement of these cases was given in detail, and this review contained the following quotation from the case in 56 Ga. 536: "Jackson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: 'If we should confine ourselves to the words of the statute, we should hold it dormant; but this court, in [Booth v. Williams] 2 Kelly [252] and [Wiley v. Kelsey] 3 Kelly [274], and many following cases, departed from the words, and have given the dormant acts an equitable construction. The principle arrived at seems to be that, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, any record facts which go to show that the judgment creditor was active, particularly if his want of activity during any of the time was caused by the act of the defendant, would operate to save the judgment from the operation of the act, such as claiming money in court in the case in 3 Kelly, and any official action upon the public dockets so as to notify the world that the plaintiff claimed that his judgment was subsisting, as in [Tanner v. Hollingsworth] 41 Ga. 133.'" And many other cases could be adduced of like tenor and effect.

The amendment of that section of the Code of 1882 by the act of 1885 (Acts 1884-85, p. 95) is embodied in section 3761 of our present Civil Code. "That act made practically but one change in the law as it then stood in relation to the dormancy of judgments, and that was that the entries made on an execution by the officer which were sufficient to prevent its dormancy should be entered upon the execution docket of the court from which it issued; and it is now declared in that section of the Code that, when seven years have elapsed from the time of the record upon the execution docket of the last entry upon the execution, made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same, the judgment shall be dormant. If the provisions of the previous law which required proper entries to be made upon the execution every seven years in order to prevent dormancy did not, under the construction of that statute by our court, render such judgment dormant in the absence of such entries when the plaintiff in fi. fa. was making public attempts to enforce his execution within the limitation, it would be inconsistent to now rule that the mere addition of a requirement that such entries should be placed upon the execution docket has abrogated the rule of equitable construction which has invariably been given to statutes in relation to the dormancy of judgments. In harmony with the spirit of the rulings heretofore made, and under the unbroken precedent giving to these statutes an equitable construction, it must be again ruled that the dormancy of a judgment is prevented either by proper entries every seven years, duly recorded on the execution docket, or by a bona fide public effort on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution in the courts of the country at such times and periods that seven years will not elapse between such attempts, or between such an attempt and a proper entry; and that a true construction of section 3761 of the Code is that either proper entries on the execution duly entered on the execution docket, or bona fide attempts to enforce the same against the property of the defendant within the stated period, will be sufficient to prevent dormancy." Hollis v. Lamb, 114 Ga. 740, 40 S. E. 751. And in the first headnote of the case it is held: "And in order to have this effect [to prevent dormancy] it is not necessary that any entry relating to such efforts, other than those otherwise required or authorized to be made on the execution, shall be entered either on the execution itself or the execution docket of the court in which the judgment was rendered." This was the unanimous decision of a full bench, as were the numerous other decisions of this court to the same effect heretofore cited. While the section of the Code under consideration on its face requires both an entry within time upon the execution, and upon the execution docket of the court, this equitable construction holds that a judgment may be saved from dormancy without either an entry upon the execution or upon the execution docket of the court from which it issued. It is true that this court, in the case of Nowell v. Haire, 116 Ga. 386, 42 S. E. 719, held that: "An entry made by a proper officer upon an execution issued from a judgment, unless recorded upon the execution docket of the court from which the execution issued, will not, even as between the parties to the judgment, arrest the running of the dormancy statute." And the case of Smith, Barry & Co. v. Bearden, 117 Ga. 822, 45 S. E. 69, follows the foregoing case, merely adopting the language just quoted. The case of Nowell v. Haire seems to be a new departure, and, without noticing the equitable rule of construction heretofore adopted by this court, is based strictly and literally on the very words of the statute. It does not seem that the former decisions of this court establishing a different rule were, by permission of the court, expressly questioned and reviewed; and it does not state whether it affirms, reverses, or changes the former decisions. Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6264. I therefore doubt the authority of these two decisions.

According to the precedents set by this court from the earliest times, which I think are unreversed, I venture with great deference to dissent from the opinion of the Chief Justice, and would hold that a proper entry upon an execution and the recording of such entry upon the general execution docket are such public acts, if done within time, as would, between the parties, arrest the running of the dormancy statute.

(135 N. C. 95)

CHAFFIN et al. v. FRIES MFG. & POWER CO.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—DAMS—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

1. It is not error to refuse instructions substantially embodied in the charge given by the court.

2. The language of an instruction exactly corresponding with the words of an issue submitted, to which no exception was taken, is not open to the criticism that it is misleading.

3. Where in an action for damages caused by the erection and maintenance of a dam across a stream the court made it clear to the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover, if anything, the damage caused by both the erection and maintenance of the dam, an instruction as to damages referring only to those caused by the erection of the dam was not misleading.

4. An instruction, in an action for damages caused by a dam across a stream, that it was not sufficient for plaintiff to show that his land had been damaged, but he "must further prove to the satisfaction of the jury" that this damage was caused by the dam, was not objectionable as requiring a greater degree of proof than a preponderance of the evidence, where the court charged that the burden was on plaintiff, and defined preponderance of the evidence.

5. In an action for damages for the maintenance of a dam across a stream plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damage, without showing an injury capable of being estimated, or one that is perceptible in the sense that it is attended with some actual damage; for the mere fact of ponding back the water on plaintiff's premises is sufficient to entitle him to nominal damages.

6. Where an instruction is erroneous, and is duly excepted to, the party excepting may avail himself of the error, though he asked no special instruction on the subject.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davie County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by Julia Chaffin and others against the Fries Manufacturing & Power Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

E. L. Gaither, E. J. Justice, and Lindsay Patterson, for appellants. Watson, Buxton & Watson, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The plaintiffs are the owners of a farm on the west bank of the Yadkin river. They bring this action to recover damages, both permanent and annual, for injury to the land alleged to have been caused by the erection and maintenance of a dam by the defendant across the river, and below their tract of land. They allege that the dam raised the water in front of their land about 6 feet, and there was evidence on the part of the defendant that it had been raised 2 feet and 9 inches, but that the banks of the river at that place were 14 feet high.

The plaintiffs claimed that by this rise in the water along their farm the fall in a branch running from their land into the river had been destroyed, and the water in the branch had been ponded back further on their lands, and that by reason of this loss in fall their lands had become incapable of being ditched, and had been rendered unproductive. And they further claimed that by raising the water six feet their lands had become more subject to overflow, and that thereby their bottom lands had been washed and rendered worthless. The defendant denied all of said allegations. There was much testimony introduced by both parties, some tending to show that the plaintiffs had been injured and damaged by the erection and maintenance of the dam, and some tending to show that they had not, but that the damage to their land was due to other causes than the erection of the dam. The court submitted to the jury the following issue, "What damage, if any, have plaintiffs sustained by reason of the erection of the dam?" The jury answered this issue, "None." There was a judgment upon this verdict against the plaintiffs, and they excepted and appealed.

The plaintiffs' first exception is to the refusal of the court to give their first prayer for instructions. In this prayer they requested the court to instruct the jury as to the estoppel against the plaintiffs arising out of the verdict and judgment in this case, because the damages would be assessed by the jury for all time, they being past, present, and prospective. If the plaintiffs were entitled to have this instruction given in the form in which it was asked, we are of the opinion that the nature of the suit and of the damages that could be awarded were fully explained to the jury by the court, and that plaintiffs were not prejudiced by the refusal to give the specific instruction. The same may be said of the second and third prayers for instructions, which related to the kind of damages to which plaintiffs would be entitled should the jury find in their favor. The plaintiffs cannot insist that the court should have given these instructions in the very language employed in framing them. It is a sufficient response to prayers if the court, in its own words, chosen, perhaps, so as not to do any injustice to either side, gives the instructions substantially, provided that the party who asks for them will have the full benefit of the principles of law he seeks to have applied to the facts. This rule is too familiar to need further comment or the citation of authority to support it.

The plaintiffs also complain that the court, in charging the jury as to the damages, referred only to those which were caused by the "erection" of the dam, and that by failing to use the words "and maintenance," the jury were misled as to the kind of damages the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and the court thereby excluded from their consideration any damages which may have resulted from the maintenance of the same. It will be observed that, if this criticism of the charge were correct in itself, the language of the court corresponds exactly with that of the issue, and to this issue, when submitted by the court, there was no exception. But we do not think the plaintiffs have any ground of complaint because of any such defect in the charge, as, upon even a cursory examination of it, we think it will appear that the court made it perfectly clear to the jury that plaintiffs were entitled to recover, if anything, the damage caused both by the erection and maintenance of the dam; not only damages caused at or immediately after the time of its erection, but those which have been caused since that time by the dam as an obstruction in the stream. We approve the charge of the court as to the proper rule for assessing the damages. Ridley v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1009, 24 S. E. 730, 32 L. R. A. 708; Parker v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 687, 25 S. E. 722.

No question is presented in this case as to the right of acquiring a perpetual easement by the payment of permanent damages. The defendant is not a public or quasi public corporation, and has not, therefore, the right to condemn private property for its uses, or, in other words, the right of eminent domain.

The plaintiffs' sixth exception was taken to the following instruction of the court to the jury: "It is not sufficient for the plaintiffs to show that their land has been damaged and their rental value decreased. They must further prove to the satisfaction of the jury that this damage was caused by the erection of the dam;" and the seventh exception was taken to this instruction: "If you find from the evidence that the erection of the dam caused water to be ponded on the lands of the plaintiffs to any appreciable extent, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover nominal damages, although you might not be satisfied that the plaintiffs have suffered substantial damages." The plaintiffs contend that by the first of said instructions the court required a greater degree or intensity of proof to be adduced by the plaintiffs than the rules of evidence warranted, and that all that is required by those rules is that plaintiffs should prove their case by the greater weight of the testimony, and not to the satisfaction of the jury. The part of the charge selected for the exception is not all of the charge as to the degree of proof required. The court had already charged the jury as follows: "The burden is upon the plaintiffs," etc., "to satisfy you that the erection of the dam was the cause of the damage to them, and of the extent of the injury. What is a preponderance? It is not to be determined by the number of witnesses, but determining whether there is a preponderance you will consider the demeanor of witnesses," etc. It will not do, in passing upon the correctness of a charge, to consider it in detached portions, but we must look at the context, and examine what follows in connection with that which precedes. In other words, the charge must be considered as a whole. Elliot v. Jefferson, 133 N. C. 211, 45 S. E. 558; Everett v. Spencer, 122 N. C. 1010, 30 S. E. 394. The same rule applies when deciding upon the admissibility of testimony. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944. When the part of the charge of the court excepted to is considered and tested by this reasonable rule of the law, we think it sufficiently, and, indeed, clearly, appears that the jury were instructed, at least substantially, that the plaintiffs were required to make out their case by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the court explained to them with sufficient fullness and accuracy what is meant by the preponderance of the testimony, and how the jury should apply the rule to the facts and circumstances of the case in order to determine whether plaintiffs had met the requirement. The use of the word "satisfied" did not intensify the proof required to entitle the plaintiffs to the verdict. The weight of the evidence must be with the party who has the burden of proof, or else he cannot succeed. But surely the jury must be satisfied, or, in other words, be able to reach a decision or conclusion, from the evidence, and in favor of the plaintiffs, which will be satisfactory to themselves. In order to produce this result, or to carry such conviction to the minds of the jury as is satisfactory to them, the plaintiffs' proof need not be more than a bare preponderance; but it must not be less. The charge, as we construe it, required only that plaintiffs should prove their case by the greater weight of the evidence. In Neal v. Fesperman, 46 N. C. 446, the court (by Pearson, J.), in stating the true rule in civil cases, said that "the party affirming a fact must prove it to the satisfaction of the jury, because the 'onus probandi' is upon him. If he does prove it to the satisfaction of the jury, it is settled that in civil actions he is entitled to a verdict in his favor upon the issue." After referring to the rule in capital cases, the court proceeds: "Suffice it, in civil cases, if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that an allegation is true in fact, it is their duty so to find, and they should be so instructed." To the same effect is Barfield v. Britt, 47 N. C. 45, 62 Am. Dec. 190, where the court says "that the party upon whom lay the onus probandi must produce such a preponderance of testimony as must satisfy the jury of the truth of his allegation." The rule, it is further stated, applies to all civil cases. It is said in Kincade v. Bradshaw, 10 N. C. 65, that "in civil cases juries weigh the evidence, and decide accordingly as either scale preponderates." This means, of course, that they weigh the evidence, and decide—that is, satisfy themselves—as to where the preponderance is. An unsatisfactory decision could hardly be called a decision at all, and a jury, acting intelligently and honestly, certainly would not adopt a conclusion from the evidence with which they were not satisfied. Wood's Pr. Ev. § 197. In criminal cases, when the defendant relies on mitigating circumstances, or sets up an affirmative defense, such as legal provocation, insanity, or self-defense, it is incumbent on him to prove the matter in mitigation or excuse, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of evidence, but simply to the satisfaction of the jury. State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26; State v. Carland, 90 N. C. 668; State v. Barringer, 114 N. C. 840, 19 S. E. 275; State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1006, 43 S. E. 832. Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that these cases are authority for the position that, if the jury must be satisfied, it required a greater degree of proof than if the plaintiff is allowed to make out his case by a mere preponderance of the evidence. We do not think this is a correct interpretation of the cases. The rule in criminal cases, as above stated, is supported by a long line of decisions, and is too well settled to admit of any change; but they do not sustain the contention of counsel. In criminal cases the jury decide upon the matters in mitigation or excuse without reference to any rule of law in regard to a reasonable doubt or the preponderance of the evidence. They are the sole judges upon the evidence of what is sufficient to satisfy them. In civil cases they must also be satisfied, but the party having the affirmative of the issue cannot entitle himself to their verdict unless the evidence preponderates in his favor.

The next instruction—which is the subject of the plaintiffs' seventh exception—it seems to us, is not as free from objection. The court charged the jury that the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover nominal damages if the water had been ponded on their lands "to any appreciable extent." Appreciable is defined as "capable of being estimated, or large enough to be estimated; perceptible, as an appreciable quantity." We do not think that, in order to recover nominal damages, it is necessary to show an injury that is capable of being estimated, or one that is perceptible in the sense that it is attended with some actual damage. Nominal damages are a small and trivial sum awarded for a technical injury due to a violation or invasion of some legal right, and as a consequence of which some damages must be awarded to determine the right. 1 Joyce on Damages, § 8; 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 9. These damages are not given as an equivalent for the wrong, but in recognition of the technical injury. It is not necessary that there should be any actual damage, however small. They are called nominal damages in contradistinction to actual, substantial, or compensatory damages. They are damages in name only, not in fact. See, also, Black's Law Dict. p. 316, "Damages." They have been described as a "peg on which to hang costs," but they are still recognized as the subject of a substantial legal claim, and a party is entitled to them if he can show any injury to his right. If he establishes a cause of action that is an injury in its technical sense, and fails to show any damnnum or damage, he can recover nominal damages. Osborn v. Leach, 133 N. C. 427, 45 S. E. 783. We find the law stated in Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) p. 74, as follows: "In the case of a distinct legal wrong, which in itself constitutes an invasion of the right of another, the law will presume that some damage follows as a natural, necessary, and proximate result. Here the wrong itself fixes the right of action. We need not go further to show a right of recovery, though the extent of recovery may depend upon the evidence." In the case of Little v. Stanback, 63 N. C. 285, the rule as to nominal damages in cases of this kind seems to have been settled by this court. It is there said: "The defendant asked his honor to charge the jury that, if there was water backed by the defendant's dam on the plaintiff's wheel, and it produced no injury to the plaintiff, the plaintiff was entitled to no damages, and their verdict should be for the defendant. His honor declined to give the instruction, but charged the jury that, 'if they were satisfied that the water was ponded back by the defendant's dam on the plaintiff's wheel, but produced no substantial injury, the plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages.' Giving to the exception and to his honor's charge a plain and just interpretation, we think that the point intended to be presented was, 'Is the mere fact of ponding back the water upon the plaintiff's premises sufficient to entitle him to nominal damages?' His honor thought it was, and we are of the same opinion. It is like a trespass on land, when the allegation is that the defendant broke the plaintiff's close and trod down his grass. It is clear that the mere entry upon the land, although there be not so much perceptible injury as the treading down a single sprig of grass, is a trespass, and entitles the plaintiff to nominal damages." It will be observed that the court, in describing the injury that will entitle the plaintiff to nominal damages, uses negatively the word "perceptible," which, as we have seen, is one of the synonyms of the word "appreciable." The case seems to be directly in point. If there is an infraction of the plaintiffs' legal right to the undisturbed possession of his property, the law absolutely gives at least nominal damages. A case which also seems to be directly in point is Wood v. Wared, 8 Exc. Wels., Hurl's & E. 746. The doctrine, as applicable to cases of this sort, is discussed and the authorities collected in Joyce on Damages, § 2140; 1 Sutherland on Damages, §§ 9, 10;

Ripka v. Sergeant, 7 Watts & S. 9, 42 Am. Dec. 214. The defendant contends that plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of this error of the court, as they asked no special instruction as to nominal damages. This was not necessary. The fault was in the charge, and was duly excepted to. It was an affirmative error.

The evidence as to the effect of the increased height of the water on the lands of N. A. Peebles we do not think was competent in order to show a corresponding effect upon the plaintiffs' lands. Comparisons such as this one cannot be made, as there was no evidence to show similarity of conditions. The proposed evidence would introduce irrelevant matters, and divert the minds of the jury from the true issue. Bruner v. Threadgill, 88 N. C. 361; Warren v. Makely, 85 N. C. 12. The competency of the testimony of the witness Reynolds depends upon a different principle. The evidence offered as to similar conditions of the banks of the stream above and below the dam with a view of showing that they had been washed out by freshets, and that their condition was not caused by the erection of the dam, was proper to be considered by the jury as a circumstance tending to sustain the defendant's contention. Its weight is for the jury to pass upon.

We have considered all of the plaintiffs' exceptions, as they, or some of them at least, may be presented at the next trial of the case, and for the further reason that they present important questions of practice and procedure of constant recurrence which should be settled. Because of the error in the charge as to nominal damages, there must be a new trial, and, as there was but one issue submitted to the jury, embracing both the cause of action and the damages, the new trial must extend to the whole case.

New trial.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—ALLEGATION AS TO JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

1. In a complaint to the corporation commission to compel a railroad company to deliver four cars of coal on a private siding, the complainant put no valuation either on the particular delivery or on the effect of a similar delivery of all cars in future. After an appeal to the superior court, the railroad company petitioned for removal to the federal Circuit Court, alleging that the proceeding was of a civil nature to assert the right of the complainant to have the commission order the company to deliver interstate shipments to the complainant, and that "the matter actually in controversy, involving the right of the defendant to manage its large interstate commerce without any interference on the part of the plaintiffs, largely exceeds the sum or value of $2,000." Held that, as the allegation as to value was a mere conclusion of law, unwarranted by the facts in the record or the petition, the petition was insufficient to oust the superior court of jurisdiction, and was properly denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Cooke, Judge.

Proceedings by the state, on the relation of the North Carolina Corporation Commission, against the Southern Railway Company. From the denial of a petition for the removal of the cause to the federal Circuit Court, the railroad company appeals. Affirmed.

King & Kimball, F. H. Busbee, R. O. Strong, and O. B. Northrop, for appellant. Scales, Taylor & Scales and the Attorney General, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This case is before us upon the appeal of the defendant from an order made at the February term, 1904, of the superior court of Guilford county, and in which his honor, Judge Cooke, overruled a motion of the defendant for the removal of the action to the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of North Carolina. The matter involved in the proceeding was commenced before the North Carolina Corporation Commission upon complaint of the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, and was instituted for the purpose of compelling the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff on its side track, at Greensboro, four cars of coal which had been consigned to the complainant, and brought by the defendant on its line of railway from the state of Virginia. It appears from the record in the case, and from the evidence as well, that the side track was built by the complainant at its own expense, with the exception of the iron rails, which the defendant furnished, and that it extended from the defendant's main line about 300 yards out to the complainant's coal and wood yard. It appeared, further, that while the side track was in process of construction a number of car loads of coal arrived in Greensboro consigned to the complainant, and that a contention afterwards arose between the parties on account of a charge against the complainant by the defendant in the nature of demurrage, the amount being $146. Upon the refusal of the complainant to pay the amount, or any part of it, the defendant notified, by letter, the complainant, that it would on that account not thereafter switch any cars to the side track, but would place them on the public team tracks of the defendant in its yard at Greensboro. There was a further statement in the letter to the effect that defendant found it necessary for the protection of its equipment to tender to the complainant further deliveries of cars upon tracks where they might be under defendant's immediate supervision and control. After a hearing of the matter before the corporation commission, an order was made by that body as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard upon complaint, and after notice to the defendant and an appearance by them, and it being made to appear to the commission by the plaintiff that four cars of coal consigned to the complainant have been conveyed to Greensboro by the Southern Railway Company, and that said cars are now and have been on the yards of said railway company for several days, and that the agents of said company were requested by said consignees to place said cars for unloading, soon after their arrival, on a side track built at the expense of and by said complainant and said railway company to facilitate the loading and unloading of complainant's freights, and that said consignees offered to pay the freight charges due on said cars of coal if the railway company would indicate their willingness to place them as requested by consignees; and it further appearing that the said railway company have refused to place the said cars as requested, and insist that they will place said cars only on public team tracks; and it further appearing that said cars of coal can be unloaded by consignees in much less time and at much less expense on the track constructed for that purpose than on public team tracks, and at no greater expense to the railway company; and it further appearing that the cause assigned by the Southern Railway for its refusal to place cars as requested by consignees is insufficient, namely, that consignees refused to pay certain demurrage charges which the railway company claims accrued on other cars while on public team tracks of said railway company, and which charges the consignees dispute and allege to be unjust—it is therefore ordered that the Southern Railway Company, upon the payment of the freight due on said cars of coal, and within forty-eight hours after service of this order, place the four cars of coal consigned to the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company on tracks provided by complainant and defendant for the loading and unloading of the freights of the complainant, to the end that the same may be unloaded, and the complainant receive their freights. Franklin McNeill, Chairman N. C. Corporation Commission."

Exceptions were filed to that order by the defendant, and on the 12th of November, 1903, they were heard by the corporation commission at Greensboro. They were as follows:

"To the Honorable the North Carolina Corporation Commission, Raleigh, North Carolina: The Southern Railway Company, a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Virginia, filed with your honorable board its exceptions to the particulars that it objects to your order or judgment of date October 31, 1903, relative to the placing of the four cars of coal involved upon the private track of the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company in Greensboro, North Carolina, and states the grounds thereof, as follows:

"Exception No. 1. That the side track of the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company is the private property of that company, with the exception of the rails, and is under the control of that company and built by that company for its own use and convenience, and not for the use or convenience of the Southern Railway Company; that, to make the said side track more useful and profitable to said coal and ice company, that company caused the track to be gradually raised so that cars of coal could be dumped into bins made under said track with the least inconvenience to the said coal and ice company; that during the construction of this work, and with no default on the part of the Southern Railway Company, certain demurrage charges accrued, under order No. 36, rules of your honorable board, on five car loads of coal and on eight car loads of wood, amounting in all to $146, and under promise to pay said amount, upon which the Southern Railway Company relied and acted, the said coal and ice company induced the Southern Railway Company to place the said car loads of coal and wood upon the said private side track, and said coal and ice company have since refused to pay said demurrage charges, though several times requested and demanded by the Southern Railway Company to do so; that the Southern Railway Company thereupon refused and still refuses to place any more cars of freight upon the private side track of the coal and ice company, and to extend them credit or part with their legal lien upon the four car loads of coal ordered placed by your honorable board, or with their legal lien upon any goods, wares, or merchandise, until all freight, demurrage, or other charges have been fully paid, which the said railway company submits it has the right to do.

"Exception 2. That the Southern Railway Company is ready and willing, and has repeatedly offered, to place said four cars of coal and other cars of merchandise accessible on its public team or delivery track in the city of Greensboro, N. C., and has placed said cars accessible as aforesaid, but the said coal and ice company refuses to so receive them. The Southern Railway Company contends and insists that the said coal and ice company has not any superior right to the delivery of their goods, wares, and merchandise, and that it is justified in refusing to place cars of coal and ice company upon its private siding or tracks, and thus part with their property.

"Exception 3. That the said order or judgment herein excepted to is contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives the Southern Railway Company of its property without due process of law, and denies to it the equal protection of the law for that: (a) It requires the railway company to part with the lien given it by law upon all goods, wares, and merchandise until the freight and demurrage and all other lawful charges are paid. (b) It requires the Southern Railway Company to give or extend credit to the said coal and ice company, which it is unwilling to do. (c) It is an adjudication of your honorable board without complaint and answer required by your own rules of practice, and without legal or any sufficient evidence before you necessary for the said judgment to be entered, and upon which these exceptions are based.

"Exception 4. That the said order or judgment herein excepted to is contrary and is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce, and to a certain act of Congress known as the 'Interstate Commerce Act,' in that the four car loads of coal, the subject of said order or judgment, were shipped to said coal and ice company at Greensboro from points in the state of Tennessee and the state of Virginia, and is an interference by your honorable board with interstate shipments.

"Whereupon the Southern Railway Company prays that said order herein excepted to be reviewed and vacated.

"This Nov. 2, 1903."

From the overruling of the exceptions, the defendant appealed to the superior court of Guilford county. On the first day of the term of that court to which the appeal was taken, the defendant lodged its motion for the removal of the cause to the Circuit Court. The petition, duly verified and signed, was as follows:

"To the Honorable the Superior Court of the County of Guilford, State of North Carolina: Your petitioner, Southern Railway Company, respectfully sheweth that it is the defendant in the above-entitled suit or proceeding, which was begun against it before the North Carolina Corporation Commission, and was transferred by appeal to the superior court of Guilford County, North Carolina, and that an informal paper in the nature of a complaint has been filed in the said action, and that the defendant, your petitioner, files this petition at or before the time when it is obliged to answer or demur to the complaint in the said superior court, and at its first opportunity to make such motion; that the matter in controversy therein exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000; that the said suit or proceeding is of a civil nature, and is a proceeding to assert and enforce the right of the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company to have the North Carolina Corporation Commission order and direct your petitioner to deliver certain interstate shipments to the plaintiff, Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, and, the matter actually in controversy, involving the right of the defendant to manage its large interstate commerce without any interference on the part of the plaintiffs, largely exceeds the sum or value of $2,000. Your petitioner further states that in the said above-mentioned suit or proceeding there is a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, to wit, a controversy between your petitioner, which was at the commencement of this action, and still is, a citizen and resident of the state of Virginia, and is not, and was not at the time this action began, a citizen and resident of North Carolina, and that the defendant is a corporation originally created by and under the laws of the state of Virginia, and was at the commencement of this suit, and still is, such; and the said North Carolina Corporation Commissioners and the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, who your petitioner avers were, at the commencement of this suit or proceeding, and still are, citizens of the state of North Carolina, some of whom, to wit, Franklin McNeill and Eugene C. Beddingfield, are residents of the Eastern District thereof, and Greensboro Ice & Coal Company and Samuel L. Rogers are citizens and residents of the Western District, and that the plaintiff, Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, is a corporation originally created by and under the laws of the state of North Carolina, and was at the commencement of this suit, and still is, such; and that all of the said defendants and your petitioner are actually interested in the said controversy. And your petitioner offers herewith a bond with good and sufficient surety in the sum of $500 for its entering in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of North Carolina, on the first day of its next session, a copy of the record in this action, and for paying all costs which may be awarded by the said Circuit Court if said court shall hold that this action was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and for entering a special bail if such be required. And your petitioner prays this court to proceed no further herein, except to make an order of removal and to accept the said surety and bond, and to cause the record herein to be removed into said Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Western District of North Carolina."

It appears to us from the record in the cause, including the petition, that his honor was right in refusing a motion to remove the cause, although he gave a wrong reason for the judgment, as we shall hereafter point out. We are aware that there are decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in which it is held that issues of fact cannot be made in the state courts upon the petition for removal, and that such issues must be tried in the Circuit Court; and we are not in the least disposed to question the correctness of those decisions. We know, however, that in those same decisions it was held that the state court could determine for itself, on the face of the record, whether a removal had been effected. In Stone v.

South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430, 6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962, the court said: "A state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction on a petition for removal until a case has been made, which on its face shows that the petitioner has a right to the transfer. Yulee v. Vose, 99 U. S. 539, 545, 25 L. Ed. 355; Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457, 474, 25 L. Ed. 593. It is undoubtedly true as was said in Steamship Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118, 122, 1 Sup. Ct. 58, 27 L. Ed. 87, that upon the filing of the petition and bond—the suit being removable under the statute—the jurisdiction of the state court absolutely ceases, and that of the Circuit Court of the United States immediately attaches; but still, as the right of removal is statutory, before a party can avail himself of it, he must show upon the record that his is a case which comes within the provision of the statute. As was said in Insurance Co. v. Pechner, 95 U. S. 183, 185, 24 L. Ed. 427: 'His petition for removal, when filed, becomes a part of the record in the cause. It should state facts which, when taken in connection with such as already appear, entitle him to the transfer. If he fails in this, he has not, in law, shown to the court that it cannot "proceed further with the suit." Having once acquired jurisdiction, the court may proceed until it has been judicially informed that its power over the case has been suspended.' The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit which is not removable does not work a transfer. To accomplish this the suit must be one that may be removed, and the petition must show a right in the petitioner to demand a removal." The record in this case, if we leave out for the present the petition, shows that the object of the proceeding, technically and literally, was to compel the defendant to place upon the side track leading to the complainant's coal yards the four car loads of coal which the defendant was refusing to deliver under an alleged contract with the complainant at the time the complaint was made before the corporation commission. But suppose we give a broader significance to the complaint and order made therein, as to the effect of the order upon the defendant in thereafter being compelled by repeated orders to deliver each and all car loads of coal that the defendant company might bring upon their line of railway into Greensboro, consigned to the complainant; is not the petition of the defendant for removal fatally defective in that it does not put a valuation upon the advantage which the plaintiff might derive from such a construction of its complaint and the order of the corporation commissioners? Suppose it be admitted that this proceeding, when begun before the corporation commissioners, was in the nature of a suit in equity, and that the amount in controversy should be measured by the value of the object to be gained by the plaintiff; is there anything in the petition going to show that such advantage or benefit to the plaintiff was worth $2,000? In such equity cases as we have referred to, "it is the value of the whole object of the suit to the complainant which determines the amount in controversy," as was said in Railway Company v. McConnell (C. C.) 82 Fed. 65. The plaintiff in its complaint put no valuation upon what might be the effect of the delivery to it on its side track, either of the four particular cars, or of the delivery of all cars that might in the future be consigned to him over the defendant's railroad; and the defendant in its petition makes no statement as to the "amount in controversy" in either aspect of the plaintiff's benefit and advantage.

It appears from a careful reading of the petition that the statement as to the amount in controversy was based, not upon the amount that the object of the action might be to the plaintiff, but to the inconvenience and loss of the defendant because of the interference of the corporation commission with the right of the defendant to manage its large interstate commerce. The exact language of the petition on this point is as follows: "That the said suit or proceeding is of a civil nature, and is a proceeding to assert and enforce the right of the Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, to have the North Carolina Corporation Commission order and direct your petitioner to deliver certain interstate shipments to the plaintiff, Greensboro Ice & Coal Company, and the matter actually in controversy, involving the right of the defendant to manage its large interstate commerce without any interference on the part of the plaintiff, largely exceeds the sum or value of $2,000." That statement as to the matter in controversy is simply a conclusion of law, and an erroneous one in our opinion, from the facts as they appear in the record, and even in the petition. The matter in controversy was not an attempt on the part of the complainant to interfere with the general business of the defendant—the "large interstate commerce" of the defendant—but was only an order affecting the delivery of certain car loads of coal consigned to the complainant, and, as we have said, there was no valuation by the defendant of that benefit secured to the plaintiff by the order. We think the petition was filed in apt time, but that it ought to have been denied for the reasons we have given. Affirmed.

EXECUTORS — ACCOUNTS — EFFECT — ESTOPPEL — CREDITS — EXPENDITURES FOR LEGATEES
— IMPLIED PROMISE OF REPAYMENT.

1. Under Code, § 1399, requiring executors to file annual accounts with the clerk of the superior court, giving the clerk power to examine the executor or any other person concerning the receipts and disbursements, and making his approval of the account prima facie evidence of its correctness, the account so filed and approved by the clerk, while prima facie correct, is no more conclusive than an account stated, and the executor is not estopped to impeach it in another proceeding.

2. An executor, whose wife is the residuary legatee under the will of the testator, is not entitled to credits for sums paid for taxes on his wife's land, or for money paid to defray his wife's expenses on a trip.

3. Where a husband, acting as executor under a will in which his wife was named as residuary legatee, paid taxes on his wife's land, and defrayed her expenses on a trip, as he was under no legal obligation to make such expenditures, the law would not imply a promise on the part of his wife to repay him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rowan County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

John S. Henderson, for appellant. A. H. Price, Walter Murphy, and Theo. F. Klutz, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff, who is the wife of the defendant, is the residuary legatee under the will of Nancy Smith, and the defendant is the executor of the latter, and qualified as such in March, 1889. On December 22, 1896, the plaintiff caused a citation to be issued by the clerk of the superior court to the defendant to appear at a time stated in the notice and file an account under sections 1390 and 1400 of the Code. The defendant appeared and filed the account, and insisted before the clerk that he was entitled to two credits, one for taxes paid by him "for the benefit of the plaintiff" on her land for the years 1892 to 1896, both inclusive, amounting to $775, and the other for money paid by him to R. J. Holmes to defray the plaintiff's expenses to Baltimore. The clerk disallowed these claims, and, upon auditing the account, found that defendant owed the estate a clear balance of $466.45. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action in the superior court to recover said balance.

There is some reference in the case to other legacies which had not been paid, and it does not appear, except by inference, whether the $466.45 is due to the estate merely for distribution among the several legatees, or is due to plaintiff, after paying all claims and legacies and the costs and expenses of administration. The plaintiff, though, sues for this balance, and the defendant, in his answer, admits that it is due to the plaintiff, unless he is entitled to the said credits. The court ruled that the defendant could not successfully assert his claim, "because he was estopped to deny the adjudication of the clerk." The ruling of the court was correct—that is, its conclusion—but the reason given therefor was not. The defendant was not estopped by the proceeding before the clerk. The account as filed and stated in response to the citation had no more force or effect against him than the account would have had if he had filed it voluntarily. The statute expressly provides that "it shall be deemed prima facie evidence of correctness," even when it is audited by the clerk by the examination of vouchers or witnesses, or of both. The auditing is an ex parte proceeding and has none of the features or characteristics of that kind of judicial proceeding the judgment in which works an estoppel upon the parties. This would seem to be so whether the account was filed under section 1390 or section 1402, as the language of the two sections in regard to the manner of compelling the filing of the account, whether annual or final, and of auditing the same, is substantially alike, although the words "shall be deemed prima facie evidence of correctness" are omitted in section 1402. Grant v. Hughes, 94 N. C. 231. In Allen v. Royster, 107 N. C., at page 282, 12 S. E. page 135, this court said: "But it [the account] was not conclusive against the plaintiff [next of kin], nor would it be against the creditors or any person interested adversely. It simply shifted the burden of proof as to the correctness of what it contained to him who alleged the contrary." Rowland v. Thompson, 64 N. C. 714. In Collins v. Smith, 109 N. C., at page 471, 14 S. E. page 90, the same principle is stated: "The record shows, and the fact is found, that at the instance of the plaintiffs the final account of the defendant was audited and filed, the plaintiffs being present and contesting various items therein. There is no allegation of any fraud or mistake in the final account so audited, nor is it attacked in any way by the plaintiff, and it is at least prima facie correct." While it is to be considered as prima facie correct, it has no more conclusive effect than an account stated, and is open to attack. The defendant could at least surcharge and falsify it, if he was able to do so.

But we do not think that the defendant was entitled to either of the two credits claimed by him. As executor he was not charged with the duty of paying the taxes on his wife's land, and this and the other item could in no way enter into or form a part of his transactions as the representative of his testator. Young v. Kennedy, 95 N. C. 265. If he was not himself under any legal obligation to make the advancements of money for his wife, the law will not, under the facts and circumstances of this case, imply any promise of his wife to repay him. Jenne v. Marble, 37 Mich. 322; Pittman v. Pittman, 4 Or. 298. We conclude, therefore, that in no view of the case was he entitled to the credits. This, of course, sustains the decision of the court below.

No error.

ACTIONS—JOINDER OF ACTIONS—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—ACTION AGAINST PLAINTIFF—ACTION AGAINST SURETY—COURTS—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT INVOLVED.

1. Code, § 267 (1), provides that a plaintiff may unite in one complaint several causes of action where they arise out of the same transaction connected with the same subject of action; and section 267 (7) provides that each of them must affect all of the parties to the transaction. Held, that a plaintiff could not unite in one suit a cause of action for wrongful attachment and one against the surety on the attachment bond for a breach thereof.

2. An action against a surety on an attachment bond in the penal sum of $200 is not within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

3. Code, § 272, provides that on misjoinder of causes of action the court shall order the action to be divided into as many actions as necessary. Held, that where two causes of action are improperly joined, but one of them because of the amount involved, is not within the jurisdiction of the court, it must be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Pittsburg, Johnstown, Ebensburg & Eastern Railroad Company against the Wakefield Hardware Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

• Scales, Taylor & Scales and Robert D. Douglas, for appellant.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for wrongfully suing out an attachment, and was tried below on a demurrer to the complaint. The plaintiff alleges substantially that the plaintiff, the defendant hardware company, and the North Carolina Coal & Coke Company are corporations, and that the coal and coke company being indebted to the hardware company for goods sold and delivered, the latter brought an action for the recovery of the debt against the railroad company and the coal and coke company, and caused a warrant of attachment to be issued, which in February, 1901, was levied on 10 cars then at the mine of the coal and coke company, and that said cars were seized and held until April, 1903; that at the time the warrant was issued the hardware company gave a bond in the sum of $200, with the usual condition, upon which the defendant A. W. Vickory is surety; and that said attachment suit was dismissed as to the plaintiff, with costs, and judgment rendered against the coal and coke company for the amount of the debt in favor of the hardware company. Plaintiff then brought this action against the latter company and the surety on its attachment bond, A. W. Vickory, alleging that the attachment was wrongfully sued out, and praying for the recovery of compensatory and punitive damages. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the following grounds: (1) That there is a misjoinder of parties, the defendant Vickory not being a necessary or proper party to the cause of action at common law for wrongfully and maliciously suing out the attachment, but being liable, if at all, only on the bond; (2) that two causes of action are improperly joined—one for wrongfully and maliciously causing the attachment to be issued, and the other for a breach of the condition of the attachment bond. The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

The demurrer should have been sustained on both grounds. The plaintiff has alleged in his complaint two causes of action, though he has not stated them separately, as he should have done. Code, § 267 (7). Causes of action may be united in a complaint when they arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action, whether they be in contract or in tort (Code, § 267 [1]; Cook v. Smith, 119 N. C. 350, 25 S. E. 958), but each of them must affect all the parties to the transaction (section 267 [7]). "It is not sufficient that some of the defendants be affected by each of them. All of the defendants must be affected by each of them to warrant the union of them in one suit." Howse v. Moody, 14 Fla. 65. In this case the plaintiff has sued the hardware company for wrongfully and maliciously causing to be issued the attachment for which the said company alone is liable in damages, and has joined as a defendant A. W. Vickory, the surety on the attachment bond, who is liable solely by reason of his suretyship on his contract of indemnity, and to the amount only of the penalty of the bond, $200. One cause of action, therefore, is for the wrongful and malicious injury to the plaintiff (using the word "injury" in its technical sense), and the other is for the breach of the condition of the attachment bond, and the defendant Vickory can in no way be "affected" by the former. He is not liable generally to the plaintiff for damages simply because he signed the bond as surety, but his liability arises entirely out of contract, and is quite different in its nature from that of his codefendant for the tort it is alleged to have committed in maliciously suing out the attachment. Fell v. Porter, 69 N. C., at page 142. The defendant Vickory is liable by reason of his undertaking, according to the statute, to the effect that, if the defendants recover judgment, or the attachment is set aside by order of the court, the plaintiff in the attachment suit "will pay all costs awarded against it, and all damages sustained by reason of the attachment." As said by Pearson, C. J., for the court, in Fell v. Porter, supra, a sheriff may be liable on an implied contract upon a principle of the common law, while as to his surety there is no such implied undertaking.

and no other liability save that which is set out in his bond, it being an obligation to pay to a certain amount subject to conditions. The liability of the surety is said to be strictissimi juris, which means no more than that he shall not be held to answer beyond the precise terms of his contract, and only to the extent that the particular liability which is alleged to exist is covered by his written obligation. Pingrey on S. & G. § 112. When he is called upon to answer for any liability based on his suretyship, he has a right always to ask, "Is it so nominated in the bond?" or other instrument which is the evidence of his undertaking. Whether, if Vickory had been liable jointly with his codefendant for the tort alleged to have been committed in wrongfully and maliciously suing out the attachment, he could properly have been joined with the latter in an action upon that liability and also upon the bond, is a question we need not decide, as it is not presented upon this record. Fell v. Porter, supra. In the case of Cook v. Smith, 119 N. C., at page 356, 25 S. E. 958, this court, speaking by the present chief justice, said: "Always, when the sheriff is sued for official liability, he is responsible personally, and his surety should be sued on the relation of the state; but it has never been held a defect to join them." This was said with reference to the separate liability of the sheriff for an official act, which at the same time constituted a breach of his bond, so that while the sheriff in such a case is personally liable, as if he had not signed the bond, his surety is liable for the act of the sheriff because it is also a breach of his bond. The two liabilities are, in legal effect, the same. They are identical and coextensive in principle, though not in amount. But when the officer or principal, in addition to the liability on his bond, is independently liable by reason of some act for which the surety is not liable, or which, in other words, does not come within the scope of the latter's undertaking, it is manifest that the surety is not affected by the cause of action upon the separate liability of the officer or principal, and the two causes of action—the one against the officer on his separate liability and the other against the surety on the bond—cannot be joined. Hoye v. Raymond, 25 Kan. 605; Howse v. Moody, supra. There must be at least substantial identity between the causes of action before they can be united in one suit, because, if there is not, the several causes of action may, for their decision, depend upon very different facts and principles of law, which would tend to confusion and uncertainty in the trial of the case, and result in great prejudice to some, if not all, of the parties.

As the two causes of action cannot be united in one and the same complaint, there is another fatal defect to be found in the plaintiff's present suit so far as the defendant Vickory is concerned. The liability on the attachment bond is one growing out of contract, and any action thereon against the surety is, of course, ex contractu. 1 Shinn on Attachment, § 182, p. 807; Kneeland on Attachment, § 453. As the penalty is only $200, the superior court has no jurisdiction of an action upon the bond. Katzenstein v. Railroad, 84 N. C. 688; Maggett v. Roberts, 108 N. C. 174, 12 S. E. 890; Joyner v. Roberts, 112 N. C. 111, 16 S. E. 917.

While the two causes of action stated in the complaint could not be joined for the reasons we have given, the misjoinder does not require the action to be dismissed, as, under the provisions of section 272 of the Code, the court, in the case of a misjoinder of causes of action, "shall order the action to be divided into as many actions as may be necessary to the proper determination of the causes of action therein mentioned." This cannot be done in the present case, for the court would not have jurisdiction of the separate cause of action against Vickory on the attachment bond, the amount of the penalty being only $200; but the provision of the statute will be followed to the extent that it can be by dismissing the action as to Vickory.

The case of McCall v. Zachary, 131 N. C. 466, 42 S. E. 903, is not at all at variance with anything said in this opinion, but is, we think, in perfect harmony with the principle we have stated. In that case, the plaintiff sued the defendant to recover the fees of the office of solicitor, which had been collected by him during his incumbency of that office; the plaintiff having previously been adjudged to be entitled to it. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had received $500 as fees, and he declared against defendant for the recovery of that amount, and also against his sureties for the recovery of $200, the penalty of the bond given by them for the defendant in the quo warranto action to secure the payment to the plaintiff of the fees to that amount in the event of the latter's success in that action. It will be observed that the nonpayment of the fees by Zachary to the plaintiff was the gravamen of the action—the cause of action—and in itself was a breach of the bond. It was not a separate and distinct cause, but the same cause as the one upon the bond; the only difference being that the defendant Zachary was liable for a greater amount than his sureties. In the opinion of the court, delivered by Furches, C. J., it is said that the bond for $200 is not the cause of action, but the failure to pay the $500 collected by the defendant, and the bond is only a security for the plaintiff of that amount pro tanto, or to the extent of its penalty. There was but one cause of action, which was on contract. The recovery against Zachary and his sureties was upon a single default, and was founded upon one and the same principle throughout. In our case, on the contrary, there is a cause of action for the malicious injury, which is different in its nature and scope from that on the bond. An act of the principal, which would merely constitute a breach of the bond, would not be sufficient to warrant a recovery upon the other cause of action. Drake in his work on Attachments, says: "It has been uniformly held in this country that an attachment plaintiff may be subjected to damages for attaching the defendant's property maliciously and without probable cause. The defendant's remedy in this respect is not at all interfered with by the plaintiff having at the institution of the suit given bond with security to pay all damages the defendant may sustain by reason of the attachment having been wrongfully sued out."

The line of distinction between the two causes of action is clearly "run and marked" in the following cases: Burnap v. Wight, 14 Ill. 301; Lawrence v. Hagerman, 56 Ill. 68, 8 Am. Rep. 674. See, also, Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) p. 218. In the first case cited it is said: "The direct pecuniary injury to the defendant may be as great in the one case as in the other. This direct pecuniary loss is all that can be recovered in an action on the bond. If the writ is sued out maliciously and without probable cause, the defendant may maintain an action for malicious prosecution; and in such an action he may recover damages for every injury to his credit, business, or feelings. Such matters are peculiarly the proper subjects of inquiry, and the jury may give damages commensurate with the injuries sustained; but such injuries as may be redressed only where malice exists and probable cause is wanting ought not to be taken into consideration in an action on the bond." The action for the malicious wrong is one which exists independently of any statutory provision as to a bond. In Newark Coal Co. v. Upson, 40 Ohio St. 25, the doctrine is thus tersely stated: "It may now be considered the approved doctrine that an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit may be maintained whenever, by virtue of any order or writ issued in the malicious suit, the defendant in that suit has been deprived of his personal liberty, or of the possession, use, or enjoyment of property of value. The name or form of the writ or process is immaterial. It may be an order of arrest, or of attachment, or of injunction." See, also, Tomlinson v. Warner, 9 Ohio, 104; Fortman v. Rottier, 8 Ohio St. 548, 70 Am. Dec. 606. A strong authority in support of the distinction we have made is Pettit v. Mercer, 8 B. Mon. 51.

It follows from what we have said that the demurrer should have been sustained as to the cause of action against Vickory on the attachment bond. This ruling eliminates that cause of action, and the suit may proceed against the hardware company if the plaintiff desires to further prosecute the same. Ashe v. Gray, 90 N. C. 137; Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Barrett, 95 N. C. 36; Finch v.

Baskerville, 85 N. C. 205. The case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion of this court.

BROWN'S GUARDIAN v. STROTHER'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Dec. 8, 1903.)

AFTER ABSOLUTE ESTATE.

1. Where a will provided, "I give to my brother and sister all I possess on earth for their support, to be used in no other way," the brother and sister took an absolute equitable estate, with full power to consume the same in their support; and a further provision that, if there was anything left at the death of the brother and sister, it should go to certain persons, was void for repugnancy and uncertainty.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Loudoun County.

Proceedings for the construction of the will of James B. Strother, deceased, between Ruth Brown's guardian and William and Effie Strother's administrator. From a decree for the latter, the former appeals. Affirmed.

N. C. Nichols and Christian & Christian, for appellant. Cecil Connor, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This proceeding calls for a construction of the last will and testament of James B. Strother, deceased, which is in the words following:

"I, James B. Strother, do hereby make this my last will and testament. I give to William and Effie, my brother and sister all I possess on earth for their support, to be used in no other way, and I hereby appoint Thadens Hatcher my trustee, without security, to see that it is judiciously used. On no occasion are they to have any part of while they remain on this farm, and if there is any left after their death I give to J. Homer Mock and Lucy V. Mock fifty dollars apiece ($50.00), and I give all that is over to the youngest child of the late Edward Brown, at Beans Mill, and I direct my trustee to pay my just debts and funeral expenses. I want my trustee to be paid for his services."

From the facts agreed, it appears that the testator, William, and Effie Strother were two bachelor brothers and an unmarried sister, who lived together as one family until they successively died. Each lived to be over 75 years of age. For the 15 years next preceding the death of the testator, they lived together upon a farm. The testator made his will February 16, 1899, and died about the last of November, 1899. In the early part of the following spring (1900) William and Effie broke up housekeeping and left the farm, and never returned thereto. Effie died in July, 1900, and William in August, 1901. The estate left by the testator consisted of money and choses in action, amounting, after paying debts, funeral expenses, and costs of administration, etc., to $1,252.98, as shown by settlement made and filed with the record. Effie at the time of testator's death owned virtually no property; and William, after the payment of his debts, not more than two or three hundred dollars. The youngest child of Edward Brown, mentioned in the will, was Ruth Brown, about seven years of age. She was remotely related to the testator, and he was very fond of her. The two Mock children named in the will resided on a farm adjacent to that upon which the testator lived during the last years of his life.

William and Effie Strother having performed the condition precedent mentioned in the will, by leaving the farm therein alluded to, we are of opinion that they took under the will of their brother, James, a joint and equal equitable estate in all that the testator possessed, with full power to consume the same in their support, and that the limitations over in favor of the two Mocks and the child of Edward Brown are void for repugnancy and uncertainty. This case is controlled by a long line of decisions of this court, running from an early day to the present time, which hold that whenever in any devise or conveyance a life estate is given, and there is afterwards given the life tenant, or first taker, power to dispose of or consume the corpus of the estate, the first taker is vested with a fee-simple estate, and all limitations over are void on the ground of repugnancy and uncertainty. Among the numerous cases in support of this doctrine may be cited May v. Joynes, 20 Grat. 692; Missionary Society v. Calvert, 32 Grat. 357; Carr v. Effinger, 78 Va. 197; Cole v. Cole, 79 Va. 251; Hall v. Palmer, 87 Va. 354, 12 S. E. 618, 11 L. R. A. 610, 24 Am. St. Rep. 633; Bowen v. Bowen, 87 Va. 428, 12 S. E. 885, 24 Am. St. Rep. 664; Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 480, 21 S. E. 810; Davis v. Hepert, 98 Va. 775, 32 S. E. 467.

In the case at bar the first takers are given an absolute equitable estate in all that the testator "possessed on earth," with the implied power incident to such an estate to consume the same, as well as the expressed power to consume it in their support. Such a gift comprehends everything, and the limitations over are, under the authorities cited, void for repugnancy and uncertainty.

The decree complained of, in favor of the administrator of William and Effie Strother, is free from error, and must be affirmed.

Dent, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ritchie County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Bill by C. P. Morrison & Co. and another against Minerva Leach and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

V. B. Archer and William Beard, for appellants. Van Winkle & Ambler, Merrick & Smith, and W. W. Jackson, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. A bill in equity filed in the circuit court of Wood county by C. P. Morrison & Co. and John A. Page, suing for themselves and all other creditors of Thompson Leach, deceased, against Minerva Leach, executrix of Thomas Leach, and others, stated that the plaintiffs were creditors of Thompson Leach, and that said executrix had before that filed a bill to convene the creditors of Leach, fix their debts, sell his real estate, and apply the assets to the payment of such debts, and that a decree had been made fixing debts against the estate—among them, those of Morrison & Co. and Page—and also a large debt in favor of the Parkersburg National Bank, and directing Leach's real estate to be sold by the executrix, and that she had sold the real estate, and that the sales were confirmed, and that the assets were not sufficient to pay the debts in full. The bill further stated that Minerva Leach, as executrix, gave bond, with Dave D. Johnson and J. L. Buckley as sureties; that she had failed to comply with the decree by applying the assets coming to her hands as directed by it, and had wasted the assets; that notes given by purchasers of the realty to the executrix had been turned over to J. L. Buckley, or the Parkersburg National Bank, to be held by them as collateral security for their debts; and that there had been paid to Buckley and Johnson and the Parkersburg National Bank, out of the assets, money in excess of the ratable portion going to them. The bill prayed that the executrix and her bondsmen be held liable for such assets, and that the Parkersburg National Bank and other creditors who had received more than their proper pro rata shares of the assets be held liable therefor. The said Johnson and Buckley were sureties in the executorial bond of the executrix. Upon the bill of Morrison & Co. and Page, taken for confessed as to the Parkersburg National Bank, a decree was pronounced against MInerva Leach, Dave D. Johnson, and J. S. Buckley, by reason of the executorial bond, for $3,878.72, to be paid to Levi Lewis as a special commissioner constituted by the decree to make distribution of the funds as directed by the decree; and the decree further required that the Parkersburg National Bank pay into the hands of said Lewis, on account of money received from the estate of Leach in excess of its pro rata share of the assets, $2,122.38, which, when paid, should be a credit on the $3,878.72 decreed against Leach, Johnson, and Buckley. After this decree the bank moved the circuit court to reverse the decree for certain causes, giving notice of the motion only to the plaintiffs, Morrison & Co. and Page, and giving no notice to Minerva Leach or Lewis, and upon such motion a decree was entered reversing the above-mentioned decree so far as it required said bank to pay said sum of $2,122.30. Later still a decree was entered dismissing the bill so far as it sought to make said bank liable to Leach's estate or its creditors. From the two last mentioned decrees Minerva Leach appeals, and Levin Smith cross-assigns error therein.

Section 5, c. 134, Code 1899, provides that a decree entered upon a bill taken for confessed may be reversed on motion, but that "reasonable notice to the opposite party, his agent or attorney," of such motion must be given. "Opposite party," under this statute, does not mean only the plaintiff, but any party to the suit who has an interest in upholding the decree sought to be reversed, whose pecuniary or property interest would be prejudiced by reversal. The word "opposite," as used in the statute, means opposite in interest. The statute as to depositions requires notice to the "adverse party." I do not think a deposition can be read against any party without notice to him, no matter whether he is plaintiff or defendant. It cannot possibly be thought that a decree can be reversed without notice to a person interested in its maintenance. He has no day in court. It would take his property without due process of law. We cannot give the statute a construction which would militate against the Constitution and inflict gross injustice. Minerva Leach had a deep, actual interest in having the decree against the bank maintained, because the sum decreed against it operated as a partial payment on the sum decreed against her, and increased the assets of the estate in which she was distributee, to say nothing of her right as executrix to represent the estate. The decree of reversal as to her was void—a simple nullity. Though that decree is a nullity, an appeal lies from it, because a null decree may be assailed collaterally, or directly by appeal, or by bill of review, where such bill of review suits the case. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724. It cannot be said that Minerva Leach must first herself move the circuit court to reverse the decree of reversal; since it was rendered in absence of appearance by her to the motion. Any one has a right to appeal from an erroneous decree, as a general principle, whether on a bill taken for confessed or on appearance; but chapter 134 curtails this right of appeal in case of a decree on a bill taken for confessed to the extent that it requires first an unsuccessful motion in the circuit court. But this applies only to cases upon a bill taken for confessed. It is so limited. It does not apply to an erroneous decree upon a motion to reverse under chapter 134. From such decree an appeal at once lies. That chapter gives it, as well as chapter 135. Midkiff v. Lusher, 27 W. Va. 439. The circuit court could not, for want of notice to Minerva Leach, decide upon anything assigned as ground to reverse the decree, because it had no jurisdiction; nor can we do so.

We cannot say whether the decree dismissing the bill as to the bank is right or wrong, because Minerva Leach has made no motion to reverse it in the circuit court, it being a decree in the absence of her appearance. Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586; Forest v. Stephens, 21 W. Va. 316. Whether by reason of this decision the decree dismissing the case as to the bank is made null and void, because of the finality of the first decree ending the case, which decree is reinstated by this decision, or merely erroneous, we do not say. Whatever its status, we cannot pass on it, for want of such motion.

The decree of the 21st day of June, 1900, is reversed so far as it sustains the motion of the Parkersburg National Bank to reverse the decree pronounced in this cause on the 23d day of February, 1899, and reverses so much of the latter decree as ordered said bank to pay $2,122.30 to Special Commissioner Levin Smith, and said motion is overruled, which is ordered to be certified to said circuit court. No remand.

DENT, J. I must dissent in this case. The bill was taken for confessed as to Minerva Leach. She never appeared in the cause, except to make an exception to a commissioner's report, which was sustained in her favor. So the cause in all other respects stands on bill taken for confessed. On the 21st day of February, 1899, a decree was entered against the Parkersburg National Bank for the sum of $2,965.42, to be paid to Levin Smith, special receiver, to be distributed in certain proportions among a large number of creditors of Thompson Leach, deceased; and, if collected and so distributed, Minerva Leach was to have credit therefor on a large debt decreed against her. There was no decree in her favor against the Parkersburg National Bank, and she was only collaterally interested in such decree, while the plaintiff and all the other creditors of Thomas Leach, deceased, were directly interested therein. On the 29th day of April, 1899, another order was entered in the cause awarding execution against the Parkersburg National Bank for the sum aforesaid. The cause was continued on the docket for a final distribution of the funds, and for the future report of the special receiver. On the 5th day of March, 1900, the Parkersburg National Bank filed its notice of error in the decree of the cause, which it had given to the plaintiffs, the parties at whose instance the decree was entered against it. The motion to correct the decree was then submitted to the court, who took it under advisement. On the 21st day of June, 1900, the court entered another decree, reciting that "this cause came on again this the 21st day of June, 1900, to be further heard upon the papers formerly read and proceedings herein before had, the notice duly executed on the plaintiff that the Parkersburg National Bank would move the court to set aside the decree of February 23, 1899, the motion in accordance with said notice, and was argued by counsel." Then the court proceeded, among other things, to set aside the former decree in so far as the Parkersburg National Bank was concerned, and recommitted the cause to a commissioner, with instructions as to the extent of his inquiry. Is this such a final decree as is appealable? The court still had jurisdiction of the cause, and it now merely enters an order setting aside a former decree, without adjudicating the principles of the cause, and refers the same to a commissioner. This order neither settles the principles of the cause, nor is it final, but is purely interlocutory. Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. 560; Laidley v. Kline's Adm'r, 21 W. Va. 21; Kanawha Lodge v. Swann, 37 W. Va. 178, 16 S. E. 462. An order setting aside a former decree in a cause is not appealable unless it settles the principles of the cause or is final. The decree set aside may be reinstated by the court on further hearing, and thus any necessity for an appeal be obviated. This order being interlocutory, and not appealable, and Minerva Leach having made no motion to set aside the final decree dismissing the bill, as stated in Judge BRANNON'S opinion, she cannot appeal therefrom. Hence her appeal should be dismissed as improvidently awarded. But admitting such decree to be appealable as to this appellant, it is on a bill taken for confessed. The decree was entered in a pending cause in which appellant was summoned, but never appeared. There have been no litigated questions between her and any other party to the suit. So far as she is concerned, all decrees have been entered on bills taken for confessed. It is said, however, that there was a notice given in this cause. Not by her nor to her. Nor is she in any way a party to the notice or bound thereby. She cannot appeal from the notice, because she is in no sense a party to it. Only parties to a suit or motion can appeal therefrom. Miller v. Rose, 21 W. Va. 291; Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484. In Midkiff v. Lush- er, 27 W. Va. 439, parties to the notice appealed. Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586; Forrest v. Stephens, 21 W. Va. 816. Minerva Leach, not being a party to the notice, is not in position to appeal, but the decree stands, so far as she is concerned, as though no notice had been given, and that is on bill taken for confessed; and, if it were a final decree, instead of being interlocutory, she could not appeal therefrom until she has given notice to set the decree aside, and has such motion overruled, under chapter 134, Code, 1899. Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533; Steenrod's Adm'r v. Railroad, 25 W. Va. 183. Nor was she entitled to be made a party to the notice given by the bank. She was a codefendant, has never appeared in the case, has no decree against the bank, and is only collaterally interested in such decree. Nor does the pleading—being the bill alone—justify any decree or litigation between codefendants. Where the bill does not entitle the plaintiff to relief, no relief can be granted to one defendant against another. Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208; Vance v. Evans et al., 11 W. Va. 342. If she had been served with notice, she could not have resisted the motion of the bank without filing an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, or an original bill seeking affirmative relief against the bank. Therefore she could neither resist the setting aside of the decree, nor the dismissal of the bill as to the bank, for she had no such legal interest in the contest between the plaintiff and her codefendant as entitled her, under the pleadings as they existed at the time the decree was entered, to set up any claim against her codefendant, or to object to the dismissal of the bill as to such defendant. If she had filed a cross-bill, or an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, uniting in the prayer of the bill, and the decree against the bank had been in her favor, her position would have been entirely different. She did neither. She did not even appear in the suit, and she is not in position to object to the setting aside of the erroneous decree against the bank, or to resist the dismissal of the bill as to the bank. Such being her legal position, she is not entitled to notice of the bank's motion, under section 5, c. 134, Code 1899. It may be she may have some interest adverse to the bank, but it has not been presented by the pleadings in such manner as to make her an "opposite party" to the bank, within the just and legal signification of the terms as used in such section. To make her such opposite party, she must not only have a claim against the bank, but such claim must have been presented by her, and be litigated and adjudicated between her and the bank by such decree. Persons collaterally interested are not even entitled to be made parties to a suit. Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 22. So the interest of a party in a decree must be direct, and not collateral, before such party is entitled to attack it. The language of section 5 shows the purpose of its enactment, and plainly makes evident that the interest of a party in a decree must be direct, before such party is entitled to a notice of a motion to correct such decree. It is as follows: "The court in which there is a judgment by default, or a decree on a bill taken for confessed, or the judge of said court in the vacation thereof, may on motion reverse such judgment or decree for any error for which an appellate court might reverse it, if the following section was not enacted, and give such judgment or decree as ought to be given. * * * Every motion under this chapter shall be after reasonable notice to the opposite party, his agent or attorney in fact, or at law, and shall be within five years from the date of the judgment or decree." By "opposite party" is meant the party who would have occupied the position of appellee in case of an appeal by the party aggrieved prior to the enactment of this section. In this case, it would have been the plaintiff at whose instance and suit the decree was entered, and not a codefendant who has not appeared, made any defense, or sought any relief. This is so plain, from the evident purpose, object, and language of the statute, that it seems a useless waste of words to exemplify or explain the meaning thereof, and it does not justify an appeal to the Constitution to augment or expound such meaning beyond the plain expression of its terms. To throw down the bars in this manner is to destroy the evident intention of the statute to supply a mere substitute for an appeal, and open wide the field for endless litigation to parties not legally interested in the decree. Suppose the bank had appeared before the original decree, demurred to the bill, and it had been dismissed as to the bank; could this codefendant, who had never appeared in the cause, have afterwards moved to set aside the decree dismissing the bill as to the bank, and, on her motion being overruled, have appealed to this court? Would not this court have promptly held that she had no such legal interest in the decree as entitled her to appeal, and that such decree did not injure her, or preclude her right to the assertion of any just claim or remedy. she might have against the bank? Is not this precisely the same condition she is in now? She has lost no legal right or remedy by the decree of which she complains. Nor is the adjudication between her and the bank, for she has had no litigation with the bank. How different is it with the illegal decree this day made by this court! For, with the aid of limitation, five years from the date of the erroneous decree entered against the bank, ending on this day, it forever precludes the bank from getting rid of a decree, except by payment, which the circuit court that entered it has determined to be erroneous and unjust. As between the plaintiffs who had notice and the defendant bank, the decree is not void, but it is valid, for it was not a joint decree either against or in favor of Mrs. Leach. Hence it is improper to avoid such decree in so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, for they, having notice thereof, are bound by it. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. 553. Plaintiffs have no grounds of appeal, and do not appeal. Mrs. Leach claims the right of appeal solely from the want of notice. Her interest and the plaintiffs' are not identical, and she is in no wise injured by setting aside of a decree erroneously entered at the instance of the plaintiffs, for she is not thereby deprived of any legal right or claim she may have against the bank. I look upon the decree entered by this court against the bank as a great, grievous, and irremediable wrong in an appeal case in which a codefendant with whom the bank has had no litigation is the appellant, and the plaintiffs are the appellees.

The appeal should be dismissed as improvidently awarded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by John E. Rutherford against Wade H. Rutherford and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Harding & Harding, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. John E. Rutherford, by two separate deeds, 15th March, 1887, conveyed two tracts of land in Randolph county, one of 75 acres and one of 95 acres, to his two sons, Samuel W. Rutherford and Wade Hampton Rutherford, in consideration, as provided in the deeds, that the sons would support and bury John E. Rutherford and his wife. The wife of John E. Rutherford did not join in the deeds. She died in 1897.

¶ 1. See Release, vol. 42, Cent. Dig. § 52.

It is said by counsel on both sides that John E. Rutherford was killed by a train of cars near Grafton since the decree in this case. At the date of said deeds, Samuel W. Rutherford was 19, and Wade H. Rutherford 5, years of age. Samuel W. Rutherford married, and brought his wife to the home. Trouble, in ways not necessary to be detailed, here arose between the father and the son's wife, which engendered bad feeling between father and son. Samuel lent little or no help to his parents. Wade H. Rutherford still lived with his father and lent him help for some years, when he left home—driven away, as he says, by his father. Amid these troubles, on 5th January, 1894, a writing was made, which is so very badly drawn as to be almost unconstruable. John E. Rutherford says in his bill that, finding it impossible to get along with Samuel W. Rutherford, he (the father) "attempted to enter into" this contract. So he moved it as a compromise. His bill says so. It names S. W. and W. H. Rutherford as its formal parties, but they and their father and mother all signed it. It imports that Samuel W. Rutherford was to deed W. H. Rutherford 40 out of the 95 acres, and keep the balance, and he was to relinquish to W. H. Rutherford the 75 acres. It declares that it was a final settlement, and released all responsibilities between the parties. The parties never conveyed under this contract. Samuel W. Rutherford and his father still differed. Later, April 3, 1896, a written contract appears, signed by John E. Rutherford and Samuel Rutherford, acknowledged before a notary and recorded, which recites that J. E. Rutherford had before that bound S. W. Rutherford to care for him and see him decently buried; and it released S. W. Rutherford from "all said incumbrance and maintenance," and S. W. Rutherford was to turn over to W. H. Rutherford one black mare; and the writing declared, "and this is a final settlement to this date between said parties of J. E. Rutherford, W. H. Rutherford & S. W. Rutherford." On the date of this contract, Samuel W. Rutherford and wife made a deed to Wade H. Rutherford releasing his interest in the 75 acres, retaining a lien to require Wade H. Rutherford to convey to Samuel the 95 acres; Wade H. being then an infant and unable to convey. On 16th December, 1896, Samuel W. Rutherford conveyed the 95 acres to R. V. Shreve, and by deed 12th January, 1897, Shreve conveyed to David C. Simmons. On 27th March, 1897, John E. Rutherford brought an equity suit in Randolph against Wade H. Rutherford, Samuel W. Rutherford, Shreve, and Simmons, alleging that his two sons had wholly failed to support him and his wife as stipulated in the conveyances of said two tracts by him to his sons, and charging that the conveyances by Samuel W. Rutherford to Shreve, and by Shreve to Simmons, were made with fraudulent intent to defeat his rights, and asking the cancellation of the two deeds from himself to his sons, and the deed from Samuel W. Rutherford to Shreve, and that from Shreve to Simmons, and that said land be restored to him. In October, 1901, an amended bill was filed. The original charged default of support and abuse by Samuel W. Rutherford, but did not as to Wade H. Rutherford, but, on the contrary, admitted that Wade H. Rutherford had, to some extent, complied with his obligation. The amended bill charges that both sons had failed to support their father or mother, and had cruelly neglected both. This bill states the death of the mother. John E. Rutherford, in his bill, introduces the contract of release into the case, but denies that he signed, agreed to, or acknowledged it. The answer of Samuel W. Rutherford relies upon it as a release. Wade H. Rutherford, being an infant, filed an answer by guardian ad litem. Shreve and Simmons filed answers denying all fraud on their part, and denying any right in John E. Rutherford as still subsisting in the lands. Depositions were taken. The 95 acres was in woods. Samuel cleared 5 acres. The other tract poor. The rental value only $15 or $20. On the hearing a decree was made canceling the two deeds from John E. Rutherford to his sons, and the deed from Samuel W. Rutherford to Shreve, and the deed from Shreve to Simmons. Samuel W. Rutherford appealed, and Wade H. Rutherford, having reached majority after the appeal, unites in it.

Concede that the sons did not comply with their obligation to support their father and mother. Did not John E. Rutherford release their obligation to do so? The parties had contention and difference about it, and they made the contract of compromise of 5th January, 1894. John E. Rutherford signed it. For what reason? His elder son was married and living to himself, but the younger was still with his father. The father now depended on him, and he wanted him to have the 75 acres free from all claims on the part of Samuel W. The father lived on it—did so all the while—and from it he and the younger son could have a living. By this contract the younger son got the sole title to the 75 acres, and 40 acres out of the 95-acre tract. The father and son could look to both for bread. The father assented to this arrangement, because his bill says he moved the contract and he signed it. The writing says that it was a final settlement, and released all responsibilities between both parties. It was drawn by a very illiterate, incompetent hand; but it declares that it is a final settlement of all responsibilities, and, the father signing it, it could allude to nothing else, as to him, but the release of the obligation of Samuel W. Rutherford to support him. By it the 75 acres was freed from claim by Samuel in favor of Wade, and Wade got 40 acres of the other tract, and in consideration thereof the father forewent his demand for support. The release of Samuel operated to release Wade, because the release of one of two joint contractors releases both. 3 Minor's Inst. 213. Strife went on, and later comes the compromise contract of 3d April, 1895, releasing Samuel from all obligation of support; and its language further released Wade, in addition to the release by operation of law. But John E. Rutherford denies that he ever executed it, or that he thereby agreed to release. This denial is repelled by the fact that he did by this second compromise only what he did by the first—released support. I use that first contract to corroborate the probability that he did make the second compromise, because it only does, as to him, what the first did. We need not discuss how far the second abrogates the first, because, as to John E. Rutherford, they both do the same thing; that is, release the obligation of maintenance or support. What are the rights of the two sons under them, as between themselves, is not involved. It is said that this second contract is based on no consideration. In the first place, it was a compromise. That it had this character, the bill shows, for it says that amid the difficulty the plaintiff attempted to make it. The evidence plainly shows it to be a compromise. If made, it surely was made, as bill and evidence show, as a compromise. That makes the consideration sufficient and favored in law. Zane v. Zane, 6 Munf. 406. Compromise of a colorable claim is a valuable consideration. 3 Minor's Inst. 123. But in addition, the same page shows that a valuable consideration is "a benefit to the party promising, or to a third person at his request, or an injury, loss, charge, or inconvenience, or the risk thereof to the party promised." Now, applying this law, John E. Rutherford got the benefit, and his son the loss, of a mare which by the contract was conveyed to W. H. Rutherford at John E. Rutherford's request, as shown by the fact that he himself signed the contract; and, when he was told by his son to come out of the house where the contract was written and get the mare, he told Samuel to deliver her to Wade. In further addition, at that same time Samuel made a deed to Wade for his interest in the 75 acres. John E. Rutherford was present and knew this. It was the same transaction. This was a consideration, as Samuel suffered a loss thereby. And this was to the expected benefit of the father, because he wanted Wade to have sole ownership of the 75 acres and the mare, that they both might have support from them. It is said that Samuel did not own the mare. He claimed her; had her in his sole possession; the evidence proves his right to her; and, if not, it is sufficient to say that the contract treated the mare as his, and compromised conflicting claim to her.

But John E. Rutherford says he did not execute the contract. Facts above stated render it highly probable that he did. The oral evidence added makes it clear that he did. It greatly preponderates to this conclusion. George L. Shreve says that, a few days before the contract was made, he met John E. Rutherford on the road, and the trouble between him and his son Samuel was talked about, and Rutherford said he would release his life maintenance to Sam if he would give Hampton a certain black mare he had, and that he (Shreve) told Rutherford he knew Samuel would do so, if Hampton would take the lower tracts and give Samuel the upper, and Rutherford said he would do that. Shreve said that from this the contract and deed originated. So they did. The contract was but its result. When we know of this conversation, it is unreasonable to say that John E. Rutherford did not sign the contract. But by no means is this all. The parties all met soon after at a store. Ira Shockey drafted contract and deed, and, as notary, took and certified the acknowledgment of the parties to them—among them, John E. Rutherford. He swears that John E. Rutherford, after the contract had been read to him, said his hand was so stiff that he could not sign it, and requested Shreve to sign it for him, which he did. Shockey says the paper was read to him both before and after Rutherford signed it, and that he acknowledged it before him as notary. Shreve swears that he, at Rutherford's request, signed it for him. When asked if he was present when Rutherford acknowledged the paper he said he was not sure, but thinks he was. Albert Skinner swears that he was present, and heard the contract read and acknowledged before the notary, and Rutherford made no objection to it. R. O. Zirkle swears that after the contract he asked Rutherford why he gave up his maintenance for the mare, and he replied that he would rather have the mare than nothing, thus admitting the contract. Against all this evidence alone stands Rutherford's oath denying that he signed or authorized the signing of the contract, by general language. True, there is a George W. Skinner, who says he was present when the contract was drawn, and that Rutherford did not agree to it, and that he did not in his presence ask any one to sign for him. This can be plausibly explained in this way: Wade H. Rutherford was an infant, and, in the deed to him from Samuel for the latter's interest in the 75 acres, Samuel retained a lien to secure the conveyance to him by Wade, when 21, of the 95 acres. Against this lien Shockey says that John E. Rutherford raised objection, and John E. himself states so; and, according to both Shockey and Rutherford, that was his only objection. That was not an objection to the contract, but to the deed. The lien was reasonable, and Shockey says that, when fully explained to Rutherford, he was satisfied. It lends aid to all the above when Rutherford admits that he did tell Samuel that he would yield the 40 acres, which by the first contract Samuel notes for even $35,000, and credited himself on the books with the supposed difference. Some of these claims plaintiff admits that he was legally liable for, and others he only assumed and expected at some time the bank would make a proper adjustment thereof with him. Among the latter plaintiff places the Steel bills and the certificates of deposit. Plaintiff paid six of the $5,000 notes, and the other he declines to pay, and asks to be canceled, for the reason that it has been since discovered by the examination of an expert that one of the $5,000 notes assumed by him for the Park City Street Railway Company was a renewal of a similar note of such company, and that, instead of there being four of such notes, there were only three, one of them being duplicated by renewal.

The defendant bank answered the bill, and denied plaintiff's right to the relief sought, and further filed as a claim for affirmative relief, and as an offset against the plaintiff's demand, the following list of adverse demands, to wit:

11. Park City Street Railway note of Dec. 16, 1891	5,000 00
Interest from Dec. 16, 1891.

Plaintiff filed a special reply, claiming that the first item of defendant's statement, $1,700, was his private property; that the second item, $365.96, was for the overcharge of interest included in the $35,000 of notes; that the third item, of $520, the bank received the benefit of, and the plaintiff did not;

that the fourth item, of $7,200, was his individual property, and the bank had no interest therein; that the fifth item, $525, the bank received, and he did not; that the sixth was for a bad debt of one Richardson, for which he was not liable; that the seventh item, $502.41, was for interest on the shortage of $2,791.17, which he made good to aid the bank, but for which he was not legally liable, either as to principal or interest; that the eighth item, of $638.55, is not an individual liability of the plaintiff, and that the Park City Street Railway Company had settled with the bank, and paid all that it owed; that the ninth item, being the $2,700 note, and the interest sought to be collected, was a note, with all its renewals, given in the interest of the bank, to temporarily cover up some bad bills held by the bank, and the interest thereon should be really a charge against the bank, instead of against him individually (the same answer is given as to the tenth item, of $100); that the eleventh item, of $5,000, is for a note of the Park City Railway Company, which was paid, and of which the plaintiff received no advantage in any manner; and that the whole account is a mere trumped-up affair to prevent plaintiff from getting the just relief which he is entitled to in this case.

The court, on the bill, answer, special replication, and proofs, after having overruled the plaintiff's motion to strike out the matters of affirmative relief prayed for in the answer, decided that the defendant was not entitled to such affirmative relief, and referred the case to a commissioner to ascertain and report whether the plaintiff was entitled to the relief sought by him, and whether the defendant was entitled to any offsets against such demand, and any other matter deemed pertinent by himself, or required by any of the parties in interest. The commissioner reported that the plaintiff was entitled to have the $5,000 note canceled, and that the bank had no just offsets or defense against the same. The defendant filed three general exceptions to, and which covered, the whole report. The court overruled the exceptions, confirmed the report, and granted plaintiff the relief sought. From this decree, the defendant appeals.

This court has firmly established the doctrine that "the finding of the circuit court as to facts in issue, unless against the plain preponderance of the evidence, is conclusive upon this court." Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. 600; Poling, Trustee, v. Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co. (decided at this term) 47 S. E. 279. In short, the appellant places himself in the position of a demurrant to the evidence on which the facts are founded, and, unless he can show that the determination of the circuit court is plainly contrary to the preponderance of evidence, the decree of the circuit court will be affirmed. To establish any other rule would be simply to place this court in the position of making a last guess to overthrow the decision of the circuit court. If this court can see that the circuit court has decided contrary to the plain preponderance of the evidence, it can act advisedly and with justice in reversing the action of the circuit court; but, if the matter is left in doubt from an examination of the evidence, this court has no justification in taking any other course than to remain inactive and permit the decree of the circuit court to prevail.

There are only two questions presented to this court by this record:

First. Was the circuit court justified in refusing to allow the defendant bank the affirmative relief sought by it? All the claims arose prior to the compromise made between the directors and the plaintiff, and it must be presumed that the directors had full knowledge of the same at that time. 3 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 843. Nor will the law permit them to plead ignorance thereof, when their duty required them to have full knowledge of all of the affairs of the bank, and such a plea would necessarily imply a neglect to discharge such duty. It was in their power to know, all about them before the compromise and adjustment, and, if they did not know, it was their own fault. They had access to, and control of, all the books of the bank. They had the right to employ expert assistants, and if these claims, or any of them, were justly chargeable against their cashier, it was their neglect not to bring them forward before the adjustment was made. Their excuse that they permitted themselves to be deceived by their cashier is not sufficient, for he was under their control and subject to their orders, and their duties required them to superintend his work. He was their servant to do their bidding, and losses occurring by reason of the mutual negligence of both should not be charged up to him entirely. But passing this by, there is not a single item charged that this court can say, from the evidence, should be allowed contrary to the finding of the circuit court. The most that can be said about them is that some few of them appear to be doubtful. The defendant did not assert them until this suit was instituted, and they were becoming decidedly stale. If the defendant had a just demand for any items of its claim, its remedy at law was adequate and complete, but may now be barred by the statute of limitations. The execution of the notes and trust must be regarded as received in accord and satisfaction of all plaintiff's liabilities to the bank. In the absence of satisfactory evidence showing mistake, fraud, or unconscionable advantage, such a settlement or compromise cannot be disturbed. Where, however, it is clear a mutual mistake has been made, equity will intervene to correct it. 1 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 428.

The evidence, which is bulky, and to some extent conflicting, satisfied the circuit court and commissioner that a mutual mistake had been made, and that the plaintiff had assumed to pay $5,000 more than he should pay. The directors admit that there is a discrepancy in favor of the domestic bills account of $4,262.42. The special examiner found and reported that this was caused by charging the plaintiff with one more note, of $5,000, of the Park City Street Railway Company, than he was liable for, on account of one of the notes being duplicated or renewed. He was not only charged with the old note, but with the renewal thereof. The difference between $5,000 and $4,262.42, being the sum of $737.58, is not accounted for; but this furnishes no good reason why the plaintiff should make it good out of the overcharge against him, as he is not shown to be in fault in regard thereto. In view of the great default of the teller right under the very noses of the directors, it is not right that they should charge to the plaintiff all losses that they have not yet been able to trace home to the defaulter. If they would hold the plaintiff responsible, they should have long since shown his responsibility. Failing to do that, they should do justice by him, and not attempt to make him the scapegoat for not only his own, but the delinquencies of others.

According to the evidence as it appears in the record, it is impossible for this court to say that the commissioner and the circuit court erred against the decided preponderance and weight thereof, and hence the decree must be affirmed.

STANTON v. O'KANE, Mayor et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 1, 1904.)

VASSING BOARD—COUNTING BALLOTS.

1. Where, in the first instance, under section 89, c. 3, Code 1899, a peremptory mandamus is sought, dispensing with a rule or conditional mandamus, notice of the application must be first given, and the adverse party allowed to defend.

2. Under a mandamus awarded under section 89, c. 3, Code 1899, a canvassing board may be directed and compelled to count a particular ballot in a particular way or for a particular candidate.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of George J. Stanton for writ of mandamus to James O'Kane, mayor of the town of Wolmesdorff, and others. Writ awarded.

W. B. Maxwell and D. H. Hill Arnold, for petitioner. C. H. Scott, for respondents.

BRANNON, J. An election was held 7th January, 1904, for mayor, recorder, and five councilmen for the town of Wolmesdorff, Randolph county. The ballots were separate—not on ballot sheets—under the law as it was prior to Act 1891, c. 89, found in Code 1899, c. 3. There were two tickets. The name of George J. Stanton was printed, along with four others, for councilman, on only one of the tickets, and the names of John B. King and P. F. Joyce were printed for councilmen on the other ticket only. The returns of the election and the canvass by the council showed that each of said candidates for council received 54 votes. The election officers solved the tie vote by choosing King by lot, and the council declared him elected. There is no dispute as to the 54 votes, but there is a ballot claimed by Stanton as a good vote for him which was rejected. Then Stanton asked of the circuit court a mandamus to the council to compel it to reassemble and count that ballot for him, and declare him elected, and, being refused, has come to this court for a mandamus to compel the council to count that ballot for him and declare him elected, and compel the council to admit him to his office, and dispense with a preliminary rule; he having given notice of the application to the proper parties.

King presented to this court a paper styling itself "Answer and Return." The petition seeking, in the first instance, a peremptory mandamus, thus dispensing with a mandamus nisi or rule, as allowed in election cases by Code, c. 3, § 89, Stanton excepted to it because a return is not admissible to a peremptory mandamus. There being no alternative mandamus or rule, no return, properly so called, can be made; but we are sure that the Code does not contemplate the award of a final writ without a right to defend against its award. Though the Code does not mention notice, we must apply the rule that, though it does not call for notice, yet, where judicial action is to be had to a man's prejudice, the statute is construed to intend notice, as without it such action would be void, and would not be due process of law. Evans v. Johnson, 39 W. Va. 299, 302, 19 S. E. 623, 23 L. R. A. 787, 45 Am. St. Rep. 912; 7 Rob. (New) Prac. 22. Where such peremptory writ is asked in the first instance, notice of the application for it must be given preliminary to such application, or in its absence the court must give notice by rule, or cause the party to give it before action, and allow defense. This return can be treated as an answer to the petition, and no objection can be made to it on the ground stated.

King resists the application for mandamus on the ground that, as asked, it would require the council to count the contested ballot for a particular candidate, contrary to the rule stated in Marcum v. Ballot Commissioners, 42 W. Va. 263, 26 S. E. 281, 36 L. R. A. 296, that mandamus will not compel an act judicial in nature, but only ministerial; it will compel action, but not any particular action that savors of the judicial function; that in this case whether that ballot is, in law, a good ballot, and how it should be counted, is such a question, and mandamus will not lie. True, such is the general rule, as stated in that case; but it was also stated that the writ, as allowed in the election statute, is an exception, and has wider function. Hebb v. Cayton, 45 W. Va. 578, 32 S. E. 187, is cited as antagonistic to the Marcum Case, and as holding that the writ can go no further than to compel action, not to direct particular action; but that case pointedly makes the writ, when used under the election law, applicable to election matters, "whether ministerial or judicial; in other words, giving it the appellate function of certiorari." In order not to be misunderstood, the general rule of the function of mandamus was stated, but the peculiar function in election cases was also stated. This distinction is stated in point 2 in Roberts v. Paul, 50 W. Va. 528, 40 S. E. 470.

The contested ballot: It is quite plain that it ought to have been counted for Stanton. On it stands intact his name as one of the five persons voted for under the words "For Councilmen." How can anybody say that the voter using this ballot did not intend to vote for him? A ballot is a paper to express intent, and, where its language is plain, we must take it, and not go to guessing that the voter meant something else. John Shannon's name was printed on the ballot under the words "For Recorder," and the voter erased his name and wrote in below it the name of P. F. Joyce, and so voted for Joyce for recorder, not for councilman, by plain language and legal import. The fact that Joyce was on another ticket for councilman was perhaps taken as the ground for mere guess that the voter intended to vote for him for councilman, thinking Shannon's name was Stanton, against plain language and expression—surmise against expression. It is unwarranted assumption and inexcusable action against a man's just right. It can hardly be called error of judgment. The old election law (Code 1887, c. 3, § 13), if it applied, would justify no such action. It says, "The ballot shall contain the names of the persons for whom he wishes to vote, and designate the office he desires them to fill." Does not this ballot do that? It could not more plainly say that the voter intended to vote for Joyce for recorder, and not Shannon, because Shannon's name is erased; and it could not more plainly say that he intended to vote for Stanton for council, because his name is left on under that office. But as Code 1899, c. 3, § 85, says that, whether a municipal election is held according to it or the prior law, the election "shall be counted and certified, and the result declared under the provisions of this chapter," the new law tells how to count a ballot. It says, in section 34, that a voter desiring to erase the name of any candidate from the ballot he intends to vote, or to vote for any one else, may strike out the name so printed on said ballot, and write in the blank space next following the name of the candidate or person for whom he desires so to vote. But if he fails to strike from said ballot the name printed thereon, the name written in said ballot shall alone be counted as to said office. This tells us that the written name controls for the office under which it is written, even if Shannon's name had been left; but, to make it plainer, it is erased. We might raise a question, if Stanton's name had been erased, but it was not.

Giving the writ of mandamus the force of certiorari, we hold that said ballot is a good ballot for Stanton, and we award a peremptory mandamus commanding the mayor, recorder, and councilmen of said town to meet as a canvassing board and declare the result of said election between Stanton, King, and Joyce for councilmen, counting said ballot for Stanton.

SLAUGHTER v. THACKER COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 1, 1904.)

CONTRACTS—ILLEGALITY—RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

1. Three coal mining companies operating in the same vein or seam in close proximity to one another, and just having commenced the development of that particular kind of coal, organize indirectly and nominally in the names of individuals a third corporation to act as their general sales agent, and each gives it by contract the exclusive right to sell its entire output of coal at prices uniform as to all three companies, and not to be departed from without the consent of all the companies, and said agent company is to advertise and introduce the coal in the markets, establish and control all agencies and sub-agencies, and make all sales and collections, and deduct for its compensation 10 cents per ton out of the proceeds of sales. Held, that the contract is illegal and void, its tendency being to suppress competition and restrain trade, contrary to public policy.

Error from Circuit Court, Mingo County;
E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Action by W. P. Slaughter, receiver, against the Thacker Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Simms & Enslow, for plaintiff in error.
Campbell, Holt & Duncan and Rucker, Anderson & Hughes, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the 1st day of May, 1895, there were four coal companies, corporations, operating in what is known as the Thacker Coal Vein in Mingo county. They were the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, the Lynn Coal & Coke Company, the Logan Consolidated Coal Company, and the Maritime Coal Company. On said date another corporation was organized, called the Thacker Coal Company. Its capital stock paid in was $640, and the principal stockholders were the presidents of the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, the Lynn Coal & Coke Company, and the Logan Consolidated Coal Company. Small amounts of stock were taken by two other persons simply for the purpose, as is supposed, of making up the required number of persons. A. Moore, president of the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, was elected president of the new company. Said new company was organized, not for the purpose of mining coal, nor of selling coal generally, but for the sole purpose of acting as sales agent of the companies operating in said Thacker vein, but the Maritime Company refused to take part in its organization and also to contract with it. On said 1st day of May, 1895, said agent corporation entered into a contract with the Thacker Coal & Coke Company whereby it agreed to sell for said company, for the period of five years, not less than 20,000 tons of coal each year, or, in default thereof, to pay the Thacker Coal & Coke Company 20 cents per ton for so much coal as it should fail to sell, in case it did fail to sell the amount stipulated. From the proceeds the agent company was to deduct and retain as compensation 10 cents per ton. The Thacker Coal & Coke Company covenanted to deliver to the agent company as much coal as it could sell, not exceeding, however, 84,000 tons each year. It was further agreed that, if the mining company should fail to deliver coal according to the agreement, it should pay the agent company 10 cents per ton for coal not delivered, as compensation or liquidated damages. It was further provided that either party might terminate the agreement at the end of any year by giving 60 days' notice prior thereto, April 1st being the beginning of the year fixed in the contract. The prices at which the coal was to be sold were fixed in the agreement, and it was further provided that they should be adhered to by the agent company unless departure therefrom should be authorized by a minute signed by all parties producing coal from said vein for whom the said agent company should act as agent. The agent company was required to account for and pay over the proceeds of sales on or before the 15th day of each month. The general nature of the agent company's business, as set forth in the contract, was the selling, advertising, and introducing of Thacker coal, and it had authority to adjust and settle complaints made by consumers, and to select and appoint all subagents for the sale of said coal.

Under this contract the agent company sold for the three producing companies with which it had contracts, up to the 1st of May, 1896, 124,087 tons. In the meantime, there had been paid in on the capital stock of the agent company, by deduction from the proceeds of coal sold for the three operating companies, $5,360, which, with the amount originally paid in, $640, made the total sum paid in $6,000. Practically all of this money and the commissions, amounting to about $12,400, had been expended in the business of the agent company, advertising the coal, establishing agencies and subagencies, and providing facilities for handling and disposing of the coal. During this time Moore, president of the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, was president and had the management of the Thacker Coal Company. About the 1st of May, 1896, he retired from the presidency of the agent company, and Walter Graham, president of the Logan Consolidated Coal Company, succeeded him. On May 22, 1896, Moore, acting as president of the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, notified the agent company by letter that his company would not deliver any more coal under the contract, assigning as ground for its refusal that the agent company had, in the month of April, 1896, sold the coal of his company at prices less than the minimum prices stipulated in the agreement, without any authority so to do, and that the agent company had further violated the agreement by not accounting for and paying the proceeds of the sales made in April, 1896, on or before the 15th day of May, 1896. The payment complained of was by checks sent from Bluefield to Thacker under date of May 18, 1896. In reply to this letter, Graham, president of the agent company, wrote Moore, and called his attention to the fact that all parties interested had, at a certain meeting, upon the recommendation of Moore himself, unanimously agreed that the president of the Thacker Coal Company should have discretion to make concessions in price when he should deem it expedient, and that Moore himself, as president of the agent company, had directed the sales complained of to be made as they were made. He further reminded him that it had been the practice, as established by himself, to remit for the proceeds as the money was received from the sale of the coal, without regard to the day of payment stipulated in the agreement. The letter further notified the Thacker Coal & Coke Company that it would be expected to adhere to the agreement and accord to the agent company the exclusive right to sell all coal which the mining company should produce. Moore, as president, replied that it would withdraw from the agent company. He was then notified that the agent company would demand of his company a sum equal to 10 cents per ton for 84,000 tons of coal, less the amount which had been furnished since April 1, 1896, as damages for the breach of the contract. The agent company continued until the 31st day of July, 1896, to handle the coal of the other two companies. On that date the Thacker Coal & Coke Company, or Moore, with the aid of parties representing the Lynn Coal & Coke Company interest, or having purchased that interest, at a meeting, after due notice, passed a resolution dissolving the agent corporation and appointing a trustee to wind up the business. This was followed by a chancery suit in which the assets of the defunct corporation were collected by W. P. Slaughter, special receiver, and paid out pro rata on its indebtedness, the amount realized by the corporations being 54 cents on the dollar. The heavy creditors were the three producing coal companies, the amounts due them having been as follows: The Thacker Coal & Coke Company, $2,702.34, for coal sold prior to May 22d; the Lynn Coal & Coke Company, $977.38, for coal sold probably in June and July; the Logan Consolidated Coal Company, $1,166.89, for coal probably sold in July. The other indebtedness consisted of small amounts due to various persons, making the total indebtedness $5,164.14, while the total assets amounted to $3,951.71. In said chancery suit, upon petition of the Logan Company, an order was made directing Slaughter, special receiver, to sue the Thacker Coal & Coke Company for the damages claimed on account of the breach of the contract. In pursuance thereof this action of assumpsit was brought. In addition to the common counts the declaration contains a special count on the contract. A demurrer was interposed and overruled, and there was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff complains of that judgment.

Under rule 10 of this court (45 S. E. xi) the defendant cross-assigns error in the overruling of the demurrer. I am of the opinion that this assignment is well taken. But for section 10 of chapter 99 of the Code of 1899, an action of assumpsit would not lie upon any sealed instrument. Under it such action does lie upon a promise, undertaking, or obligation in such instrument for the payment of money. The covenant which forms the basis of this action is to deliver coal. It is true that there is a clause by which the defendant company agrees to pay 10 cents per ton as liquidated damages, but that only becomes effective upon the breach of the covenant to deliver coal. In the absence of such breach there is no agreement to pay money. The condition upon which this promise to pay money arises is one of the class the determination of which is peculiarly the subject of an action of covenant. The demand sued for here is materially different from those involved in Kern v. Zeigler, 13 W. Va. 707, and Jones v. Sewing Machine Co., 38 W. Va. 147, 18 S. E. 478. However, the majority are of a different opinion, and on this point the judgment of the court below must stand.

For the plaintiff in error it is said there is no evidence against his right to recover, but it is insisted for the defendant in error that the judgment cannot be disturbed for two reasons. The first is that the contract was entered into by the parties for the purpose of destroying competition, and is in restraint of trade, and therefore void, as against public policy. In this connection it is shown that, while the stock of the agent corporation stood in the name of Graham, Moore, and Kirk, presidents of the three producing companies, it was taken in their names for convenience, and paid for by the coal companies; and, further, that an effort was made by these companies to get the Maritime Coal Company to join them. Unless this contract is within the inhibition of Act Cong. July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200], declaring illegal every contract and combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, it is not necessarily illegal. Although on its face it carries an apparent tendency to stifle competition, and is, in that sense, in restraint of trade, it is not illegal by reason of that act unless it affects commerce among the several states or with foreign nations. United States v. Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290, 325, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007. This contract relates simply to the sale of the output of one mine, but it appears from the evidence in the case that the agent corporation was organized for the purpose of handling the output of all the companies operating in a certain vein or seam of coal, and that two other companies had contracts with it like or similar to the contract with the defendant company. But it does not appear that this coal was to be sold in any particular place, nor that under this contract it must necessarily go beyond the state lines. An examination of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court construing the act makes it certain that, to be illegal thereunder, it must fall clearly within the terms of the act. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 32 L. Ed. 846; United States v. Knight, 156 U. S. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 39 L. Ed. 325; United States v. Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007. As this contract does not do so, it must be held valid so far as that act is concerned. Is it void at common law? The modern rule on that subject is that, although a contract may be in restraint of trade, if it is not unreasonably so, it is enforceable. "Some of such contracts have been held void and unenforceable in the courts by reason of their restraint being unreasonable, while others have been held valid because they were not of that nature. A contract may be in restraint of trade, and still be valid at common law." Mr. Justice Peckham in United States v. Freight Association. "The sense of the modern decisions is that, if the restraint is only commensurate with the fair protection of the business sold, the contract is reasonable, valid, and enforceable." Chemical Co. v. Provident Co. (C. C.) 64 Fed. 946. In that case one company sold out its competing business to another, agreeing not to engage in the business any more during the term of the lease. There is ample ground for applying this principle here. These companies were developing a new coal field. Their product was unknown in the markets, and it was necessary, in order to find sale for it, to spend large amounts of money in advertising it and establishing agencies. As they all produced the same kind of coal, this could be done more advantageously and economically through one agency than by separate action. In accomplishing this purpose it was necessary that a uniform price as to the product of each company should be maintained; otherwise the common agent, by discriminating between them, could have sold the coal of one company to the exclusion of that of the others, and the enterprise would have become impracticable, and defeated its own purpose. The agreement to maintain uniformity of price seems, therefore, to have been rather an incident to the main purpose than a design to stifle competition. "The latest decisions of courts in this country and in England show a strong tendency to very greatly circumscribe and narrow the doctrine of avoiding contracts in restraint of trade. The courts do not go to the length of saying that contracts which they now would say are in restraint of trade are, nevertheless, valid contracts, and to be enforced. They do, however, now hold many contracts not open to the objection that they are in restraint of trade which a few years back would have been avoided on that sole ground, both here and in England." Matthews v. Associated Press, 136 N. Y. 333, 32 N. E. 961, 82 Am. St. Rep. 741. In Skrainka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 522, the contract under consideration—very much like this one—was held good. The owners of certain stone quarries entered into an agreement to secure "a fair, proportionate sale of the product of all quarries at uniform prices and living rates," the terms of the agreement restricting the production of stone within certain territory, putting the sales in the hands of an agent for the interest of all parties, appointing a committee of five persons to modify prices and settle complaints, and imposing a penalty for every sale made in violation of the agreement.

It is not intended here to affirm the correctness of the decision, but it illustrates the view taken by certain courts, and shows that much latitude is allowed to manufacturers and producers of commodities in arrangements for facilitating production and sale. In Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 18 N. E. 419, 60 Am. Rep. 464, Andrews, J., said: "In the present state of the authorities, we think it cannot be said that the early doctrine that contracts in general restraint of trade are void, without regard to circumstances, has been abrogated. But it is manifest that it has been much weakened, and that the foundation upon which it was originally placed has, to a considerable extent at least, by the change of circumstances, been removed." Another interesting case is that of Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 143 Mass. 353, 9 N. E. 629. In that case the contract was one made by three manufacturers of a certain kind of curtain fixtures under different letters patent, owned by them severally, for the purpose of avoiding competition. It was held valid. In Cohen v. Berlin-Jones Envelope Co. (Sup.) 41 N. Y. Supp. 345, manufacturers of envelopes made a contract with another envelope manufacturer by which they agreed to purchase from him, at prices to be fixed from time to time by the former, a stated quantity of goods manufactured by him during a stated period, and he agreed that during such time he would not sell to others at a less price. Nineteen other concerns throughout the country engaged in manufacturing envelopes were not parties to the agreement, and their goods were in competition with those of the contracting parties. The contract was held valid, and the court recognized, as facts to be considered, that the agreement included but a small number of the manufacturers of envelopes, and that at the time it was made the business of manufacturing envelopes was demoralized through excessive competition. This case well illustrates the nature of the facts and circumstances to be considered in the present state of the law in determining whether a contract such as we have here is void as being in restraint of trade. In Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, Tindal, C. J., said: "We do not see how a better test can be applied to the question whether reasonable or not than by considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interest of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interest of the public. Whatever restraint is larger than the necessary protection of the party can be of no benefit to either. It can only be oppressive, and, if oppressive, it is, in the eye of the law, unreasonable. Whatever is injurious to the interests of the public is void on the ground of public policy." Applying here this test, and the general principles recognized in Cohen v. Berlin-Jones Envelope Co., it is impossible to see how the public was, or could have been, injured by this contract. Three small companies out of the vast number of coal producing companies in this state entered into it. The quantity of coal put upon the market by them is an utterly insignificant portion of the vast quantities thrown upon the market by the numerous competing producers. In the absence of some great combination virtually controlling the production and price of a commodity in the country, the price is regulated and determined by the law of supply and demand. It is manifest that by this agreement the production of these three mines was facilitated and increased, rather than stifled or curtailed. If their operation can be said to have affected the price of coal to the consumer, it is perfectly clear that the tendency was to reduce, instead of increase, it, because that advantageous arrangement for the sale of their output enabled them to put upon the market increased quantities of coal. The validity of this contract must be determined by its practical effect, rather than by ascertaining whether it falls within the terms of a legal definition.

Contracts in restraint of trade and contracts eliminating competition, as a general proposition, are illegal and void on the ground of public policy. But it is nevertheless true that there are numerous contracts, which all the courts hold good, and which at the same time tend, in some degree, to restrain trade and stifle competition. As the sole and true test is whether the contract is injurious to the public—and it is impossible to see how, in any practical sense, this contract could have injured the public—there is no reason why it should be held invalid. Under different circumstances, given more extended application, one or more of the principles embodied in the contract would become injurious to the public, and therefore vicious. So strychnine, arsenic, and other drugs are deadly poisons, but great blessings to humanity in the hands of physicians, who, by means of them, alleviate suffering and save life. Competition is said to be the life of trade, but undue or excessive competition has been judicially declared hurtful and injurious to the public. We must look at the facts, as well as at the definition of restraint of trade, to reach a correct and just conclusion.

Upon this view of the contract, my inclination is to hold it legal, but my associates are of a different opinion. Applying the principles hereinafter stated, they consider it void, as against public policy. "By the weight of recent authority the character of the article or legitimate trade sought to be monopolized is immaterial, the true test of the illegality of the combination being the injury to the public, and whether its necessary consequence is to control prices, limit production, or suppress competition in such a way as to restrain trade and create a monopoly. To render the combination illegal on this ground, it is not necessary that evil intent or actual injury be shown, but it is sufficient to know that the inevitable tendency of the act is injurious to the public. The fact that the immediate result of the combination has been temporarily to reduce prices, or that it may reduce them, is immaterial in determining the legality of the combination, the court not being governed by the temporary effect upon the prices, but by the power of the combination to control them." 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 849, 850. "In some way several corporations competing in production merge into one, and cease competitive production. By means of large capital this new corporation can produce largely, or limit production, lessen supply, enhance prices, and lower the prices of materials used in production. It may be said that, no matter what the form adopted may be, if the end is to curtail production, enhance prices, restrain trade and competition, control the market in commodities, it is condemned by common law, and by many statutes in the different states." Brannon, Fourteenth Amend. 373. Discussing the rule stated by Tindal, C. J., in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, and hereinbefore quoted, Judge Taft said in United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 Fed. 271, 29 C. C. A. 141, 46 L. R. A. 122: "This very statement of the rule implies that the contract must be one in which there is a main purpose, to which the covenant in restraint of trade is merely ancillary. The covenant is inserted only to protect one of the parties from the injury which, in the execution of the contract or enjoyment of its fruits, he may suffer from the unrestrained competition of the other. The main purpose of the contract suggests the measure of protection needed, and furnishes a sufficiently uniform standard by which the validity of such restraints may be judicially determined. In such a case, if the restraint exceeds the necessity presented by the main purpose of the contract, it is void for two reasons: First, because it oppresses the covenantor, without any corresponding benefit to the covenantee; and, second, because it tends to a monopoly. But where the sole object of both parties in making the contract, as expressed therein, is merely to restrain competition and enhance or maintain prices, it would seem that there was nothing to justify or excuse the restraint, that it would necessarily have a tendency to monopoly, and therefore would be void. In such a case there is no measure of what is necessary to the protection of either party except the vague and varying opinion of judges as to how much, on principles of political economy, men ought to be allowed to restrain competition. There is in such contracts no main lawful purpose to subserve which partial restraint is permitted, and by which its reasonableness is measured, but the sole object is to restrain trade in order to avoid the competition which it has always been the policy of the common law to foster." The contract being, in the opinion of the majority of the court, illegal, and so held, no recovery can be had on it. This action, being for the liquidated damages covenanted to be paid, is based directly and solely upon the contract. Hence, whatever errors the court may have committed during the progress of the trial, its final judgment of nisi capiat is right, and must be affirmed, and it is useless to discuss further assignments of error.

MOORE et al. v. HOLT, Judge, et al.
March 29, 1904.)

CIRCUIT COURT—JURISDICTION—ELECTION CONTEST—PROHIBITION.

1. Circuit courts have no original jurisdiction of election contests or recounts, nor authority to prevent by writ of prohibition a person who claims to have been elected to an office from taking the same and assuming and exercising its powers and duties, on the ground of invalidity of the election or ineligibility of the party claiming the office, and by awarding such writ in such case a judge of such court subjects himself to a writ of prohibition from the Supreme Court of Appeals.

2. The writ of prohibition lies only to inferior courts, boards, officers, or tribunals having judicial or quasi judicial powers, to confine them within their respective jurisdictions. It cannot be invoked against individuals in respect to rights claimed by or asserted against them.

3. By its writ of prohibition a court acquires no jurisdiction of a controversy concerning the title to an office.

4. Besides having jurisdiction of the class of causes to which a given cause of action belongs, a court must obtain cognizance of the particular cause by requisite process before it can hear and determine it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by J. H. Moore and others for a writ of prohibition to Moses Ferguson and others. Writ awarded.

W. B. Maxwell and D. H. Hill Arnold, for petitioners. Jerad L. Wamsley, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, P. J. H. Moore and others pray for a writ of prohibition to prevent the Honorable John Homer Holt, Judge of the circuit court of Randolph county, from further proceeding upon a petition and rule in prohibition pending in his court. Upon the petition of Moses Ferguson, O. W. Wilmoth, J. G. Coberly, and L. J. Hyre, members of the council of the town of Montrose, in said county, Elihu Wilmoth, recorder of said town, and others, representing that the annual election of municipal officers of said town held on the 7th day of January, 1904, at which it was claimed and pretended J. H. Moore had been elected mayor, C. B. Hyre recorder, and O. B. Hyre, E. H. Moore, N. A. Moore, W. Hoffman, and W. H. Sidwell councilmen, was void because illegally conducted, only five or six persons having voted, and two of the commissioners who conducted the election having been candidates for whom votes were received and counted in said election, said judge awarded a rule, returnable on the 1st day of February, 1904, requiring the said J. H. Moore, C. B. Hyre, O. B. Hyre, E. H. Moore, and N. A. Moore to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded prohibiting and restraining them from assuming and exercising the powers and duties of the offices to which they claim to have been elected. On the 2d day of February, 1904, the defendants appeared, and filed a demurrer to the petition, in which the plaintiffs joined, and the court took time to consider of its demurrer. Thereupon the defendants Moore and others made the application aforesaid to this court.

The case is substantially the same as that of Board of Education v. Holt et al. (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 134. They differ only in this: that in Board of Education v. Holt it was sought to prohibit persons in office from further exercise of official powers, while here the object is to prevent certain persons from taking offices. In the case above referred to this court decided that prohibition is not a remedy by which the title to an office may be determined, nor one by which a person can be ousted from, or prevented from entering upon, an office. In the opinion Judge Dent says: "Such use of prohibition is plain usurpation of and abuse of judicial functions." Prohibition lies from a superior to an inferior court or an inferior board or tribunal having judicial or quasi judicial powers, to prevent any act on its part in excess of its jurisdiction. Its office is to supervise the action of such inferior tribunals by confining them within their respective jurisdictions. Hence it must always be awarded against such court and the parties unlawfully proceeding in it, and not against private individuals only, as in this case, where it could perform no function other than the determination of controversies between adverse claimants to an office or to property, or enforce performance of a duty, vindicate a right, or redress a wrong. In contests between individuals other remedies which the law affords must be resorted to. They cannot claim the benefit of one which has been provided for the sole purpose of preventing courts from acting without, or in excess of, jurisdiction; nor can a superior court, having power to award the writ, properly use it for any purpose other than that of supervising inferior courts as aforesaid. Whether a circuit court, by awarding it when it does not lie merely because not a proper remedy, acts without jurisdiction, or in excess of its jurisdiction, need not be decided here, for in entertaining the petition and issuing the rule the judge of the circuit court acted upon and interfered with a matter over which he had no jurisdiction, and could not obtain jurisdiction by means of the petition filed. The election and qualification of municipal officers are matters of which, in the first instance, the council of the city, town, or village has sole and exclusive cognizance, within the limitations prescribed by law. Code 1899, c. 47, §§ 19-23. Should it decide erroneously, there is appellate, but not original, jurisdiction in the circuit court; and if that court, by means of an injunction or writ of prohibition, attempts to assert its original jurisdiction in respect to such matter while it is pending in the council, or after the council has declared the result, it acts without jurisdiction for three reasons: First. The subject-matter has not been brought within its cognizance by any process which the law has appointed for the purpose. Second. It is attempting to assert its original jurisdiction in respect to a matter of which another court has already taken jurisdiction. Third. The law has not conferred upon circuit courts original jurisdiction of election contests and recounts of election returns, but only appellate jurisdiction by means of certiorari in the former, and certiorari or mandamus in the latter. The principles announced and applied in Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483, County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. 747, and County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. 488, seem to fully support the views here expressed.

In deciding that the circuit court is acting without jurisdiction, the law conferring original jurisdiction by mandamus and quo warranto in respect to claimants of offices has not been overlooked. Mandamus lies to restore to office one who has been illegally ousted. Dew v. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 639; Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415. Quo warranto lies to try and determine the right to an office; but it goes against one who is in office, not to prevent a person from taking an office. State v. Shank, 36 W. Va. 223, 14 S. E. 1001; State v. Matthews, 44 W. Va. 372, 29 S. E. 994; Kilpatrick v. Smith, 77 Va. 347. But in these cases the process by which the subject-matter is brought within the jurisdiction of the court is authorized and given by law for that purpose. To sustain its action a court must have not only capacity to hear and determine causes of the class to which a given cause belongs, but actual cognizance of it, obtained by requisite process and pleadings. Penna. R. R. Co. v. Rogers, 52 W. Va. 450, 44 S. E. 300, 62 L. R. A. 178; Railway Co. v. Wright, 50 W. Va. 653, 41 S. E. 147; Ensign Co. v. Carroll, 30 W. Va. 533, 4 S. E. 782. In its very nature prohibition is an improper proceeding by which to determine the title to an office. If it could go against a person in office, the writ would ipso facto stop the exercise of the functions of the office before an adjudication of the right of the defendant to hold it. If awarded against a person out of office to prevent him from assuming its duties, its effect would be, in some instances, to leave the office vacant pending the controversy. Thus the efficiency of the public service would be impaired, and the state left without officers to execute the laws. Everything would be within the power of the courts. Board of Education v. Holt (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 134. A mandamus to restore a person to an office from which he has been illegally ousted works no interruption of the exercise of the functions of the office. It puts the ousted officer in, and thereby incidentally ousts the intruder, who has not been prevented from performing the duties of the office until the very moment of the reinstatement of the rightful incumbent. Upon a quo warranto calling upon the occupant of the office to show by what right he exercises its powers he continues to discharge its duties until the question of his right to the office has been determined. High, Ex. Leg. Rem. § 594. The law has wisely withheld from the courts any writ by which to vacate offices in advance of judicial determination of cause of removal coupled with the power of removal, and the use of the writ of prohibition in such cases as this clearly contravenes this great principle of public policy and natural right. Hence the courts, by using it, obtain no jurisdiction of controversies of the kind presented, because the inevitable effect of its use is to do that which the court has no power to do.

For the foregoing reasons the writ of prohibition applied for will be granted.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

SET-OFF—WHEN ALLOWED—NONSUIT—REINSTATEMENT—APPEARANCE—EFFECT.

1. On the 28th day of March, 1898, S. brought his action against T., before a justice, on a store account for $2.60. On the same day T. paid to the justice the $2.60 and costs, and the action was dismissed, and at the same time T. commenced his action against S. for $100 loaned money. S. answered the action of T. that, as the claim of plaintiff existed at the time the action of S. was brought, and plaintiff failed to assert same in said action as a set-off or otherwise, he was precluded under section 55, c. 50, Code 1899, from maintaining his action for its recovery.

Held, neither of the claims having been litigated to final judgment, the claim of T. is not affected by said section 55.

2. When a plaintiff has suffered a nonsuit, with leave to reinstate his action "within the time prescribed by law, by payment of all costs," etc. On payment of all costs by and on motion of plaintiff, the nonsuit was set aside and the cause reinstated, without notice to defendant, who appeared generally and moved to dismiss the action for want of such notice.

Held, not error to refuse to dismiss, as by general appearance defendant waived notice.

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County; E. B. Doolittle, Judge.

Sheppard & Goodykoontz, for plaintiff in error. H. K. Shumate, for defendant in error.

McWHORTER, J. John Turk brought his action before Justice White, of Mingo county, for $100, the money due on contract, against S. Shein. The case was tried on April 2, 1898, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff for $100 and costs. Shein obtained a writ of certiorari removing the cause to the circuit court of Mingo county. On May 5, 1898, plaintiff moved to dismiss the certiorari as having been improvidently awarded, which motion was overruled, but no exception taken. The court then set aside the verdict of the jury and judgment of the justice, and retained the case for trial. On the 6th of September, 1898, the plaintiff failing to prosecute his suit, nonsuit was entered, with leave to reinstate within the time required by law. On the 9th of January, 1899, Turk had the case reinstated by paying the costs of the nonsuit. The court set aside the nonsuit. On the 18th of May, 1900, Shein appeared by counsel and moved to dismiss the action because the case was reinstated without notice having been given as required by section 12, c. 127, Code. The motion was overruled by the court, to which ruling defendant excepted. Shein then objected to any further proceedings being taken in the action, which objection was overruled by the court, to which ruling the defendant excepted. A jury was impaneled, and returned a verdict of $112.50 for plaintiff. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict, which motion was overruled, and judgment entered thereon. The defendant took three bills of exceptions to the rulings of the court, which were signed, sealed, and saved to him, and made a part of the record.

Bill of exceptions No. 1 relates to certain evidence admitted on the part of the plaintiff, and objected and excepted to by the defendant. The first mentioned and pointed out in the bill of exceptions is a question propounded to plaintiff, with answer thereto, "Have you ever been sued before Shein sued you?" His answer was, "No, sir." And the further testimony excepted to was that of witness Sarah Tackett, where the question is asked, "Do you know of him [meaning Turk] coming up there in 1896—I mean about Christmas of that year—to get any money out of his trunk? A. Yes, sir; he came up there and took out of his trunk a right smart roll of money; I don't know how much, and someone asked him what he was— Q. Mrs. Tackett, at the time Mr. Turk took out this money out of his trunk, did you hear him make any statement as to what he intended to do with it—what his intentions were for getting it? A. Yes, sir; he said he was going to take it to Mr. Shein." To which questions and answers defendant objected and excepted. It is claimed by counsel for Turk that these questions and answers of Mrs. Tackett were a part of the res gestae. The question asked of plaintiff, whether he had ever been sued before Shein sued him, was immaterial and irrelevant, and should not have been asked or answered, but we cannot see how it could have influenced the jury or prejudiced the defendant, and, while it was error, it is not reversible error. The testimony of witness Tackett is calculated to influence the jury, and, being incompetent, should not have been admitted. Counsel for defendant in error contends that what Turk said, as related by Mrs. Tackett, on taking the money out of his trunk, was a part of the res gestae, and properly admitted, and cites the case of Mayes v. Power (Ga.) 4 S. E. 681, in support of his contention. In that case the defendant called to plaintiff's intestate across the river; he went across the river to the defendant; they had some conversation together; he returned to his house, and got his wife to count him out a sum of money; stated that he was going to lend it to the defendant; he took the money with him, went back across the river, and was seen to hand something to the defendant, and on his return bade his family remember that defendant had got said sum of money, and to get the book and he would charge it. This transaction seems to have taken place in view of the family, and all in a very short time; was really one single transaction; while in the case at bar there is no immediate connection, indeed no connection at all; it might have been days before or days after, according to the evidence, between the act of getting the money from the trunk by the plaintiff and passing the same over to the defendant. The witness Mrs. Tackett saw nothing further than the taking of the money from the trunk, as she said, "a right smart roll of money." She did not know how much. It does not appear whether or not this was on the same day that he claims to have given the money to Shein. Indeed, he does not pretend to fix the day on which he let Shein have the money. If he had gone, directly after taking the money from his trunk, and had been seen by Mrs. Tackett to hand something to Shein, even though he did not return and say anything further to her or in her presence about it, the case cited would perhaps have been applicable. Several other cases are cited by the defendant in error, but that of Mayes v. Power is their main reliance, and, while it is a much stronger case than the case at bar, yet it was evidently regarded by the court as by no means conclusive of the fact of the loaning of money, but as a circumstance tending to prove it, to be considered by the jury. The court says: "We think that what Power said at the time was admissible as a part of the res gestæ, and these statements of Power, coupled with the fact that he was seen to return across the river and hand something to Mayes, were sufficient to authorize the jury to conclude he had let Mayes have the money." It is there further said: "Bishop swore that Power had before dealt with Mayes in the same way, taking no notes for the money; and this, we think, was competent evidence." The evidence of Mrs. Tackett, of the plaintiff taking the money from the trunk and making the statement that he was going to let Shein have it, is not coupled with any fact related with the act of Turk turning the money over to Shein, so as to make it a part of the res gestæ, and it was improperly admitted as evidence.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 is to the refusal of the court to give to the jury the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant, Shein, borrowed the $100 in controversy from the plaintiff, Turk, and that afterwards a suit was brought by the defendant, Shein, against the plaintiff, Turk, upon a store account of $2.60, and the plaintiff was personally served with process, or appeared and answered the action, and if they further find that the $100 in controversy was due the plaintiff, Turk, at the time the action was brought by Shein against Turk, then the jury should find for the defendant, Shein, in this action." This instruction is based upon section 55, c. 50, Code 1899, where it is provided that: "If the defendant, at the time the plaintiff's action is commenced, has any credit or set-off or claim to allege in defense or reduction of the plaintiff's demand, and be personally served with process in the suit, or appear and answer the action he shall produce the same with his evidence in support thereof in the cause or be forever precluded from maintaining any action for the recovery thereof." The defendant proved by the justice, M. Z. White, the bringing of the suit by Shein against Turk for the $2.60, and introduced the papers in the cause; but it was shown by White's testimony that the defendant in the cause, Turk, paid him the amount of the claim and the costs on the same day the writ in the case was issued, so the case was ended the day it was brought, the 28th day of March, 1898, the summons beginning the suit was issued on that day, returnable on the 2d day of April, 1898, so that the matters were not litigated at all. In Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 43, 26 S. E. 366, (Syl., point 6), "A plea of res judicata must show that the former judgment was on the merits." At page 47, 43 W. Va., and page 367, 26 S. E., it is said in the opinion of the court: "Appellants complain of the rejection of two pleas. One was a plea of res judicata, based on a judgment of a justice for some cause in favor of defendants. It is faulty, because it does not in any way show that the dismissal of the suit before the justice was on the merits, so as to be a bar to a second suit; for, if it was a nonsuit or any other of many causes not precluding another suit, it would not bar. 1 Bart. Law Prac. 534, 535; 7 Rob. Prac. 221; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 530; Burgess v. Sugg, 2 Stew. & P. 341. A plea should aver that the decision was on the merits, or it should at least appear by the record vouched." It appears from the record that there was no litigation between the parties on this claim of $2.60, and section 55 can only apply after matters between the parties have been litigated. The court did not err in refusing to give the instruction.

The third bill of exceptions claims that the court erred in not setting aside the verdict and granting the defendant a new trial, first, because the said verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and, second, third, and fifth, because of the matters set out in the first and second bills of exceptions, and, fourth, "because the court erred in failing to strike this cause from the docket and proceeding to trial herein." The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit on the 6th day of September, 1898, for failure to prosecute his suit. In the order of the nonsuit leave was granted to the defendant to reinstate within the time prescribed by law upon payment of all costs. The cause was reinstated on motion of plaintiff, and the payment of all costs by him on the 9th day of January, 1899. On the 18th day of May, 1900, the defendant appeared and moved to dismiss the action, which motion being overruled, the defendant objected to any further proceedings being taken in the action, which objection was also overruled, and the cause proceeded to trial, a jury being impaneled. The reinstatement of the case without notice entitled the defendant to a continuance, if asked for, and, not having asked it, he was presumed to have waived his right to continuance. The general appearance of defendant in the case after reinstatement is a waiver of the notice.

Quere: Whether a special appearance of defendant for the purpose, only, of moving the dismissal of the case because reinstated without the notice provided by statute, would have required its dismissal.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the court is reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Mingo county for a new trial to be had therein.

STARR et al. v. SAMPSELLE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

FORFEITED LANDS—SALE—SCHOOL FUND—PROCEEDING IN EQUITY—DECREE—SALE FOR TAXES—REDEMPTION.

1. A proceeding instituted and prosecuted by a commissioner of school lands, under chapter 105 of the Code of 1899, for the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund, is a judicial proceeding—a suit in chancery—and must be commenced as provided in chapter 124 of the Code, and proceeded in, heard, and determined in the same manner and in all respects as other suits in chancery are brought, prosecuted, and proceeded in, and is subject to the same rules of chancery practice as other suits in chancery, except as otherwise provided by said chapter.

2. Such suit is in the nature of a proceeding against the land itself, and a sale thereunder, when completed, is prima facie evidence of the forfeiture of the land, against all persons whomsoever.

3. If a final decree be made and entered by the circuit court in such proceeding, it having at the time jurisdiction to make and enter such decree, no error in its proceedings which does not affect its jurisdiction will render the proceeding void; nor can such error be considered when the decree is collaterally brought in question.

4. Section 80 of chapter 81 of the Code of 1899, providing for the redemption by persons under disability of lands sold by the sheriff for delinquent taxes charged thereon, applies to sales made to individuals, and not to sales made to the state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County;
E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Action by Samuel Starr and others against L. A. Sampselle and others. Decree for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. K. Shumate, for appellants. J. B. Wilkinson and L. A. Sampselle, for appellees.

MILLER, J. On the 18th day of January, 1887, James Starr, Sr., by his deed of that date, conveyed to his grandsons, Charles Starr, Samuel Starr, Allen Starr, and John H. Starr, who were the sons of James Starr, Jr., a certain tract of land, situate in Mingo county, described in the deed as containing 250 acres, but which in fact contains 419 acres. At the date of the conveyance each of the said grantees was a minor. In 1892 Charles Starr died intestate, without issue; leaving said James Starr, Jr., his father, his only heir at law. By his deed, bearing date on the 16th day of February, 1894, said James Starr, Jr., conveyed to his wife, Harriett Starr, a tract of 250 acres of land, which the bill alleges to be a conveyance of the interest of said James Starr, Jr., in and to the tract of land first above mentioned. Said James Starr, Jr., died intestate in the year 1895, leaving as his only heirs at law his sons, Samuel Starr, Allen Starr, and John H. Starr, surviving grantees in the first-named deed. The land was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes charged thereon for the year 1890 in the name of Charles Starr and others; and at a sale thereof made by the sheriff of said county in December, 1891, for said delinquent taxes, A. J. Sheppard became the purchaser of the land, which was afterwards, to wit, on the 3d day of April, 1893, conveyed to him by deed executed by the clerk of the county court of Mingo county. On the 24th day of April, 1893, said Sheppard, and his wife, by their deed, conveyed an undivided half interest in the land to J. B. Ellison; and on the 8th day of August, 1893, Sheppard and wife conveyed the other half undivided interest therein to C. M. Turley, trustee, for the benefit of certain creditors of Sheppard. By another deed, bearing date on the 18th day of September, 1897, Sheppard and wife conveyed an undivided interest in the tract of land to L. A. Sampselle and Robert Hoyle. It does not appear that the land was ever entered on the landbook or charged with the taxes thereon in the name of A. J. Sheppard, the purchaser at the tax sale, or that he ever paid any of the taxes charged or chargeable thereon in any name for any year. For the years 1891 and 1892 said land was again returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes charged thereon in the name of Charles Starr and others, and at a sale thereof made by the sheriff of said county in the month of November, 1893, was sold to the state for said last-mentioned delinquent taxes. For the taxes charged thereon for the year 1893 in the name of Charles Starr and others, the sheriff, in the month of December, 1895, again sold the land to the state. It does not appear that the lands were charged with the taxes thereon for any of the years mentioned, otherwise than in the name of Charles Starr and others. The land not having been redeemed from the sale thereof to Sheppard, or the first sale to the state, in May, 1895, it was certified to the commissioner of school lands of said county as being liable to be sold for the benefit of the school fund. Afterwards the said commissioner caused a suit to be commenced and prosecuted in the circuit court of said county, in the name of the state of West Virginia, for the sale of that and other tracts of land in said county for the benefit of the school fund. To the bill filed in said cause, and the proceedings had thereon, "the unknown heirs of James Starr, Jr., deceased," were made parties defendant. At the May term, 1896, of said court, said A. J. Sheppard filed his petition in said cause, setting up title to and claiming an interest in said land by reason of his purchase thereof at the sheriff's tax sale, and the conveyance to him by the clerk of the county court as aforesaid, and praying to be allowed to redeem the same. To this petition, said Samuel Starr, Allen Starr, and John H. Starr, and also Roxie Runyon, Samuel, Allen J., John H., Jr., Julia, Florence, and Dicey, alleged children, and Edna Yoke, grandchild, of said James Starr, Jr. (they being his only heirs at law), were made parties defendant, and answered the said petition by Wells Goodykoontz, their guardian ad litem, duly appointed by the court. Said Harriett Starr also appeared and filed her answer to the said petition, as appears by the record. Afterwards such proceedings were had in the cause, upon said petition and answers thereto, and upon the report of the commissioner, to whom the cause was referred, that a decree was made permitting said Sheppard and Harriett Starr to redeem the said land from the sales to the state upon the payment of the amount of taxes, damages, interest, and costs due upon said tract of land to the state, county, and districts within 30 days from the rising of the court, and in default of such payment the commissioner of school lands was authorized and directed to sell the land to the highest bidder. Sheppard and Harriett Starr, and each of them, failed to make the payment required of them as aforesaid for the redemption of said land. Afterwards a sale of the land was made under the decree, at which on the 9th day of January, 1899, said L. A. Sampselle became the purchaser at the price of $400, and, there being no exceptions to the sale, the same was in all respects approved and confirmed by the court.

On the 21st day of March, 1899, said Samuel Starr, Allen Starr, and John H. Starr instituted their suit in equity in said circuit court against said L. A. Sampselle, A. J. Sheppard, J. B. Ellison, Harriett Starr, and others; the said Samuel Starr having, as he alleges, attained his majority within one year next before that date, and said cause, as to said Allen and John H. Starr, infants, being prosecuted in their names by Samuel Starr, as their next friend. The plaintiffs, in their bill, allege the facts substantially as hereinbefore stated, and further aver that Samuel Starr, Allen Starr, and John H. Starr are each the owners of one undivided fourth of said tract of land; that said Harriett Starr owns the other undivided fourth thereof, and also claims, in addition thereto, a one-half interest in the land purchased by her of defendant J. B. Ellison. They then charge that the said tax sale and tax deed to A. J. Sheppard were and are void, and passed no title of the land to Sheppard, because of various alleged irregularities in the list of delinquent taxes for which the land was sold, and in the proceedings of the sheriff preceding said sale, all of which questions have been passed upon by this court in different causes, in which irregularities similar to those so pointed out have been held to be cured by the provisions of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899. The plaintiffs claim that, if the tax sale to Sheppard had been entirely regular, they would still have the right to redeem the land, because, at the time said land was returned delinquent, and at the time the deed therefor was made by the clerk to Sheppard, they were each under 21 years of age; that said Allen and John H. are still minors; and that Samuel has become 21 years of age within 1 year next preceding the institution of their suit. But they do not allege that they, or either of them, have taken any steps whatever under section 30 of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899 for the redemption of said land from the purchase thereof by Sheppard as aforesaid. They also point out irregularities in the delinquent list and proceedings relating to the taxes charged on said land and returned delinquent for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893, for which it was sold to the state as aforesaid, all of which alleged defects fall within the curative provisions of the statute, as is hereinafter shown. They then pray that the deed for said land made by the clerk of the county court of Mingo county to A. J. Sheppard be set aside and held for naught, as well as the deeds from Sheppard and wife to Ellison and Turley, trustee, respectively; that the proceedings had by the state for the sale of the land for the benefit of the school fund be declared irregular, void, and of no binding effect upon plaintiffs; that the sale to Sampselle thereunder be set aside and vacated; and that plaintiffs may be declared the owners of said land, and allowed to redeem the same from any forfeiture thereof; and for general relief. Defendant Sampselle filed his demurrer and answer to the bill. In his answer he admits many of the allegations of the bill, but avers therein that, at the time of the institution of the suit by the state for the sale of said tract of land for the benefit of the school fund as aforesaid, the state had a lien thereon paramount and superior to all others; that the court had jurisdiction to enforce the same in a proper suit for the purpose; that there is no error in said suit prejudicial to the rights of plaintiffs; that the title to said land vested in respondent by virtue of the sale to him and confirmation thereof as aforesaid; that, immediately after the confirmation of said sale, respondent entered upon and took possession of said tract of land, and was at the time of the institution of said suit, and now is, in the actual, open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession thereof; and that plaintiffs did not pay any of the taxes on said land in any name for any of the years mentioned. Upon the final hearing of said cause, at its September term, 1902, the court dismissed the plaintiffs' bill at the costs of said Samuel Starr, and from this decree the plaintiffs, Samuel Starr (in his own right) and Allen Starr and John H. Starr (by Samuel Starr, their next friend), were allowed an appeal.

The bill, stripped of its unnecessary recitals and averments, may be treated as a bill by the plaintiffs therein for the redemption by them of the land sold by the state under the proceedings aforesaid to Sampselle for the benefit of the school fund. Appellants say that, should there not appear sufficient defects in the proceedings to avoid the tax sales made by the sheriff, as aforesaid, to Sheppard and to the state, the infant defendants would still have the right, by their guardian or next friend, to redeem the land, and cite section 30 of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899, which says: "Any infant, married woman, or insane person, whose real estate may have been so sold during such disability, may redeem the same by paying to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, within one year after the removal of the disability, the amount for which the same was sold, with the necessary charges incurred by the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, in obtaining the title under the sale, and such additional taxes on the estate as may have been paid by the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, and interest on the said items at the rate of six per centum per annum from the time the same were paid. If any such person own an undivided interest in the real estate so sold, he may redeem such interest in like manner, and within the same time, by paying such proportion of the purchase money, charges, taxes and interest, as his interest in the premises is to the whole tract or part sold; but he shall not have the right to redeem more than his own undivided interest." This section refers to sales made to individuals, and not to sales made to the state. The sales made to the state, upon which the school-fund proceeding was and is predicated, were for the taxes charged upon said land for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893. In that proceeding, appellants filed no petition asking permission to redeem the land. Section 17 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 provides that "the former owner, his heirs, devisees or assigns, of any real estate forfeited for any cause to the state of West Virginia, may at any time during the pendency of the suit for the sale thereof, and before a decree for the confirmation thereof has been made and entered by the court, file his petition therein in manner and form as provided in the next preceding section in relation to the excess of the proceeds of such sale, praying to be allowed to redeem so much only of such real estate as to which the title still remains in the state; and upon the filing of such petition, and upon such proof being made as would entitle the petitioner to the excess of the purchase money of said real estate if the same had been sold, the court may, by a proper decree, permit the petitioner upon the payment into court or to the commissioner of school lands, the costs, taxes and interest properly chargeable thereon, to be fixed by the court in its decree, to redeem the real estate mentioned in his petition." There is no saving in this statute as to persons under disability. Unless there is an express saving in the statute of limitations, no person will come within its exceptions, and the prescribed limitations will operate against persons under disabilities as well as others. Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. (29); Wood on Lim. § 252; Angell on Lim. §§ 194, 476. It follows, therefore, that appellants had and have no right to redeem the land under the last-cited section upon the ground of infancy alone. Appellants' suit is a collateral attack upon the school-land proceeding. In Wiant v. Hays, Com'r, 38 W. Va. 681, 18 S. E. 807, 23 L. R. A. 82, it is held that a proceeding under chapter 105 of the Code of 1887 (now chapter 105 of the Code of 1899) by a commissioner of school lands for the sale of forfeited lands is a judicial proceeding, a suit, not simply an administrative proceeding. The court may in it allow one claiming a right to the surplus of its sale to file his petition asking such surplus to be paid to him. Hays, Com'r, v. Camden's Heirs, 38 W. Va. 109, 18 S. E. 461; Lawson v. Hart, 40 W. Va. 52, 20 S. E. 819; Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682; Yokum v. Snyder, 42 W. Va. 357, 26 S. E. 181; King v. Mullins, 171 U. S. 404, 18 Sup. Ct. 925, 43 L. Ed. 214. Section 7 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 provides that "all suits brought and prosecuted under the provisions of this chapter, shall be commenced as provided in chapter one hundred and twenty-four of the Code, and proceeded in, heard and determined in the same manner, and in all respects as other suits in chancery are brought, prosecuted and proceeded in, and shall be subject to the same rules of chancery practice as other suits in chancery in the state courts of this state, except as herein otherwise provided." Section 10 authorizes the circuit court to decree a sale of such lands as are subject to sale for the benefit of the school fund. Section 18 declares that "in every such suit brought under the provisions of this chapter, the court shall have full jurisdiction, power and authority to hear, try and determine all questions of title, possession and boundary which may arise therein, as well as any and all conflicting claims whatever to the real estate in question arising therein." Section 20 reads thus: "Every final decree entered in any such suit shall be a bar to the claim of every person to the real estate, or any part of it or any lien thereon, or to the proceeds thereof, who has failed to appear and present his claim thereto as is provided in the sixth section of this chapter, except as to the excess of the proceeds of the sale thereof, as provided in section sixteen of this chapter. And except as provided by the last clause of section seventeen of this chapter." By these provisions the circuit court is given complete equitable jurisdiction of the land in controversy, and is required to determine what lands can be sold for the benefit of the school fund. Lawson v. Hart, 40 W. Va. 56, 20 S. E. 819. In Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214, it is held that "such proceeding is a judicial one, in the nature of a proceeding against the land itself, and, when completed by a sale, is prima facie evidence of such forfeiture against all persons. * * * The policy of these laws was to quiet titles as far as possible, and to convey a good title under these sales as far as the commonwealth had the means of doing." On page 501, 36 W. Va., page 218, 15 S. E., the court says: "It is manifest from the whole scope and tenor of the acts on the subject that the regularity of the sale of forfeited lands under the decree of the court was never intended to be drawn in question in any collateral proceeding."

From a final decree entered in such suit, parties may appeal as in other cases. In the school-land proceeding in question the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. All the parties in interest were before the court, "the unknown heirs of James Starr, Jr.," being defendants in the main suit; and to the said petition of A. J. Sheppard, filed therein, the said Samuel, Allen, and John H. Starr were made defendants, and filed their answer thereto by their guardian ad litem. Harriett Starr, as the record recites, appeared, and also filed her answer to said petition. Thus the court had jurisdiction not only of the subject-matter, but also of the parties in interest. The record shows that the cause was heard upon the answer of the infant defendants by their guardian ad litem. The decree of sale made therein, and under which Sampelle purchased the land, and claims title thereto, is not void. If erroneous, any party in interest has his remedy by bill of review or appeal, as in other causes in equity. In Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 692, it is held that the validity of a judgment of a court of record cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction unless the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record. The court, on page 700, says: "If a court of general jurisdiction had jurisdiction to render the judgment which it did render, no error in its proceedings which did not affect its jurisdiction will render the proceeding void, nor can such error be considered when the judgment is collaterally brought in question." See cases therein cited; 1 Black on Judg. § 270.

In one of the two causes of State v. McEl-downey (decided at the present term) 47 S. E. 653, it is held that no defect in a sheriff's affidavit to a list of sales of land for taxes will invalidate a tax deed made under chapter 31 of the Code of 1899. Phillips v. Minnear, 40 W. Va. 58, 20 S. E. 924, and McClain v. Batton, 50 W. Va. 121, 40 S. E. 509, so far as they hold to the contrary, are overruled. In the other (47 S. E. —) it is held that the failure to return a list of delinquent lands sold for taxes by the first Monday in June is not, under chapter 31, § 25, of the Code of 1899, ground for setting aside a sale either to the state or an individual. The defect is cured by that section. Expressions to the contrary in McGhee v. Sampelle, 47 W. Va. 352, 84 S. E. 815, disapproved.

The curative provisions as to tax sales in section 25 of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899 apply to a purchase by the state of land sold for taxes. Point 3 of the syllabus in McGhee v. Sampelle, 47 W. Va. 352, 84 S. E. 815, to the contrary, is overruled.

There appears to be no error in the decree complained of. It must therefore be affirmed.

FARMERS' & SHIPPERS' LEAF TOBACCO WAREHOUSE CO. v. PRIDEMORE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 29, 1904.)

JUDGMENT—ENFORCEMENT—INJUNCTION—FORGED TESTIMONY—RELIEF IN EQUITY—NEW TRIAL.

1. As a general rule, a bill in equity based on perjured testimony given at the law trial, or on false or forged documentary evidence introduced there, will not be entertained; and the allegation that the complainant was surprised by the perjury or forged evidence does not change the rule.

2. It is a rule of law that a party voluntarily going to trial does so at his peril, and he cannot have a new trial merely to give him an opportunity of impeaching the testimony of a witness of which he was apprised or could have been apprised beforehand, and of the very purpose for which the witness was to be called.

3. Where a complainant asks an injunction against a judgment, alleging in his bill that he is now able to prove the matter of his plea or defense of the action at law, which he was unable to prove at the trial, but does not allege some reason, founded in fraud, accident, mistake, or some adventitious circumstance, beyond his control, as the cause of such failure of proof, the injunction should not be allowed.

4. Points 2, 3, and 4 of syllabus in Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 503, approved and applied.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lincoln County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Bill by the Farmers' & Shippers' Leaf Tobacco Warehouse Company against James Pridemore. Decree for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Wilkinson, Lace Marcum, and Campbell, Holt & Duncan, for appellant. C. W. May, and Simms & Enslow, for appellee.

MILLER, J. The Farmers' & Shippers' Leaf Tobacco Warehouse Company, a corporation formed and existing under the laws of the state of Ohio, and having its principal office and place of business in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 29th day of May, 1899, instituted its civil action before J. C. Rusak, a justice in and for the county of Lincoln, in Carroll district thereof, against James Pridemore, for the recovery of the amount due on two contracts in writing, to wit, one a promissory note of said Pridemore to said company, bearing date on the 26th day of March, 1896, for $30, payable 60 days after its date, with interest at 8 per cent., being advanced on 2,000 pounds of tobacco to be shipped to said company; and the other for $109, bearing date on the 28th day of March, 1896, made and payable as aforesaid, 60 days after its date, with interest at 8 per cent., also being advanced on 4,000 pounds of tobacco to be shipped to the company. Both instruments contain certain provisions concerning commissions to the company on the tobacco. The summons commencing the action was made returnable on the 10th day of June, 1899. On that day the trial seems to have been continued until the 8th day of July, 1899, when, on motion of the plaintiff, the trial was again continued until the 29th day of July following. On the day last mentioned the defendant demanded a jury, whereupon the case was further continued until the 31st day of July, 1899. A jury was then impaneled, which found and returned the following verdict: "In the matter of difference between the plaintiff and defendant, we, the jury, find for the defendant for the sum of $123.90." Thereupon D. E. Wilkinson, attorney for the plaintiff, who is also counsel for appellant upon this appeal, requested the justice to suspend judgment upon the verdict until 3 o'clock p. m. on August 1, 1899, which was done, and at that time he moved the justice to set aside the verdict, but the justice refused to do so, and then entered judgment upon said verdict in favor of Pridemore against the company for $123.90, with interest thereon until paid, and costs. The transcript from the docket of the justice shows that the plaintiff filed the two notes, amounting to $139, to be credited with $111.55, and demanded judgment for $27.45, the balance of principal, with proper interest thereon. The defendant filed his claim for $123.90 as a set-off, "and, the plaintiff and defendant being ready for trial," etc., the jurors were selected and sworn, and, having heard the evidence and argument of counsel, found the verdict aforesaid. No appeal was applied for or taken by either party from the judgment thus rendered.

On the 29th day of November, 1899, appellant, the plaintiff in the civil action, instituted its suit in chancery in the circuit court of said county, and on the 23d day of the same month filed its bill against said Pridemore, alleging that it carries on the business of commission merchant in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, and handles and sells leaf tobacco; that during the year 1895 it handled and sold for James Pridemore & Bro. tobacco amounting to the net sum of $1,086.10, which sum it paid to them in full at the close of the year; and that the firm of James Pridemore & Bro. consisted of said James Pridemore and John Pridemore. Plaintiff further says that some of the shipments made to it during the year 1895 by James Pridemore & Bro. were made in the name of James Pridemore individually, and some in the name of Pridemore Bros.; that one of said shipments of three hogsheads of tobacco was made in the name of James Pridemore, was received by plaintiff on the 21st day of June, 1895, and was sold by it on the 14th day of August, 1895, the net proceeds of which amounted to $151.35, and for which shipment plaintiff delivered to said James Pridemore a statement bearing date on the 14th day of August, 1895, and at the same time gave to the firm of James Pridemore & Bro. credit therefor on its books; and that the amount thereof was paid in full to said James Pridemore & Bro. within the year 1895, as aforesaid. Plaintiff also alleges that, through its agent, it advanced to James Pridemore the said sums represented by said two notes sued on, amounting to $139; that on the 17th day of June, 1896, it received from James Pridemore two hogsheads of leaf tobacco, which it on the 2d day of December following sold for the net sum of $111.55, and gave credit for that amount on the said notes, leaving a balance due thereon of $27.45 principal. It is further averred that said judgment is erroneous; that, instead thereof, plaintiff should have recovered a judgment against the defendant for said balance of $27.45, with interest; that said judgment was obtained through fraud, undue means, and false testimony; that on the trial of said action said James Pridemore introduced said statement of the three hogsheads of tobacco shipped in his name in the year 1895, which amounted to the sum of $151.35, as aforesaid, and which sum had been credited to said James Pridemore & Bro. and paid to them in full in the year 1895, as aforesaid; that the date of said statement had been changed from August 14, 1895, to August 14, 1896; that the statement was admitted as evidence on the said trial; that said James Pridemore testified before the jury that the said three hogsheads of tobacco mentioned in the statement had been shipped to the plaintiff in 1896 in his own name, and that he had received the said statement in August, 1896. Plaintiff further alleges that the change of the date of the statement relating to the three hogsheads of tobacco was and is a forgery against it, and to its prejudice; that the testimony of Pridemore was and is untrue; that said Pridemore introduced further evidence on the trial that he had shipped in the year 1896 five hogsheads of tobacco to plaintiff, and that he had been credited with only two of them, amounting to the net sum of $111.55, and that the other three hogsheads were represented in the statement aforesaid for $151.35. Plaintiff also alleges that it had no notice whatever of any defense to its demand against Pridemore until after it had closed its evidence on the trial, except the bare claim of $151.35 for tobacco; that the introduction of the forged statement aforesaid for the three hogsheads of tobacco, amounting to $151.35, purporting to have been made by plaintiff on the 14th day of August, 1896, was a surprise to plaintiff; that it had no means then at hand by which to discover the fraud which Pridemore was attempting to perpetrate and did thereby perpetrate on the plaintiff; and that the fraud thus perpetrated on the plaintiff by reason of this forged statement was not discovered by it until several days thereafter, when it was too late for any relief at law against the fraud. The plaintiff also avers that it did not receive during the year 1896 any shipments in the name of James Pridemore, except the two hogsheads of tobacco, the proceeds of the sale of which amounted to said $111.55, and which sum was credited to him as aforesaid; that after the time had expired in which an appeal could have been taken from said judgment, or to move for a new trial of the action upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, it learned the fact that said James Pridemore had shipped two hogsheads of tobacco during the year 1896, other than the two for which he had been given credit as aforesaid, in the name of W. Vickers, his brother-in-law; that plaintiff had paid to Vickers the net proceeds of the sale of said two hogsheads; that plaintiff was at the time of said judgment entirely ignorant of the fact that said tobacco was the property of Pridemore; that, if Pridemore shipped to plaintiff any other hogsheads of tobacco during the year 1896, such shipment was made in the name of some person other than himself; that, if Pridemore shipped the other hogshead during the year 1896, it was shipped in the name of some other person, to the plaintiff at that time unknown; that it did not know until the time to move for a new trial, and until the time to take an appeal had elapsed, that the said two hogsheads of tobacco had been shipped in the name of Vickers, as aforesaid; that plaintiff did not have any means of ascertaining that fact prior to said trial; and that it could not, by the use of due diligence, have ascertained such fact before said trial and rendition of judgment as aforesaid. Plaintiff further charges that the testimony of said James Pridemore as to the shipment of the three hogsheads of tobacco mentioned in said forged statement was absolutely false; that the alteration of the date of the statement aforesaid by James Pridemore from 1895 to 1896 was and is a forgery, which the said James Pridemore willfully committed, with the specific intent to defraud the plaintiff thereby; that the judgment rendered by the justice as aforesaid against plaintiff was and is a fraud against it; that the judgment was obtained by false and perjured testimony; that said judgment and every part thereof is unjust and erroneous; and that the said Pridemore is justly indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $27.45, with proper interest. The bill then prays as injunction to restrain, inhibit, and enjoin said James Pridemore from collecting or attempting to collect said judgment; that the said judgment for $151.35 in favor of Pridemore be set aside; that a new trial of said action be granted to plaintiff; and for general relief. The injunction was granted by the court as prayed for in the bill, whereupon the defendant, Pridemore, filed his demurrer to said bill, in which demurrer the plaintiff joined; and he also filed his answer, in which he specifically denies all of the material allegations of the bill, and specifically avers therein that at the trial of said action plaintiff was represented by its attorney and by B. F. McGee, its agent, who negotiated and represented it in the transactions relating to the tobacco; that the matter now in controversy was then and there fully litigated; that none of the evidence given on said trial was taken down; that plaintiff made no effort to obtain an appeal from said judgment, or to bring it into the circuit court by certiorari; and that there was no fraud, collusion, or false swearing on the part of defendant or any of his witnesses to bring about said verdict and judgment. Respondent further avers that, at the first calling of the case before the justice, he filed his account, as required by law, showing that he would claim credit for three hogsheads of tobacco sold by plaintiff for him on the 14th day of August, 1896, amounting to $151.35; that when he so filed his account, which is evidenced by the original statement filed before the justice, the plaintiff then and there demanded of and obtained from the justice a continuance of the trial of said action, for the reason that the filing of the account was new matter, and that it was necessary for it to have a continuance, in order that it might secure evidence in relation thereto; that it was granted a continuance for that purpose; and that it did procure the evidence of certain witnesses, and submitted it to the jury, to show that defendant did not ship to it the three hogsheads of tobacco as claimed by him. Respondent further says that plaintiff had full notice of the nature of his defense to its action, and a fair opportunity of being heard in respect thereto; that, if plaintiff had any evidence in relation to said three hogsheads of tobacco which was not submitted to the jury, it was its own fault; and that all of said matters arising in said action were passed upon by the jury and justice, and were fully and completely litigated and adjudicated between the parties. Depositions were taken by both parties and filed in the cause. On the 27th day of August, 1901, the cause was heard upon the bill and exhibits, the answer of defendant, Pridemore, with general replication thereto, and upon the depositions taken and filed as aforesaid, whereupon the injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed at plaintiff's costs. From this decree, plaintiff was allowed an appeal, and assigns as ground of error that the circuit court refused to grant it the relief prayed for in its bill.

By the depositions of plaintiff's sales clerk, auditor, and of other witnesses, who file statements taken from the books of the company, the contention of plaintiff as to the number of hogsheads of tobacco shipped to it by Pridemore & Bro. in 1896, and by James Pridemore in 1898, and as to the disposition of the net proceeds of the sales thereof, is sustained. The sales clerk, having inspected the statement for the three hogsheads of tobacco put in evidence on the trial by the defendant, says that he made out the same on the 14th day of August, 1895; that it is his best impression that he immediately mailed the statement to Pridemore; and that he did not make out or mail to Pridemore any such statement in 1896. But the witness is not asked, and does not testify, that said statement has in any manner been changed or altered since he made out and mailed the same to Pridemore. It is shown that the statement appears to be in the same handwriting as the entry on the company's account of sales book for the month of August, 1895. Witness Beazell, the assistant cashier of the Citizens' National Bank, testifies as follows: "I find the statement [meaning the statement of the hogsheads of tobacco in question] somewhat defaced, but that, on careful examination under a magnifying glass, the date is undoubtedly August 14, 1895. I also find that the account of sales corresponds with an entry on the account of sales books of the company under date of August 14, 1895, and the '5' in the account of sales book bears a striking resemblance to the '5' in said account of sales. I find that the figure '5' in the 1895 in the Pridemore account of sales seems to have been tampered with to make it look like a figure '6,' by placing a dot in the middle of the figure, which dot seems to have been made with different colored ink from that ordinarily used, and thus makes the statement read 1896 instead of 1895." B. F. McGee, another witness for the plaintiff, testifies that he was the agent of the plaintiff during the years 1895, 1896, and 1897; that he was present at the trial of said action; that he never examined the statement for the three hogsheads of tobacco introduced by Pridemore as evidence until the day of the trial, but that he knew of a similar statement for the same tobacco. James Pridemore testifies that the statement for the three hogsheads of tobacco was not forged by him or by any other person that he knew of, that his evidence given before the justice and the jury was the truth, and that said judgment is the just amount due him from the plaintiff. There is much more of the evidence, but a sufficient portion thereof has been stated for the purpose of making a proper application of the legal principles involved in the determination of this cause.

It has been stated that the judgment complained of was rendered by a justice. Section 50 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899 prescribes the "rules of pleading" for that court as follows: "First. The complaint by the plaintiff. Second. The answer by the defendant. (2) The pleadings may be oral or in writing; if oral, the substance of them shall be entered by the justice in his docket; if in writing they shall be filed by him and a reference to them be made in the docket. In either case if the parties appear and the defendant make defense they shall be made up on the return day of the summons, unless good cause be shown to the contrary. * * * (4) The answer of the defendant may contain: First, a denial of the complaint or some part thereof; second, a statement of the facts constituting a defense or counterclaim. (5) Such pleadings are not required to be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. (6) Either party may except to a pleading of his adversary when it is not sufficiently explicit to be understood, or it contains no cause of action or defense. (7) If the justice deem the exception well founded he shall order the pleading to be amended, and if the party refuse to amend, the defective pleading shall be disregarded. (8) In an action or defense founded upon an account, note, or other writing for the payment of money, it shall be sufficient for the party to deliver the account, note, or other writing to the justice and to state that there is due to him thereon from the adverse party a specific sum, which he claims to recover or set-off in the action. * * * (10) The pleadings may be amended at any time before the trial, or during the trial, when by such amendment substantial justice will be promoted. If the amendment be made during the trial and it be shown to the satisfaction of the justice by the oath of the opposite party, or his agent or attorney that a continuance of the cause is necessary in consequence of such amendment, a continuance shall be granted. * * * (11) The justice may, at any time before the trial, require either party at the request of the other, at that or some other specified time, if the action or defense be founded upon an account, to file a complete statement of the items thereof, with his complaint or answer, and in case of his default, may preclude him from giving evidence at the trial of any item not so filed." A defendant who files an account or claim of set-off against the plaintiff's demand is deemed to have brought an action against the plaintiff for such account or claim of set-off at the time of filing the same.

It is alleged and proved by plaintiff that it did not know, and had no means of knowing, that defendant had the said statement for $151.35, bearing date August 14, 1896, until he offered it as evidence on the trial; and upon this ground, with others, it asks in this cause that said judgment be set aside, and that a new trial of the action be granted to it. It is shown that McGee, the agent of plaintiff, was conversant with the transactions between Pridemore & Bro. and James Pridemore and plaintiff; that he knew before and at the time of the trial that Pridemore had a statement relating to the tobacco; that he (McGee) was present with plaintiff's attorney, Wilkinson, at the trial; and that a continuance of the case had before that time been granted to enable the company to procure evidence with which to contest the defendant's claim. Plaintiff could have demanded that the pleadings of the defendant be filed on the return day of the summons, and, if insufficient, could have excepted thereto. It could have demanded that the account of defendant against the plaintiff be filed with the justice, with a complete statement of the items thereof. Before the trial, at plaintiff's request, it was the duty of the justice to require the defendant to file a complete statement of the items of his account upon which he demanded judgment. The plaintiff seems to have been satisfied with such pleadings and notice of defense as defendant had filed before and at the time of the trial. It demanded no other or better notice by written or oral statement from defendant, but went to trial before a jury and submitted its evidence upon the whole case. Under the statute above cited, if the plaintiff had been surprised during the trial by the production of the account in question by the defendant, and it had been then shown to the satisfaction of the justice, by the oath of the plaintiff, or its agent or attorney, both of whom were present, that a continuance of the cause was necessary, in consequence thereof, it would have been the duty of the justice to have granted such continuance upon such terms as to him seemed just. The statement from the books of plaintiff, introduced in this cause to show the alleged alteration of the account filed by defendant as aforesaid, and to prove the falsity of defendant's evidence given on said trial, were all in the possession of plaintiff before and at the time of the trial. It is admitted in plaintiff's brief that the plaintiff's office and place of business is only 182 miles from the place of the trial by the justice. From the return day of the summons, June 10, 1896, to the day of the trial of the action, July 31, 1896, the plaintiff had ample time to procure its books, papers, and witnesses from Cincinnati to refute the claim of defendant, Pridemore, concerning said account, if it had such evidence. We know that the transmission of a letter from the office of the justice in Carroll district of Lincoln district to the company, by its attorney or agent, and a reply thereto, would not necessarily have required very many days. There is no reason shown why the evidence of the plaintiff presented in this cause was not adduced before the jury and justice, except the statement of plaintiff that it had no means of knowing that the said account was forged, or that the evidence of defendant was false. It seems, by its production by the company in this cause, that the plaintiff then had the same evidence upon that question which it now has. If the plaintiff had demanded its rights under the statute cited, its present defense to said account and judgment could have been fully presented to and considered by the jury on said trial. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 895, says: "And this leads us to remark in the next place that relief will not be granted by staying proceedings at law after a verdict, if the party applying has been guilty of laches as to the matter of defense, or might by reasonable diligence have procured the requisite proofs before the trial." Section 896 of this work, after citing authority therefor, says: "It is not sufficient to show that injustice has been done, but that it has been done under circumstances which authorize the court to interfere. Because, if a matter has been already investigated in a court of justice according to the common and ordinary rules of investigation, a court of equity cannot take on itself to enter into it again. Rules are established, some by the Legislature, some by the courts themselves, for the purpose of putting an end to litigation. And it is more important that an end should be put to litigation, than that justice should be done in every case." As a general rule, a court of equity will not interfere with a judgment at law solely because the principal witness was mistaken as to facts, and was subsequently found to be in error. Nor will relief be granted where the party has been deprived of his defense in any manner through his neglect or laches. Vaughn v. Johnson et al., 1 Stok. Ohy. 173; Walker v. Kretsinger et al., 48 Ill. 502. Relief will not be granted for the purposes of a new trial at law where the party lost his opportunity of defense by his own negligence. Dodge et al. v. Strong, 2 Johns. Ch. 228. The jurisdiction of a court of equity over trials at law, compelling the party who has gained a verdict to submit to a new trial, or be forever enjoined from proceeding on his verdict, is now very rarely exercised, and never except in a very clear case of fraud or injustice, or upon newly discovered evidence, which could not possibly have been produced at the first trial. Floyd v. Jayne, 6 Johns. Ch. 479. An injunction will not be granted to stay proceedings at law on a judgment on the ground that the defendant at law was prevented by public business from making due preparations for and attending at the trial, and that the plaintiff had, on the evidence of one witness, whom he had suborned to swear falsely, recovered a verdict for a much larger sum in damages than he was justly entitled to, and that the Supreme Court had refused to grant a new trial in the cause. Smith v. Lowry, 1 Johns. Ch. 320; High on Inj. vol. 1, § 173.

Appellant contends that it should have the judgment aforesaid set aside, and cites Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589, 12 Sup. Ct. 62, 35 L. Ed. 870, which, among other things, says: "That a trial was had of the suit No. 607, and the said Mayer introduced evidence of the existence of a letter from your petitioner to the said Boyd authorizing him, the said Boyd, to make a contract by which her lien as lessor on the crops produced by the several defendants and other tenants on said plantation should be waived in favor of the said Mayer or of others, as furnishers of supplies to said tenants; that upon such evidence so offered, and of the existence of which the petitioner could not possibly be aware, and of which she had no knowledge until, subsequent to the trial, judgment was rendered against her in said suit and in the several other suits mentioned; * * * that the pretended letter authorizing him to make such contract, if it ever had an existence, which petitioner denies, was a false and forged document, not written and not signed by her; that your petitioner has never authorized the said Boyd or any other person whatever to waive her lien as lessor in favor of the said Mayer or any other furnisher of supplies, and has never written the pretended letter or any other letter to the said Boyd, or to any other person whatsoever, containing such authority; * * * that the testimony of said Mayer as to the existence of said pretended letter is false and in pursuance of a conspiracy to defraud petitioner, or that said pretended letter, if it ever had an existence, is a false and forged document; that this testimony, and much more testimony necessary to establish the falsity of said evidence upon which said judgments were obtained, and the forgery of said pretended letter to said Boyd, was unknown to petitioner at the time of the trial, and could not have been known to or anticipated by her, and has been discovered by her since the rendition of said judgments in said suit, and since the lapse of the legal delays within which a motion could be made for a new trial; and that there has been no laches on her part in failing to show the falsity of such evidence and the forgery of such pretended letter on the trial of the cause." At page 592, 141 U. S., and page 63, 12 Sup. Ct., 35 L. Ed. 870, the court says: "Such was the case made in the petition. The relief asked was an injunction against Mayer and the defendant in error Holmes, sheriff of the parish, restraining them from executing the above judgments, or any of them; that Mayer be cited to answer the petitioner's demand; that the judgments be annulled and avoided as obtained upon false testimony and forged documents; and that the petitioner have general and equitable relief." And at page 596, 141 U. S., and page 64, 12 Sup. Ct., 35 L. Ed. 870, the court further says: "According to the averments of the original petition for injunction filed in the state court, which averments must be taken to be true in determining the removability of the suit, the judgments in question would not have been rendered against Mrs. Marshall but for the use in evidence of the letter alleged to be forged. The case evidently intended to be presented by the petition is one where, without negligence, laches, or other fault upon the part of petitioner, Mayer has fraudulently obtained judgments, which he seeks, against conscience, to enforce by execution. While, as a general rule, a defense cannot be set up in equity which has been fully and fairly tried at law, and although, in view of the large powers now exercised by courts of law over their judgments, a court of the United States, sitting in equity, will not assume to control such judgments for the purpose simply of giving a new trial, it is the settled doctrine that 'any fact which clearly proves it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery.' Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, 7 Oranch, 332, 336 [8 L. Ed. 362]; Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 17 How. 443, 445 [15 L. Ed. 123]; Crim v. Handley, 94 U. S. 652, 653 [24 L. Ed. 216]; Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93, 96 [26 L. Ed. 665]; Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 8, 11 [2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346]; Knox County v. Harshman, 133 U. S. 152, 154 [10 Sup. Ct. 257, 33 L. Ed. 586]; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 887, 1574; Floyd v. Jayne, 6 Johns. Ch. 479, 482. See, also, United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 65 [25 L. Ed. 93]." It will be at once observed that in the case above cited the letter was alleged to be a forgery, and that plaintiff in that case had no knowledge or means of knowledge thereof until after the trial of the case, and until after the time had elapsed in which a motion for a new trial could have been made. The case before us is very different. Here the plaintiff had its books and its witnesses before and at the time of the trial. By the use of due diligence it could have had its evidence before the jury and justice at the trial of the action in which the judgment complained of was recovered against it.

Plaintiff also cites Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 508, as follows: "A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence when it goes merely to impeach the testimony of a witness at a former trial, nor to let in cumulative evidence as to matter which was principally controverted at the former trial; but if the newly discovered evidence is sufficient to utterly destroy the former testimony, by showing that it was entirely false or founded on perjury, then a new trial should be granted. The rule in this respect is the same both in courts of equity and at law. But where the testimony thus discovered relates to a fact which was in issue and supported by evidence in the former trial, it must be of a conclusive character—such as, if it had been produced on the former trial, should have produced a different verdict, and which would necessarily entitle the plaintiff to relief in the suit in which it is alleged, unless overcome by new evidence from the opposite side. Story's Eq. Pl. § 413; Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124; Peagram v. King, 9 N. C. 605. * * * Second. Equity will not relieve a party against a judgment at law on the ground of after-discovered evidence, or of a defense of which he was ignorant until judgment was rendered, unless he shows that by the exercise of ordinary diligence he could not discover such evidence or defense, or that he was prevented from employing the same by fraud, accident, or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with laches or negligence on his part. Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79; Knapp v. Snyder, 15 W. Va. 434; Slack v. Wood, 9 Grat. 40; Enquirer Co. v. Robinson, 24 Grat. 548. Hevener v. McClung, 22 W. Va. 81, is very much like the case at bar. There the defense sought to be introduced was a legal defense, which was suspected by the plaintiff to exist before the judgment at law was rendered, and he was apprised of the evidence by which he could prove it, if it really existed; but he failed to produce the evidence, and let judgment go against him. This court held that such party was not entitled to relief in equity." We are unable to see how this case supports the contention of appellant.

As a general rule, a bill for relief based on perjured testimony given at the law trial, or on false or forged documentary evidence introduced there, will not be entertained; and the allegation that the complainant was surprised by the perjury or forged evidence does not change the rule. 11 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1183. It is a rule of law, on the subject of new trials, that a party going voluntarily to trial goes at his peril, and he cannot have a new trial merely to give him an opportunity of impeaching the testimony of a witness of which he was apprised or could have been apprised beforehand, and of the very purpose for which he was to be called. He must at least show that he had since discovered testimony of which he had no knowledge before the trial. Woodworth v. Buskerk, 1 Johns. Ch. 432; Gott v. Carr, 6 Gill & J. 309. Here the plaintiff could have been apprised before and at the time of the trial of the action before the justice of the very purpose for which the witnesses for the defendant were to be called, had it required the defendant to file a complete statement of the items of his account for which he claimed a set-off and judgment. The mischief of retrying every case in which the judgment or decree rendered on false testimony given by perjured witnesses, or on contracts or documents whose genuineness or validity was in issue, and which are afterwards ascertained to be forged or fraudulent, would be greater, by reason of the endless nature of the strife, than any compensation arising from doing justice in individual cases. U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. Ed. 93. The doctrine is equally well settled that the court will not set aside a judgment because it was founded on a fraudulent instrument or perjured evidence, or for any matter which was actually presented and considered in the judgment assailed. Hamilton v. McLean, 139 Mo. 678, 687, 41 S. W. 224. There is no allegation of fraud, accident, mistake, or other adventitious circumstances in the plaintiff's bill, whereby it was prevented from producing its proof in defense of said account on the trial before the justice. Failure of proof upon the trial at law will not, in the absence of fraud, accident, mistake, or other adventitious circumstances, warrant a court of equity in granting relief against a judgment. Thus, where complainant asks an injunction against a judgment, alleging in his bill that he is now able to prove the matter of his plea in defense of the action at law, which he was unable to prove at the trial, but does not suggest fraud, accident, mistake, or other circumstances as the cause of such failure of proof, the injunction will not be allowed. High on Inj. c. 3, § 168; Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79; Hogg's Eq. Pr. 472, 473. There is no allegation in the bill that plaintiff applied for or was refused an appeal from the judgment. No sufficient reason is averred therein why it did not make such application. If sufficient relief could have been had by an appeal from the judgment, but the party aggrieved has been negligent in prosecuting his appeal, and has thereby lost his remedy, he will be denied relief by injunction against the judgment. So, too, a judgment debtor who has lost his remedy by appeal by reason of a defect in his proceedings will not be allowed to enjoin the judgment. Long v. Smith, 39 Tex. 160. In the case of Brown v. Nutter, 46 S. E. 375, 54 W. Va. —, this court holds that, to sustain a bill of review for newly discovered evidence, the duty devolves upon the plaintiff, first, to produce evidence clearly decisive of the case; second, to show that such evidence could not have been discovered by due diligence. Hogg's Eq. Pr. 476, 477. According to the well-settled principles of equity, the plaintiff has wholly failed to make out such a case as entitles it to the relief prayed for, because the matters in controversy between the parties were submitted to the jury and justice and passed upon without objection by either litigant. The alleged newly discovered evidence was then in possession of plaintiff, and could have been produced by it on the trial by the use of due diligence. As shown, it is either cumulative or contradictory of Pridemore's evidence.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court appealed from. The decree is therefore affirmed.

HALL v. STAUNTON, Clerk of County Court.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 25, 1904.)

MANDAMUS—WHEN ISSUED—ABSTRACT RIGHT.

1. The extraordinary writ of mandamus will never be issued in any case where it is unnecessary, or where, if issued, it would prove unavailing, fruitless, and nugatory. The court will not compel the doing of a vain thing. A mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the party asking mandamus, will not be enforced by the writ.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition by Addison Hall for writ of mandamus to E. W. Staunton, clerk of the county court. Refused.

Linn, Byrne & Cato and P. G. Walker, for petitioner. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for respondent.

BRANNON, J. Addison Hall presented to this court a petition praying for a mandamus against E. W. Staunton, clerk of the county court of Kanawha county, to compel Staunton to allow Hall to inspect the pollbooks, tally sheets, and certificates of precinct returns of a special election held in that county on May 9, 1903, upon the question of issuing bonds to fund the county's indebtedness. Staunton resists the award of a mandamus. The petition says that Hall demanded such inspection of Staunton, but was refused it. The petition states that the clerks made a statement from the returns that the bond proposition had carried, but that two members of the county court secretly met and caused to be entered on the election record an order declaring that the proposition to issue bonds had not carried, but that said order was false, and that the returns as originally made showed that the proposition had carried, and that the returns had been fraudulently altered. The petition further states that Hall obtained from the circuit court a mandamus nisi against the members of the county court requiring them to convene as a board of canvassers and canvass the returns of said election, on the claim that no canvass had been locally made, and that the circuit court quashed the mandamus nisi, and dismissed Hall's petition, with costs, and that Hall had the record copied with a view to applying to the Supreme Court for a writ of error to reverse the judgment of the circuit court; and that he again asked Staunton for an inspection of the said election documents, stating that he desired it in connection with said proceeding, but was refused such inspection. The petitioner says that he desires to see the documents particularly for the reason that he had been informed that the result of the election, as it appeared on the election papers, had been changed, and that he believed that the true returns would show that the bond proposition had been carried. The petition states that "the question of whether or not said writ of error shall be applied for and prosecuted has been under advisement, and petitioner has not decided whether to apply for said writ or to abandon it," and that the facts to be ascertained by such inspection would weigh largely in determining that question. It further states that another object of such inspection was to see whether such forgeries and alterations had been made.

The ruling question is, does Hall present such a case as calls for a mandamus to compel the clerk to allow the inspection of the election papers? And that question may be narrowed to this question: Will the mandamus avail any useful legal purpose for Hall? In Payne v. Staunton, 46 S. E. 927, we held that one asking a mandamus must show a right vested in him to be vindicated or aided by the writ. That is not the question in this case. Conceded that one having, or even contemplating, a suit, has a right to inspect records in connection with or in furtherance of it, or even merely to determine upon the advisability of such suit, still he must show that an inspection is necessary; that it will be useful, and avail him for that purpose. More plainly yet, the writ will not be granted where it appears that the thing he seeks will answer no legal purpose. In State v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 672, 35 S. E. 959, we said that mandamus "will only go to secure or protect a clear legal right," and that it will not go "if it would prove fruitless." Authorities are there given for those rules of law. "The court will refuse to grant a mandamus when it is manifest it will be barren and fruitless, or useless, or cannot have a beneficial effect." Cristman v. Peck, 90 Ill. 150. "Mandamus will not be granted where it would be fruitless to afford the relief sought." Lamar v. Wilkins, 28 Ark. 34. "The extraordinary writ of mandamus will never be issued in any case where it is unnecessary, or where, if issued, it would prove unavailing, fruitless, and nugatory. The court will not compel the doing of a vr a thing. * * * A mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the relator, will not be enforced by mandamus." 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 756.

Test the case by these plain law principles. Hall says that he wants this inspection to make up his mind whether he will or will not ask a writ of error from the judgment of the circuit court refusing a mandamus to compel the county canvassers to canvass the returns of the bond election. This is not a satisfactory statement of actual purpose in asking an inspection. It does not indicate upon what condition or in what event, dependent upon the revelation of such inspection, he will ask a writ of error. He does not say whether, in any event, he will ask it. He does not say that in certain event he will ask a writ of error. But, waive this objection, though forcible, because the petition does not tell of an actual use, in some event, of such inspection. Apart from this objection to the statement of the purpose of inspection, we say that it does not appear that such inspection will serve any legal purpose; but, on the contrary, it is apparent that it will not do so, but will be fruitless and useless. And why? Because those election documents, whatever they might reveal, whether wrongfully altered or not, could not be considered upon either a petition for a writ of error or upon the hearing of such writ if granted; and this for the reason that such writ of error must be heard only on the record as it was in the circuit court when decided, and no papers dehors that record can be looked at. This is unquestionable. Counsel for Hall frankly admits this to be so. This decides the case, for no purpose for which inspection is wanted is specified; and when we know that the papers cannot be used upon a writ of error, we desist of other use. Hall says he wants to see the papers to conclude whether or not to ask a writ of error; but, as they cannot be used upon a writ of error, we fail to see how they could enter into the process of determining for or against applying for a writ of error. No other purpose of inspection being given us, we might stop here, and not enter the field of speculation as to some other purpose for which the papers might be used. The petition does not show that any legal proceeding involving the result of said election is going on in which such election papers are to be used; nor does it say that Hall contemplates any procedure in which they could be used. The only legal proceeding mentioned in the petition as one in connection with which the inspection is asked is that mandamus decided by the circuit court; but that is closed by final judgment. No disclosure made by an inspection of these election papers could be used in amending that case. Let us imagine that Hall should sue out a writ of error, and this court should reverse the circuit court's decision. The record could not be amended so as to introduce matter shown by those election papers; but this court would upon reversal award a mandamus to compel the canvassers to canvass the election returns, and upon that canvass inspection of the election documents would be had, and all they revealed considered, or presented for consideration, and any wrong done Hall would be righted upon certiorari or mandamus, and thus would be afforded a remedy for any grievance. This is an additional reason against our award against a mandamus, because it lies not where other remedy is at hand. And this goes further to show that an inspection cannot help Hall to get what he would seek by writ of error, and what he sought in the circuit court, namely, a canvass of the returns. How can those documents help to get a canvass by the only suit he mentions—that is, by the writ of error? Though there be the abstract right of inspection, mandamus will not issue when it cannot avail anything.

It is suggested that the matter of costs in the mandamus suit in the circuit court enters into this matter as presenting a pecuniary interest in Hall. We do not see that it is material. The principles above stated apply to costs as to other aspects of the case. Costs depend on the record as completed in the circuit court, and upon the decision touching them the election papers could not be read. We do not rest our decision upon the question whether Hall has such interest as enables him to maintain a writ of mandamus, but we hold that the inspection he seeks could answer no purpose in Hall's concluding whether to ask for a writ of error, because he must know, in considering whether to do so, that the documents can play no part in seeking a writ of error or in its consideration. The inspection would be futile for the purpose, the one only purpose in contemplation.

The petition charged alteration of the return. How can that operate in this case? If altered, that could not be considered on writ of error. We can ascribe this purpose only to a design to discover malefaction for idle curiosity, because it is not indicated that in this there was even a design to render the clerk liable civilly or criminally. There must be a purpose, a substantial right recognized by law to be vindicated, to warrant a mandamus. It is not lightly called into exercise. Merrill on Mandamus, § 49. It will not lie for mere discovery of crime, for mere curiosity or fancy; nor do we think it will lie to reveal crime merely to bring upon another infamy and disgrace. People v. Masonic, 98 Ill. 635. In Payne v. Staunton, cited, we held that it would not lie for a private individual to ferret out crime. The writ is a civil writ, not a criminal process, nor an auxiliary criminal process. State v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 672, 35 S. E. 959. The prosecution of offenses is committed by law to certain public officers and agents, and individuals cannot interfere, except by suing out a warrant or going before a grand jury. As an individual member of the state, such are his processes to vindicate the broken criminal law, not mandamus. Viewed as a person acting only on his own right, he cannot act, because he has no individual right; and viewed as a member of society representing the public, the law appoints other processes for him than mandamus. So we do not see that the charges of forgery made in the petition can call for mandamus, therefore we refuse the peremptory mandamus, and discharge the rule.

STATE v. SULLIVAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 1, 1904.)

MALICIOUS SHOOTING—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. On a trial of Sullivan for maliciously shooting White, a warrant for the arrest of Sullivan, sworn out by White, is admissible evidence for the state, to show grudge and malice on the part of Sullivan.

2. If a new trial depends upon the weight of testimony, or inferences from it, the jury are exclusively and almost uncontrollably the judges.

3. Where some evidence has been given to sustain a verdict, a new trial will not be granted merely because the case is somewhat doubtful, or the judge, if a juror, would have found a different verdict. The evidence must be plainly, manifestly insufficient, and the verdict work injustice. This applies a fortiori to an appellate court.

4. The supreme court may in some instances grant a new trial even on conflicting evidence, but should do so rarely and with the utmost caution. It should do so only where the verdict plainly works wrong and injustice.

5. A verdict should not be set aside when the evidence is contradictory, if, after the evidence has been considered most favorably to the verdict, it does not still appear that the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence.

6. The opinion of a circuit court refusing a new trial dependent on oral evidence, involving only questions of fact, is very forcible in the appellate court.

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Wayne Sullivan was convicted of maliciously shooting, and brings error. Affirmed.

John S. Marcum, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the State.

BRANNON, J. Wayne Sullivan was sentenced to the penitentiary for two years by the circuit court of Mingo county upon an indictment for maliciously shooting John White.

One complaint of Sullivan against the conviction is that the state gave in evidence a warrant issued by a justice for the arrest of Sullivan upon a charge of adultery, which the justice had committed to the hands of White to be executed. The warrant was sworn out by White. The charge being one of malicious shooting, this warrant was competent to show grudge and malice on the part of Sullivan. The fact that White made the charge might naturally excite grudge and malice in the breast of Sullivan, and tend to show intentional, malicious shooting.

Sullivan complains that the court refused a new trial. Again and again this court is expected to perform the function of a jury and the circuit upon purely questions of fact. The shooting is admitted by Sullivan, but he sets up self-defense. That is peculiarly one of fact in this case, and proper for a jury. State v. Newman, 49 W. Va. 724, 39 S. E. 655. White had in his hands a warrant for the arrest of Wayne Sullivan, which had been given him by the justice to execute. Harve Sullivan, brother of the defendant, had received from another justice a warrant to arrest White for the petty offense of contempt to a justice, in failing to return all papers in his hands to the justice; it being ascertained that he was not a bonded constable. Harve Sullivan was made a special constable to execute this warrant, and summoned Wayne Sullivan, a brother, and John Justice, brother-in-law, to assist. They went to White's home, Harve armed with a pistol, and Wayne with a 44 Winchester rifle. White saw them coming, seized a mountain rifle, and stood in his door and warned them not to come in. He also had a pistol, which in the battle he tried to fire, but it snapped. It does not appear that he knew they had a warrant. He and his wife and son say he cocked the gun, and he accidentally touched the trigger, and it went off. They swear he did not shoot at the Sullivans. The Sullivans say he did. Both the Sullivans fired on White while in his house. One ball passed in the back part of the house. A ball from Wayne Sullivan's gun entered both White's arms, and caused the amputation of one. Both sides say, by conflict in the evidence, that the other fired the first shot. Certain it is that the Sullivans went to White's armed to the teeth to execute a warrant for a petty offense. Likely the jury thought they seized this warrant as a cover to execute a sedate plan to kill White. There is evidence that Sullivan said, if White drew a gun on him, he would shoot his heart out. It was proven that there had been mutual arrests of one another before. There was bad blood. Marion Kennedy swore that, before the occurrence, Wayne Sullivan said to him that, if ever he got an opportunity, John White would never have the pleasure of handcuffing another two men together; that he had handcuffed him and Harve together. He told Crocket Hatfield that he would meet John White some time or another on Four Train with a 44. There was considerable oral evidence, conflicting as to the circumstances at the scene of combat. The jury and circuit court have passed on it. A glance at Hugus' valuable West Virginia Criminal Digest, 168, will show that we cannot reverse the circuit court and jury without a violation of numerous cases. Whenever a motion is made on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, the opinion of the circuit court is entitled to great respect (State v. Hunter, 37 W. Va. 744, 17 S. E. 307), because, as Judge Holt put it, "he saw the witnesses face to face, and could, better than we, judge of their credibility" (Smith v. Parkersburg, 48 W. Va. 232 [37 S. E. 645]). "Why have juries, if appellate judges are to go into the business of weighing evidence as if by the ounce and pound. We ought not to do this. It is an abuse of power, and misconception of our function and of the jury function. The jury institution and a verdict are to be highly respected." State v. Bowyer, 43 W. Va. 182, 27 S. E. 301. There is nowhere that the true aspect of a criminal case can be as well seen as in the circuit court, face to face with the witnesses. State v. Morgan, 35 W. Va. 277, 18 S. E. 385. If the question depends on weight of testimony, or inferences or deductions from facts proven, the jury are exclusively and uncontrollably the judges. The court cannot interfere in a doubtful case. The court must be satisfied that the evidence is plainly insufficient. State v. Cooper, 26 W. Va. 838; State v. Donohoo, 22 W. Va. 761; Vaiden's Case, 12 Grat. 717. Where some evidence has been given to sustain the verdict, it is rarely that the appellate court will interfere. Miller v. Ins. Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 29 Am. Rep. 452; Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. 712; Sheff v. Huntington, 16 W. Va. 307, § 14. And where the evidence is conflicting, the appellate court has still more limited range in interfering with the verdict. In fact, it has often been held that in such case the court may even refuse to certify the evidence at all. Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. (Ann. Ed.) 712. A court cannot now refuse, because of section 9, c. 131, Code 1891, requiring all the evidence to be certified. In federal courts a new trial cannot be had on the ground of want of evidence. Once it was so in Virginia. Baker's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 353; Case's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 264. In Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. 712, it is held that "where the evidence is contradictory, and the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, a new trial may be granted by the court which presides at the trial; but its decision is not the subject of a writ of error or superseas, or examinable by an appellate court." In Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. (Ann. Ed.) 132, the opinion says: "Upon familiar principles, recognized and approved in numerous cases, when there is a conflict of evidence an appellate court will never set aside a verdict, when the court which tried the case and heard the witnesses concurs with the jury, and has refused a new trial." Now, though, as admitted in Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 686, the statute has changed former rulings, so as not to entirely close the door on a new trial where the evidence conflicts, and demanded that conflicting evidence shall be weighed, it has not altered the inherent quality of contradictory evidence. It is still contradictory, still inconclusive, still infects a case with doubt. It still leaves the fact stand that we cannot, from mere type, tell which side to believe, whereas the jury in the circuit court can do so, and have decided one side to be truthful, the other false. We have held that, even where evidence conflicts, we can grant a new trial. Grogan v. O. & O. R. Co., 39 W. Va. 415, 19 S. E. 563; Robertson v. Harmon, 47 W. Va. 500, 35 S. E. 832. "But the power must be exercised cautiously," those cases hold, only where there is plain wrong and injustice. Gilmer v. Sidenstricker, 42 W. Va. 52, 24 S. E. 566; Campbell v. Lynn, 7 W. Va. 665; Smith v. Railroad, 48 W. Va. 69, 35 S. E. 834. "The verdict ought not to be interfered with when the evidence is contradictory, if, when most favorably considered in support of the verdict, it does not still appear that the verdict was not plainly warranted by the evidence." Gwynn v. Schwartz, 32 W. Va. 487, 9 S. E. 880. The same rules in civil and criminal cases apply on question of new trial.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION—FRAUD—RELATIONSHIP OF PARTIES.

1. Retention by the grantor of the possession of real estate, conveyed by him, with intent to defraud his creditors, is a badge of fraud, and casts upon the parties the burden of showing that the grantor is holding in good faith under the grantee as his tenant, or consistently with the deed.

2. When, in case of such retention of possession, the grantee, in an attempt to prove such tenancy, discloses acts of his own, in respect to the crops raised on the land by his alleged tenant, inconsistent with fairness and good faith toward the creditors of the grantor, he thereby not only fails to repel the inference of fraud arising from the act of permitting the grantor to remain in possession, but establishes an additional circumstance tending to show participation on his part in the fraud of the grantor.

3. When a conveyance is attacked by creditors of the grantor on the ground of fraud, the burden is upon the grantee to prove full payment of an adequate consideration for the property, and if it appear that, in addition to the land, he received from the grantor certain choses in action, his failure to show such payment of such consideration for the assignment of such choses in action, as well as part of the alleged purchase money of the land, is potent evidence of fraud in the entire transaction.

4. To sustain the claim of payment of consideration in such case, when the amounts are large, the testimony of the grantee, if uncorroborated by receipts, memoranda, or other documentary evidence, must be clear, positive, definite, consistent with other evidence offered by him, and free from self-contradiction.

5. Relationship between the parties, by blood or affinity, calls upon the court for careful and close scrutiny of the transaction and the conduct of, and evidence offered by, the grantee.

6. Failure to allow set-offs is not cause for reversal of a decree at the instance of a party who did not ask for, or rely upon a claim to, them in the court below.

7. When a conveyance is decreed to be fraudulent upon a bill filed by a single creditor of the grantor, and no other creditors have questioned it, and it does not appear that there are any others, it is unnecessary and erroneous to order a convention of the creditors of the grantor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Berkeley County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Bill by William B. Colston, administrator, and others, against Maria E. Janney and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Victor D. Miller, appeals. Affirmed.

Forrest W. Brown, for appellant. Flick, Westenhaver & Noll and Ingles & Nadenbousch, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. Victor D. Miller obtained this appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Berkeley county, declaring a certain deed, executed by Chas. S. Lamon and wife, and purporting to convey to him a tract of land containing 210 acres, 2 rods, and 19 poles, in consideration of $5,262.50, to have been made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the said Chas. S. Lamon, and setting the same aside as to the debt due the plaintiffs Wm. B. Colston and Geo. M. Bowers, administrators of Robert Lamon, deceased.

This debt originated in the following manner: John W. Lamon, on the 13th day of May, 1893, made his negotiable promissory note for the sum of $4,000, to become due and payable four months after its date, which was indorsed, first, by said Chas. S. Lamon, secondly, by said Robert Lamon, thirdly, by G. M. Lamon, and then delivered for value to the National Bank of Martinsburg. At that time said John W. Lamon must have been in failing circumstances, as he afterwards made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and only a small portion of the debt was afterwards collected out of his estate, and the balance was paid out of the estate of Robert Lamon. Chas. S. Lamon was then the owner of said farm, which was worth not less than $5,000, and personal estate, consisting of live stock, farming implements, choses in action, and other property, worth about $4,000. By deed dated May 22, 1894, he conveyed the farm as aforesaid to the appellant, his wife's brother, and assigned to him at about the same time two notes calling for considerable sums of money. On or about the date of the conveyance of the farm, he placed his personal property in the hands of his wife, executing to her a bill of sale thereof, and she converted the same to her use. Out of the estate of Robert Lamon there was collected on said debt, by legal process, $1,349.21 February 3, 1898, $632.26 January 30, 1899, and $879.97 May 4, 1899, and thereupon the administrators of the estate of said Robert Lamon brought this suit for the purpose aforesaid, he having been the second, and Chas. S. Lamon the first, indorser on the note, in consequence of which said Chas. S. Lamon was liable to him for the amount so paid. Proceedings were then had which resulted, on the 19th day of August, 1902, in the decree complained of.

The court is said to have erred in overruling the demurrer to the original bill. This is no doubt true, as it failed to aver any notice to the defendant Miller of the fraudulent intent charged upon his grantor, or participation therein on his part. But the plaintiffs, perceiving this error, cured it by filing an amended bill, in which the necessary allegations omitted from the original are fully supplied. The only effect of sustaining the demurrer would have been to cause an amendment of the bill to be made. The voluntary amendment is certainly as effective as a compulsory one would have been. Hence the error is clearly harmless.

Nor should the demurrer have been sustained on the ground of laches, as the suit was instituted immediately after the making of the final payment of the debt, until which time no cause of action as to it arose. As the cause of invalidity, if any, is fraud, and not mere want of consideration, the statute of limitation does not apply, and the bill does not disclose such lack of diligence as will bar. If the charge of fraud is sustained, the defendant cannot well say he has been misled or prejudiced by slight delay on the part of the man upon whom he perpetrated the fraud, and the rights of no third party have intervened.

The record abounds with both circumstantial and direct positive evidence of fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, Chas. S. Lamon. Declarations of his intent and purpose to convey the farm to the defendant Miller to escape the payment of said note are testified to by witnesses, and his subsequent conduct and declarations are tantamount to admissions. Had exceptions to these declarations been taken and the benefit thereof saved, some of them were not admissible against the defendant Miller, because not made in his presence. Robinson v. Pitzer, 3 W. Va. 335; Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 135; Crothers v. Crothers, 40 W. Va. 169, 20 S. E. 927. But the orders entered in the cause do not show that any objection was made or exception taken at the hearing, and the rule is that, except in the case of inadmissibility because of incompetence of the witness, objections of this kind, not made in the court below, are deemed to have been waived, and will not be entertained on appeal. Miller v. Gillisple (decided at the last term) 46 S. E. 451; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 271, 11 S. E. 927; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 78. However, it would be absurd to allow such declarations any probative effect against one who never heard them, and, unless the other evidence in the cause will support the finding and decree, it cannot stand. Prior declarations of the grantor are admissible against him, but they do not prove notice to the grantee, unless heard by or communicated to him. Bischoff v. Hartley, 9

W. Va. 100 Subsequent declarations of the grantor are generally inadmissible. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 495. Such declarations relating to possession, inconsistent with the deed, are admissible. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 497.

Miller sets up in his respective answers to the original and amended bills, and proves by the depositions of himself and his attorney, Col. Buchanan Schley, of Hagerstown, Md., as well as by the checks themselves, that on the 16th day of June, 1894, he gave Chas. S. Lamon his three checks for sums aggregating $4,600, all of which were passed through the banks as paid. Two of them were drawn on the Hagerstown Bank, one for $3,000 and the other for $600, and Mr. Schley testifies to having gone with Lamon to that bank for the purpose of identifying him, and seen the money for which they called actually paid to Lamon. The other was for $1,000, dated June 16, 1894, drawn on the Second National Bank of Hagerstown, indorsed by Chas. S. Lamon, and stamped as having been paid June 19, 1894, but credited in the bankbook as of the 16th. Miller and Schley say a medical account of $235 due from Lamon to the former, who is a physician, and had been treating Lamon, was credited on the purchase money. As to the residue of $427.50, the two witnesses to the consummation of the alleged sale differ in their testimony. Miller says in his answer, and also testifies, that he paid the balance in cash, part of it on the same day, and the balance, $250, at Lamon's home some time afterwards, in the presence of Charles Stuckey, whom he admits he had called as a witness to the transaction. Col. Schley says that no money was paid in his office, and that the difference between the aggregate of the checks and medical account and the total amount of purchase money is represented by an indebtedness due from Lamon to Miller, which was deducted by him, with the medical account, to ascertain the amount for which the checks were drawn. His testimony is as follows: "I put down at his suggestion what the farm came to per acre, which I do not now recall, subtracted from it the bill which he owed Dr. Miller, which amount he gave me at the time, the money he said he had borrowed from Dr. Miller, and subtracted those from what I was told he would give for the farm, and told the doctor and himself the balance that was due on the purchase money. For this amount, namely, the balance due, Dr. Miller gave these checks which I have referred to." This he substantially reiterates once or twice. That said sum of $4,600 was paid by Miller to Lamon as aforesaid admits of no doubt, but neither this fact nor the payment of the whole amount of purchase money, if established, will sustain the transaction if the grantee participated in the fraudulent intent of the grantor in disposing of the property. Payment of the purchase money alone is not enough. The transaction must have been free from fraud on the part of the grantee. There is but little evidence, other than that which is circumstantial, tending to show a fraudulent purpose on the part of Miller, and that is in the nature of an admission made some time after the purchase. William Barber, who had worked for Lamon as a farm laborer before and after the conveyance, and also for Mrs. Lamon after the death of her husband, testifies to a conversation which he says occurred between Dr. Miller and his sister, Mrs. Lamon, in the fall of 1895. His language is: "I heard Mrs. Lamon say it was soon time for her to have possession of the money or of the place. He said the place was his and the money, too, but he reckoned he would have to leave her have the place some time, but they had better leave well enough alone for the present. He said that things were very quiet now, but they didn't know what might turn up." This is denied by Miller emphatically, but, if the sale was a fraudulent one, it represents the possible and probable status of the property. It would have been an easy matter for Lamon to have handed the money back to Miller to hold upon a secret trust for the benefit of his wife, Miller's own sister, and not at all inconsistent with the fact of actual payment of the money, but clearly inconsistent with an honest purchase of the farm. The same witness says Lamon told him in the spring of 1894 that he had sold the place, and his brother-in-law, Mr. Miller, had the money in government bonds, and that he had three lawyers employed, and that they couldn't touch either the money or the lands—probably meaning that Lamon's creditors could not. James M. Collis, called by the defendants, in response to a question as to what Lamon told him he had received for the place from Dr. Miller, testified he did not mention the amount, but said, "Jim, I had more money in my pocket at once this week than I ever had in my life," and that this remark was made on the day after Lamon's return from the trip to Maryland at the time of the alleged consummation of the sale. This and other similar testimony as to what Lamon said he had done and declared his intention to do, prior to the execution of the deed, though not in themselves amounting to proof of fraud on the part of Miller, illustrate what may have taken place between these two men, the fact of payment of the alleged purchase money to the contrary notwithstanding. Indeed, it is not necessary, in order to make the transaction fraudulent, that the money should have been returned to Miller. It is enough that, with knowledge of Lamon's fraudulent intent and by way of participation therein, Miller paid him the money and took a conveyance of the land, so as to put it out of reach of Lamon's creditors and make it possible for him to prevent them from obtaining satisfaction of their debts out of the proceeds.

The circumstance of relationship of the parties already adverted to, although not sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud, as in the case of a conveyance by a husband to his wife, puts upon the purchaser the necessity of producing evidence of his good faith, and so explaining the facts and circumstances connected with the transaction as to make it withstand a closer and more rigid scrutiny on the part of the court than is exercised when the transaction is between strangers. When relationship of the parties to the conveyance exists, circumstances, known in the law of fraudulent conveyances as badges of fraud, have greater weight than in other cases, for the law cannot overlook and disregard, upon an inquiry as to the good faith of the parties, the natural desire of a brother to protect, defend, and shield a sister or other close relative when pursued by creditors. Ballard v. Ohewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. 170; Bank v. Gould, 48 W. Va. 90, 35 S. E. 878; Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 718, 14 S. E. 273; Greer v. Mitchell, 42 W. Va. 490, 26 S. E. 302; Hutchinson's Ex'r v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. 267; Butler v. Thompson, 45 W. Va. 660, 31 S. E. 960, 72 Am. St. Rep. 888.

The difficulty of direct proof of fraud lies in its very nature. A fraudulent transaction is always secret and hidden, as far as it is possible for the parties to it to conceal it from those upon whom it is intended to work wrong and injustice. Hence, the necessity of resorting to circumstantial evidence for proof of it. Such evidence, the courts declare, is not only sufficient to establish the fraudulent character of a conveyance, but is often the only kind of evidence it is possible to procure. Thus, in Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87, it is held that: "Although fraud in fact must be shown to impeach a conveyance as to subsequent creditors, it is not required that the actual or express fraudulent intent appear by direct and positive proof; circumstantial evidence is not only sufficient, but in most cases is the only evidence that can be adduced. Fraud is to be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, when those facts and circumstances are of such a character as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the conveyance was made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud existing or future creditors." To the same effect, see Stauffer v. Kennedy, 47 W. Va. 714, 35 S. E. 802; Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. 854; Sturm v. Chalfant, 38 W. Va. 248, 18 S. E. 451; Reynolds' Adm'r v. Gawthrop's Heirs, 37 W. Va. 8, 16 S. E. 364; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 719, 14 S. E. 273; Goshorn's Ex'r v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717; Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 821.

Some of the circumstances tending to establish fraud are so frequently found in the investigation of these cases, and given so much weight by the courts, that they have been designated as badges of fraud. One of them is the retention of possession of the property by the grantor after the conveyance. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585; Hutchinson's Ex'r v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. 267; Blackshire v. Pettit, 35 W. Va. 547, 14 S. E. 183. It is one of the circumstances characterizing the transaction now under consideration. The grantor remained in possession until the time of his death, and his widow, who has since married, still resides upon and cultivates the farm. Its effect is to cast upon the parties the burden of clearly showing that it is not in fact inconsistent with the conveyance, as it appears to be. This may be done by proving that the grantor remains in possession under a contract for the use of the land, and accounts for the rental thereof. Livesay v. Beard, supra; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 497. An attempt to do so has been made here, and it is to be determined whether the explanation is sufficient. In his answer to the original bill, the defendant Miller says that, after having purchased the farm, he agreed that Lamon might stay on it until the following April, paying as rent therefor, as tenant, one-half of the crops, and that, after his death, he rented the farm to his sister at $300 per year, which she has ever since paid. In his answer to the amended bill, he says he received the wheat crop from the land in November, 1894, and in the month of March, 1895, paid Mrs. Lamon, the widow, $100 of the proceeds thereof, being the balance thereof after deducting the rent due him for the year ending April 1, 1895. In his testimony, after having had the averment of his answer substantially quoted to him, with the inquiry as to whether it was correct, he said it was, to the very letter. Being then asked why he took all the wheat crop that fall, he explained that the first question was not quite broad enough to cover the contract, and that in fact he was to have $300 rent for the place, and it was supposed by him and Lamon that one-half of the crop would be sufficient to pay it, but that it had proved to be insufficient. In his second deposition he says, upon cross-examination, he was to have $300 rent in any event, neither more nor less, no matter what one-half of the crop might yield. Col. Schley's testimony in reference to this is as follows: "I would add here that, as the purchase was made in May, Dr. Miller said it was too late for him to look around for a tenant for that year, and Mr. Lamon said that he would agree to stay on the farm for that year, and the doctor and he agreed upon the rent that was to be paid to the doctor for the farm. It was crop rent, but I do not recall the proportion." Mrs. Lamon did not testify in the case at all. How the circuit court regarded this explanation, it is impossible to know, but, viewed in the light of all the circumstances, the rental contract, and the subsequent conduct of the parties under it, savor somewhat of indirection and relaxation of the principles governing a business transaction, as well as the want of good faith toward creditors. The sale was made in June, shortly before harvest time, and the corn crop must have been well under way. Hence it is a little remarkable that the tenant should agree to give one-half of the crop. Then, instead of taking half of the crop, the landlord took the whole of the crop of wheat, saying nothing as to any other crop. There may have been method in this, and a design against the creditors, for a division of the crop would have left something for them, but as Miller took it all away, and paid a small amount of money to the widow instead of leaving the tenant's one-half of the crop, no opportunity was allowed any creditor to realize anything from it. Why did he pay the money to her, instead of the administrator? Whatever the understanding may have been at Hagerstown, Miller was careful to make no representation in the neighborhood of the farm in West Virginia as to any tenancy on the part of Lamon. On the contrary, a witness, Collis, testifies that, after Lamon returned from Hagerstown on the occasion of the sale, he went to see him, and was informed that he had sold the farm to Dr. Miller, but was told by Lamon to remain on it, and as long as he (Lamon) was able he would superintend the place. The same witness says Miller came over and told him to do the best he could in farming the place, and that Mr. Lamon would superintend for him. Taking Miller's second statement as to the contract, namely, that he was to have a cash rental of $300, his subsequent conduct is equally inconsistent in this: that instead of collecting his rent in cash, leaving the crop free from his interference, he did that which amounted to a representation to the public that the crop belonged to him, by taking it and selling it and then deducting his rent. This act was not only inconsistent with the contract, but prejudicial to creditors, as it concealed from them Lamon's ownership of the crop, the only visible property the two defendants can point to as remaining in the hands of the debtor out of all the property he had owned but a short time before. This act of Miller's was so close in point of time to the conveyance as to give rise to more than a suspicion that he was cognizant of Lamon's purpose in disposing of his land, and is perfectly consistent with Miller's participation in that fraudulent purpose. His close relationship to Mrs. Lamon, then left a widow, with whose situation he must have been familiar, taken in connection with the fact that Lamon had transferred to her all of his personal property and had nothing left to answer the demand of any creditor, leaves no room to doubt that at the time he took away the wheat crop he knew of the fraud perpetrated by Lamon in the sale of his land, and yet he did this act in direct furtherance of that purpose and design. If he was holding the proceeds of the land upon a secret trust for the benefit of his sister, according to the admission on his part, charged in the testimony of Barber, may he not have taken the wheat crop upon the like condition, and made a mere pretense of deducting rent and paying the balance? Does not the circumstance comport with and tend to establish the truth of Barber's statement, rather than to show a bona fide relationship of landlord and tenant? It was just as easy to call the $100 check the balance of proceeds after deducting rent, as a payment on account of the secret trust fund.

If Miller participated in Lamon's fraudulent design, it is apparent that the wife, his sister, was to profit by it, and that the secret trust, if any, was for the benefit of both husband and wife. If there was a conspiracy against her husband's creditors, she was undoubtedly an active party to it, for she took all the tangible personal property under a flimsy claim of indebtedness to her for money loaned and property brought on the farm by her and mingled with his at the time of their marriage, and Col. Schley seems to be quite positive she was with her husband at his office on some occasion when the fraudulent negotiations were in progress, though he is not certain it was on the day of the payment of the purchase money. This being true, the subsequent fraudulent transactions between her and Miller, and her husband and Miller, concerning the wheat crop, and Lamon's relation to the farm, closely connected in point of time with the principal fraud, constitute admissible and potent circumstantial evidence against Miller on the question of his good faith in purchasing the land. "It seems to be the settled doctrine, sustained by numerous adjudicated cases, that, where the issue involves the fraudulent sale or conveyance of property, evidence of other like conveyances between the same parties at or about the same time is admissible. The ground for the admission of such evidence is that where such transactions of a similar character, executed by the same parties, are closely connected in time, the reasonable inference is that they proceed from the same motive. When two transactions made with different parties are claimed to be fraudulent, only one of which, however, is being controverted, it must be shown that they are so connected as to evince a common purpose, before the uncontroverted transaction can be admitted in evidence for the purpose of establishing the other to be fraudulent. If, however, the conveyances are made on the same day, or both made to relatives of the grantor, or there are any other circumstances connecting them, it is proper to look at the entire transaction, and, in so far as one reflects any light upon the motive prompting the other, to get the benefit of such aid in coming to a conclusion." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 499, 500.

In addition to the farm, Miller took from Lamon, by assignment, at about the time of the execution of the deed, as indicated by the evidence, two notes, one for $1,000, executed by John W. Lamon, and on which Miller has since collected $738.89, and another for $431.08, executed by Robert Gold, and on which he has realized about $500. His possession of these notes was disclosed under the prayer of the original bill for discovery, but neither the answer nor the testimony of Miller sufficiently shows that he had given value for them. He deals with them evasively. He fails to disclose their respective amounts, as well as the consideration upon which they were assigned to him. He is unable to state whether they were assigned or merely delivered to him. As to whether he loaned money on them as collateral or purchased them, he is equivocal and indefinite, saying, in his answer, he advanced Lamon money, and, in order to do so, took an assignment from him of the two notes. He has no recollection of the amount advanced, and kept no memorandum of it, but is positive it was more than $500. Later, he says Lamon applied to him for a loan of $400, offering the John Lamon note as security, which was declined, and then both notes, which were accepted, and $375 of the amount requested was advanced thereon, and the balance made up from time to time after the date of the conveyance. His witness, Col. Schley, says Miller purchased the notes, but at what price he never knew. He saw no money paid for them. Miller falsely asserted in his answer that one of them was barred by the statute of limitations, and afterwards endeavored to explain in his deposition that he really meant to say it was worthless, which also, if stated, would have been false, as he realized the entire amount of one of them, and $738.89 on the other. Another false statement, made in the answer and reiterated in the deposition, is that the notes were transferred prior to the purchase of the land. The deed bears date May 22, 1894, and was recorded on the 12th day of June, 1894, and the assignment of the Robert Gold note is dated June 12, 1894. The date of the assignment of the other does not appear, but Miller's testimony imports that both were assigned at the same time. He has treated the notes as having been purchased, for he took no note or memorandum of the loan to Lamon, and made no memorandum of the amount on his books, on the notes, or elsewhere. After collecting them, he rendered no account of the balance due after reimbursing himself. That the transactions were contemporaneous is manifest. By each, Miller obtained part of Lamon's estate, to the detriment and injury of his creditors. Fraud in one is evidence of fraud in the other, as above shown. As to the notes, as well as the land, the burden was upon Miller to show payment of a fair and adequate consideration. "If a creditor attacks as fraudulent a conveyance or transfer of property made by his debtor, and proves that his debt existed before such conveyance or transfer, the purchaser, in order to maintain his title, must show that he paid a fair and adequate consideration. It is not necessary, however, that the consideration should have passed at the time of the conveyance; the satisfaction of a pre-existing debt or claim is sufficient." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 503. The decisions of this court have declared the proposition to be sound law, and applied it. Rogers v. Verlander, 30 W. Va. 619, 5 S. E. 847; Cohn v. Ward, 32 W. Va. 34, 9 S. E. 41; Butler v. Thompson, 45 W. Va. 660, 31 S. E. 960, 72 Am. St. Rep. 838. Another rule forcefully applicable here is that looseness or incorrectness in stating the consideration of a conveyance is a badge of fraud. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 519. Inability of a grantor to produce a memorandum or other record of antecedent debts, which, he claims, constituted the consideration of the conveyance, is a badge of fraud. Id. 519. Does not reason more emphatically demand of the assignee or grantee an intelligent and reasonably certain specification of what he claims to have loaned or paid, together with some corroborative circumstance? Is it reasonable to say Miller let Lamon have $375 on the notes, without some memorandum of the aggregate amount agreed upon and the amount actually advanced? That is not the rule or custom among business men, and where the law not only calls for proof of payment, but will scrutinize the evidence of it, the circumstance has weight against the bona fides of the claim of payment.

The foregoing observations apply with equal potency on the question of payment of $427.50 of the purchase money of the land. Nobody swears to it but Miller. He says he had Stuckey witness the payment of $250 of it, but Stuckey died before the testimony was given. Why was not a receipt taken? Why, instead of taking a receipt, was Stuckey called in for the express purpose of witnessing the payment? Business men take receipts for money paid when witnesses are present, and there is no necessity of hunting them up and calling them in. The story would be improbable on its face, but for a reason hereafter to be noticed which may have caused the performance of this unusual act. Why was not the $177.50 paid in Schley's presence, or deposited in the bank and included in the checks? Miller says he paid it on the day of the delivery of the checks. Why did he hand over the checks in Schley's presence, and then retire with Lamon to give him the cash? There is no memorandum, receipt, or other writing by which Miller's statement can be verified, and he gives no reason for failing to pay the money at the time he delivered the checks. Moreover, Schley says no money in addition to the checks was to be paid, as the parties admitted in his presence that Lamon owed Miller the difference on account of borrowed money. Where is the evidence of that loan? Did these men handle sums as large as $400 and $500 between them in the form of loans and payments without passing any receipts or making memoranda? A charge of fraud in a conveyance requires, on the part of the grantee, better evidence of payment of the consideration than Miller has produced as to said sum of $427.50, and his failure to respond to the demand casts suspicion upon the entire transaction between the parties.

Another badge of fraud attendant upon this conveyance is the pains taken to have witnesses to transactions as to which none were necessary. For what purpose could Stuckey have been called as a witness to the alleged payment of $250, other than that he might be able to say he saw the money actually put into Lamon's hands, and give it out in the neighborhood as the payment of the last dollar of the purchase money? Then, again, for some mysterious reason, Miller and Lamon so planned as to render it necessary for Col. Schley to go to the bank to identify Lamon. Did not the bank officials know Miller, its own customer? Col. Schley says he and Lamon left Miller at his office when they started to the bank. Why did they consult Schley and transact the business in his presence? The deed had been written by Stuckey, accepted, approved, and recorded several days before the checks were delivered at Schley's office, and there was nothing for him to perform but calculate the amount due. Was it necessary for a physician and an intelligent farmer of large business experience to employ an attorney for that purpose? They evidently went to him for no purpose other than to put him in a position that would enable them to make a witness of him. Having made him an innocent witness to their apparently honest transaction, Miller seems to have forgotten several material representations they made to him. "Wherever there appears to be connected with the transaction circumstances indicating excessive effort to give it the appearance of fairness or regularity, which are not usual attendants of such business, the courts will regard such circumstances as badges of fraud." Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 644. An attempt on the part of one accused of crime to manufacture evidence in his favor is an incriminating circumstance. This being true, it ought to weigh heavily against the parties to a conveyance attacked by creditors as fraudulent.

Other things casting strong suspicion upon the conduct of the parties to this conveyance, and pointing directly to a fraudulent purpose in it on the part of Miller, are disclosed by the record, but those already noticed are sufficient to show that the finding of the circuit court cannot be disturbed. Miller and his sister, the wife of the grantor, took practically everything he had, leaving nothing for creditors. When such a transaction occurs between relatives, the fact that the grantor is immediately afterwards insolvent or without visible means to satisfy his debts is a badge of fraud. Stauffer v. Kennedy, 47 W. Va. 714, 719, 35 S. E. 892; Reynold's Adm'r's v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. 364; Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664; Herzog v. Weller, 24 W. Va. 199; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 503.

An assignment of error is predicated upon the failure of the court to allow, as set-offs against the debt due the plaintiffs, two notes executed by Robert Lamon, their intestate, in favor of Chas. S. Lamon, one of which is for the sum of $600, and dated June 15, 1887, and the other for $300, and dated December 8, 1893. On or about June 15, 1894, Chas. S. Lamon assigned the $600 note to J. M. Lamon, who says, in his deposition, it was assigned to him for the purpose of collection, for which he was to receive $50, and that he did collect, out of the estate of Robert Lamon, $69.99 of the amount due on it. He further says he exchanged for the note one previously executed by Chas. S. Lamon to himself for $150, and one for $450 contemporaneously executed by him to Chas. S. Lamon. While rather intimating that the transaction between him and Chas. S. Lamon as to this note was only a pretended transfer, he claims it, and appropriated to his own use what he collected on it. From what source the $300 note is produced is not indicated by the record. After proof of Robert Lamon's signature, it was offered as evidence. As to the administrator of Chas. S. Lamon, the bill was taken for confessed, and no reference is made to these notes in any pleading, except the answer of Maria E. Janney, the widow of Chas. S. Lamon, and she fails to ask that they be set off against the debt asserted by the plaintiffs against the estate of her former husband. After denying any liability by reason of the indorsement of the John W. Lamon note, and of liability on any other account to the estate of Robert Lamon on the part of the estate of Chas. S. Lamon, she puts in the following averment concerning the notes: "On the contrary, respondent avers and says that at the time of the death of the said Chas. S. Lamon, and now, the said Robert Lamon was indebted to him, and that the estate of the said Robert Lamon is still indebted to him, on account of various transactions amounting at least to the sum of $1,000, and some of which said indebtedness is evidenced by two notes of the said Robert Lamon, one for $700 and the other for $300, the latter dated December 8, 1893;" and, without making further allegations respecting the notes, prays to be dismissed, etc. If either of these notes belongs to the estate of Chas. S. Lamon, the legal title thereto is held by the administrator, and not by Mrs. Janney, and he, if anybody, should have pleaded it as a set-off. It is an affirmative plea—a cross-action. Code 1899, c. 126, § 9; Kennedy v. Davison, 48 W. Va. 483, 33 S. E. 291; 4 Min. Inst. 787; Hogg's Pl. & Forms, § 259; Hudson v. Kline, 9 Grat. 882. A distributee of a decedent's estate cannot sue at law, and he can do so in equity only under peculiar circumstances, such as refusal or neglect of the administrator to sue, and then he must set forth in his bill the facts necessitating suit in equity by him. Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Grat. 160. Nothing of the kind appears in this answer. However, it is unnecessary to decide whether Mrs. Janney could have had the notes set off against the debt. She does not aver that she is a distributee and entitled to any or all of the decedent's estate, nor does she ask that the notes be set off against the debt. An answer claiming a set-off must contain the substantial requisites of a complaint. 19 Ency. Pl. & Fr. 763. Moreover, she does not appeal, and Miller did not claim any right to set-offs in the court below.

There is an error in the decree, however, which has not been complained of. It refers the cause to a commissioner for a settlement of the accounts of the administrator and of the estate of Chas. S. Lamon, deceased, and orders a convention of his creditors. It does not appear that there are any creditors other than the plaintiffs, and, if there be any, the court can give the plaintiffs all the relief they demand or are entitled to without bringing them in. The bill charges that the debtor in his lifetime fraudulently conveyed away all his property, both real and personal, and each creditor must follow it up and recover it, acquiring a lien upon it from the time of the bringing of his suit. The conveyance and transfers are good between the parties, and can only be avoided at the suit of creditors. It is not a suit to enforce a judgment lien, in which the law requires a convention of creditors. "In cases of this character, therefore, it is not proper to convene the husband's creditors, nor to rent the land." Snyder, J., in Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206, 210, a suit to set aside a deed for fraud. As it is unnecessary when but a single creditor attacks the sale, and there are no conflicting claims of priority or other cause for a reference, the cost of a reference ought not to be inflicted upon the grantee, and it is not perceived that there is any ground upon which the plaintiffs or the court may call upon other creditors to attack the conveyance. It is optional with them to assent to it or let it stand. In such cases the law favors the active and diligent creditor, giving him preference over all who have not acquired judgments before the commencement of his suit, and, where there are no judgments, the creditor at large owes no duty to any other creditor of his class. Hence he need not bring them in, nor has he any right to do so. However, this error is such as can be corrected in this court, and will not reverse the decree. It will be modified so as to dispense with the reference and convention of creditors, and, as so modified, it will be affirmed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. As the appellant has not complained of this error, and it has not as yet wrought any injury to him, and does not enter into the real controversy presented on this appeal, costs will be awarded to the appellees as the parties substantially prevailing. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206; Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154.

The cause will be remanded, with directions to enter a decree subjecting the land to the payment of the debt due the plaintiff, and for sale thereof in default of payment.

WOODS v. COTTRELL, Justice, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

JUSTICE OF PEACE—JURISDICTION—SEIZURE OF GAMING IMPLEMENTS—PROHIBITION—CON-STITUTIONAL LAW—NUISANCE.

1. A justice who issues a warrant to arrest a party for keeping a slot machine as a gaming table, and to seize the same, and who, on hearing, requires the accused to give recognisance to appear before the criminal or circuit court to answer the charge, and orders the constable to turn over to the clerk of such court the slot machine to abide its order, is acting within his jurisdiction; and a writ of prohibition will not lie against him and the constable to restrain them from executing such order, nor against such clerk to prohibit his retaining the machine until such court act upon it.

2. Section 1, c. 151, Code 1899, in authorizing the seizure of gaming tables or instruments covered by it, is not unconstitutional, as depriving a person of property without due process of law.

3. When gaming tables are seized under a warrant from a justice under Code 1899, c. 151, § 1, the justice cannot order them to be burned. That can be done only upon conviction of their owner, upon the charge of keeping them, in a criminal or circuit court, and under its order.

4. Public nuisance—power to destroy things constituting it.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County; W. Gordon Mathews, Special Judge.

Proceedings by Gibby Woods against Joel Cottrell, justice, and others, for writ of prohibition. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Kennedy, Cornwell & Cornwell, John H. Holt, John Bassel, and M. G. Sperry, for plaintiff in error. S. B. Avia, Pros. Atty., for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. A justice of Kanawha county issued a warrant requiring the arrest of Gibby Woods, charging that he kept and exhibited "a gaming table, called an A. B. C. table, and E. O. table, and faro bank, and keno table, and table of like kind, under the denomination of 'slot machine.'" The warrant required the constable to arrest Woods, and bring him before the justice to answer the charge, and also to seize the slot machine and any money staked and exhibited to allure persons to bet at such table or bank; and under it the constable arrested Woods and seized the slot machine, and upon hearing Woods was required to give bond for his appearance before the criminal court to answer the charge, and the slot machine was by the justice's order turned over to the clerk of the criminal court to await its action as to the machine. Two days after the justice's action Woods obtained from the circuit court a rule against the justice, the constable, and the clerk of the criminal court to appear and show cause why a writ of prohibition should not go to prohibit them from proceeding upon the said order of the justice, "and commanding them no further to hold said slot machine from said petitioner." Upon hearing the court discharged the rule, and Woods sued out a writ of error from this court.

At once the question thrusts itself upon us, does prohibition lie in this case? No one can question that a justice has jurisdiction to issue a warrant to begin a prosecution for keeping gaming tables under Code 1899, c. 151, § 1. Say that he erred in deciding that a slot machine is a table, an instrument of gaming, under that statute. It is only an error of judgment within the pale of a lawful jurisdiction. It is not a usurpation of jurisdiction, but mere erroneous decision in a case lawfully before him. The law commanded him to consider and decide whether or not keeping a slot machine was an offense under that statute. He did only what the law required of him—he decided that question. Prohibition lies only where there is "usurpation and abuse of power, when the inferior court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers." Code 1899, c. 110, § 1; Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324; County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 362, 12 S. E. 490. It was argued at the bar that the Code just cited says that the writ lies as "matter of right." So it does in those cases where it does lie, but those words do not define the cases where it lies, but were inserted only to say that in cases proper for the writ it should be demandable of right, instead of resting in the discretion of the court as before that enactment. For such error in mere judgment the law provides another remedy. West v. Rawson, 40 W. Va. 480, 21 S. E. 1019. If indicted, the criminal court, then the circuit court, then the Supreme Court—all in the due course of law; and this is another reason against prohibition. A bold proposition it is to say that, when a justice sends out a warrant for a criminal act for which the law gives him power to issue it, a prohibition lies, even where the act does not constitute an offense.

Can the question whether it is an offense be tested by prohibition? It is not a criminal writ. Can the usual criminal procedure be arrested and frustrated by this writ? Surely not. To so hold would palsy the vigor of criminal process. Everybody would be asking a prohibition when a warrant is sued out against him. We decline to set such a precedent, and decide the merits without regard to the question of the propriety of thus using the writ, and thus be understood as holding that prohibition can be so used, even though the parties consent, as we do not think that consent can give the writ a function not given it by law. See dissenting opinion in State v. Godfrey, 46 S. E. 185, 54 W. Va. —.

Another reason why the writ does not lie, so far as it seeks to restrain the action of the justice, is that he had already acted. When he sent Woods on to the criminal court, he was functus officio. The matter was that instant in the criminal court. "Prohibition does not lie to restrain an inferior court after the judgment has been given and fully executed." Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 224.

Next, as to whether the writ can go to operate upon the constable and clerk. As to the constable: We are to presume that as the justice made his order on December 7th, and the petition for prohibition was not presented until December 9th, the constable had already lost custody of the slot machine. It does not appear to the reverse. Where, after judgment, prohibition is asked to restrain its execution, as may, under some circumstances, be done, it must appear that execution has not been done; but in this case it does not so appear. City v. Beller, 45 W. Va. 44, 30 S. E. 152; Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 406, 19 S. E. 520; Bodley v. Archibald, 33 W. Va. 229, 10 S. E. 392. And the constable is not a judicial officer, nor is the clerk, and prohibition is only to judicial tribunals. As to clerk: The rule proposes that the writ shall command him "no further to hold said slot machine from the petitioner"; that is, that he surrender it to Woods. It can have no other significance. It would be worthless otherwise. This makes the writ an action of detinue—a function which it cannot perform. If the order of the justice were void (as it is not), or if that feature touching the machine were void, it could be so held in an action of detinue, which would be the proper process. Prohibition does not lie where other plain remedy exists. But, aside from the last consideration, the statute gives authority to seize, under the warrant of the justice, a gaming table or faro bank, and the power to burn it, and within this would be included the power to hold it as evidence in furtherance of the prosecution originating with the warrant, and to answer final judgment of its condemnation. Now, this seizure is thus under color of statute authority and jurisdiction; not without jurisdiction, not an excess or abuse of jurisdiction, but within the very letter of the jurisdiction given by the statute. The arrest, holding the accused to answer in court, and seizure of the instrument, thus preventing its use in gaming until trial and judgment, all these are under color and justification of the authority or jurisdiction given by the statute. To sustain a jurisdiction wide enough to justify not only the issue of the warrant and hold the accused to answer an indictment, but also the seizure of the slot machine, is not to assert a power in the justice to burn the machine. We do not think he has that power. This warrant was issued under a statute which does not give the justice power to hear and determine final judgment. His only power is to determine whether there is probable cause to hold the party to answer in the trial court. We cannot cut his power into separate pieces, and say that, whilst he cannot try the guilt of the accused, and impose punishment, yet he can pass judgment that the machine be burned. We think that whether the machine shall be burned or released depends on whether the accused is guilty. If not guilty, he is not himself to be punished, neither is the machine to be burned; and as only the trial court can determine his guilt, so only it can condemn the machine to be burned. If the party is guilty, destruction of the machine follows the ascertainment of his guilt. If acquitted, judgment of restitution to him of his property follows. Though the thing be plainly an instrument of gaming under the statute, yet, if its owner be acquitted of using it for that purpose, it cannot be destroyed, as it is only instruments actually used and kept for gaming that are thus condemned to destruction.

It is argued that only after trial by a jury and conviction of the accused can the gaming table be seized. This cannot be so. It is designed to take from the accused the gaming instrument, and stop its use until trial. It goes along with the accused to share his fate.

It is argued that there is no authority to turn over to the court as evidence the slot machine, and that that part of the justice's order is an excess and abuse of his powers, and warrants prohibition, as the statute gives only power to burn. We have just said that the statute does not contemplate a burning by order of the justice, and this would justify the commitment of the slot machine to the custody of the criminal court to abide its order, so that it may have possession and execute its judgment of burning. The justice had jurisdiction under the statute to decide whether there was probable cause to charge the accused. Surely that cannot be doubted. It is plain, too, that he had power to retain the machine as evidence, and also to answer judgment of condemnation of it. The general law justifies not merely seizure of articles admissible as evidence, but even search of the person charged in order to get evidence. State necessity calls for it. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 210; Hughes, Crim. Proc. § 8132. The above considerations, based on only section 1, c. 151, Code 1899, besides general law, to show that the justice had jurisdiction to seize and provide for the retention of the article, may be strongly supplemented by Code 1899, c. 155, allowing warrants to search premises to find gaming implements, as it gives power to the justice to issue search warrants, and allow seizure, and directs that the article be safely kept by direction of the justice to be used as evidence, and then, in some cases, burned. The law thus plainly gave the justice jurisdiction to do all he did in this case. Boyd v. U. S., 110 U. S. 618, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, 29 L. Ed. 746, is a valuable case as to limit of right of search where it is illegal, or compels one to furnish evidence against himself. Thus we see clearly that the justice had jurisdiction. It is proposed to make the civil writ of prohibition review and reverse his action for supposed error, as if it were appellate process. Prohibition has no such office. County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 362, 12 S. E. 490. The case of State v. Godfrey, 46 S. E. 185, 54 W. Va. —, does not conflict with this case, because the town ordinance under which the warrant issued was void; there was no jurisdiction.

It is said that the statute, in authorizing the seizure and withholding of a gaming table, is a violation of the Constitution, as it takes property without due process. This argument goes upon the theory, in part at least, that it is the justice who commands the burning of the gaming table. It may be that, if such were the construction of the statute, trial before the justice would be due process. Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 80, 40 L. Ed. 91. But we hold that it is only the trial court, after conviction, that can order such burning, and it cannot be intimated that this is not due process. It cannot be maintained that the clause of the statute authorizing the seizure and burning a gaming table is unconstitutional. Mere gaming is not, at common law, an offense, but only by statute; but keeping a gaming house is a public nuisance by common law. 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 686; 1 Wood on Nuisance, § 45. It is law very ancient that upon an indictment for maintaining a public nuisance not only may the offender be punished, but the nuisance may be abated as part of the judgment, and the thing with which the nuisance is done may be destroyed. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 78; 2 Wood on Nuisance, § 364. This is a governmental power, existing under that vast power called the "police power." It is coeval with government. Under it all criminal law finds its warrant. 1 McClain, Crim. L. § 23. We cannot believe that it was the design of the state Constitution or of the fourteenth amendment to the national Constitution, in declaring that no one shall be deprived of property without due process of law, to enervate and emasculate late government of powers so essential and deeply rooted in the social fabric long before the adoption of American Constitutions. They effect no repeal of such inherent common-law powers. In re Converse, 137 U. S. 624, 11 Sup. Ct. 191, 34 L. Ed. 796; State v. Sponaugle, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 233, 43 L. R. A. 727; 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 146. So the established law of public nuisance and remedy will warrant the seizure and detention and custody of the machine by the criminal court as evidence, and to execute its judgment. In fact, this confiscation of the table is a part of the punishment, just as are the fine and imprisonment. Of course, the Constitutions do not debar the Legislature from fixing punishment. Bishop, Stat. Crimes, § 993. The old common law confiscated the felon's property. That general forfeiture of the common law, as a mere sequence of conviction, cannot be enacted in this state because of our Bill of Rights saying, "No conviction shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate." This abolished power to declare a forfeiture as a legal consequence of conviction; but it does not inhibit a provision like that in the gaming act, forfeiting the particular thing working the mischief, the instrument of the nuisance or offense. The Legislature may divest property in that particular thing. "Forfeitures of specific articles . . . are a species of fine, resting on the same principles as a sentence to pay a sum of money. We have no general practice of imposing this sort of forfeiture, but it is sometimes done under the direction of a statute." Bishop's New Cr. L. § 944. The Legislature may determine when that which is otherwise property shall cease to be such if kept against law. It is subject to police power. Train v. Boston Co. (Mass.) 59 Am. Rep. 113; State v. Lewis (Ind.) 33 N. E. 1024, 20 L. R. A. 52; People v. Budd (N. Y.) 22 N. E. 670, 682, 5 L. R. A. 559, 15 Am. St. Rep. 460. In Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385, a state act authorizing private individuals and certain officers to destroy fish nets was held lawful exercise of police power, and not to deprive persons of property without due process. In some states are statutes confiscating intoxicating liquors kept for sale contrary to law, and authorizing their seizure. In Fisher v. McGirr (Mass.) 61 Am. Dec. 381, it is held that "the Legislature may declare possession of certain property to be unlawful, where such property would be dangerous, injurious, or noxious, and may be due process of law, by proceeding in rem, provided for the abatement of the nuisance, and the punishment of the offender, by the seizure and confiscations of the property, by the removal, sale, or destruction of the noxious articles." The Supreme Court has held in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205, that "the destruction, in the exercise of the police power of the state, of property used in violation of law in maintaining a public nuisance, is not taking of property for public use, and does not deprive the owner of it without due process of law." It held that the state had constitutional power to declare any place kept for illegal manufacture or sale of liquors a public nuisance, and abate it, and at the same time provide for the trial of the offender. An Iowa statute provided that, if the existence of a nuisance is established by trial, it should be abated by the judgment by seizing and destroying the liquor, and that the fixtures and furniture used on the premises for manufacture or sale of liquor should be removed and sold. It was argued that the seizure and destruction of the liquor and removal and sale of the fixtures was contrary to the fourteenth amendment; that this could not be done by legislative enactment, whereas this legislation forfeited the property; that forfeiture must be by action against the thing; and that in a criminal prosecution the property is not involved, as is contended in this case, and that the defendant was entitled to his day in court upon the forfeiture of the property. The court said—what we say—that property cannot be forfeited by a legislative act, but only by judgment of a court, after notice, that the statute did not forfeit property by legislative enactments, but, as in many other instances, authorizes the courts, in cases where it has been established on judicial investigation that the property is such or has been so used as to be a nuisance, to abate it by destroying and selling the property. It said that in actions wherein the existence of the nuisance is established under the law in question the action is against the thing—the place—as well as against the person. In either case the question is whether the place was a nuisance, and, if so, whether the person was engaged in keeping it. The court said that, as the proceeding is against person and thing both, the person has due notice, and his day in court to defend against forfeiture, as also to defend himself. Just so in this case. Craig v. Werthmueller, 78 Iowa, 598, 43 N. W. 606. Where one has his day in court, and regular trial, that is due process. Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 80, 40 L. Ed. 91. Such anti-liquor laws forfeiting property have been frequently sustained. Black on Intox. Liquors, § 54; Preston v. Drew (Me.) 54 Am. Dec. 639; Bishop on Stat. Crimes, §§ 993, 994. We conclude that the statute in question is valid both as to the person proceeded against and the implements used for gaming.

The question whether a slot machine is an instrument of gaming within the meaning of section 1, c. 151, Code 1899, was fully and ably argued orally and in briefs, and this court is as well prepared to decide it now as it likely ever will be, though strictly it is not proper to decide it, as prohibition does not lie. As it was stated in argument that indictments are pending in some counties against persons for keeping slot machines, and that those using them want to know whether they are violating the law or not, some of the members of the court favor expressing our opinion upon it; but, some members objecting, we do not consider the question in this opinion.

We affirm the judgment discharging the rule.

1. A contract in which the delectus personae is material, as where a person agrees to use his personal skill and knowledge, or has been contracted with by reason of the trust and confidence placed in him, cannot be assigned by such person, while the agreement remains executory, without the consent of the other contracting party; but a contract in which the delectus personae is not material, and which is for services that may be as well performed by one person as another, is assignable, unless the assignment thereof be prohibited by the terms of the contract. Held, the contract in this case is assignable.

2. If a contract, other than a money demand, specifies no time within which performance is to take place, the promisor is allowed such time for performance as is reasonable, taking into consideration the subject-matter of the contract.

3. A decree of the circuit court confirming the report of its commissioner will not be disturbed on appeal unless plainly wrong. McCrum v. Stone, 14 S. E. 989, 36 W. Va. 649.

4. Point 4 in syllabus of Bank v. Prager & Son, 41 S. E. 363, 50 W. Va. 660, approved and applied.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by J. E. Poling, trustee, against the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and the above-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Dalley, for appellant. F. M. Reynolds and J. P. Scott, for appellee.

MILLER, J. The appellant, Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company, and defendant George Pyle made a contract for the sale and delivery of saw logs, contained in the following letters: "Bretz, W. Va., July 20, 1892. Mr. George Pyle, Hendricks, W. Va.—Dear Sir: We will buy your logs on Laurel Fork of the Cheat River, to be put in Laurel Fork not more than fifteen miles from its mouth, and to be driven into the Dry Fork of the Cheat River. We to furnish a scaler, who will be satisfactory to both parties; you to pay 50 cts. per day and board the scaler, and we to pay the balance of his salary. We will advance you One Dollar ($1.00) per M. ft. when the logs are scaled and branded, balance when they are driven into the Dry

Fork. If you put in a good splash dam to insure the logs coming to Dry Fork, we will advance one dollar additional when put in Laurel Fork. We will pay the balance when the timber is in the Dry Fork at or below the Laurel Fork. All logs to be scaled by Doyle's Rule and to be straight and sound scale. * * * These prices to hold good for one year from date, and is subject to your acceptance agreeing to sell all timber you cut during the next twelve months, at the foregoing prices; otherwise we are not bound by this letter." To which Pyle replied: "Hulings, W. Va., July 27, 1892. Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co., Bretz, W. Va.—Gentlemen: I accept your proposition as conveyed in your letter of the 20th inst., with these provisos:—that you are not to buy any logs on Laurel Fork, except those engaged by Mr. S. R. Blackman, for the period of one year from date; and I further agree not to cut any 'Pulp' wood for the period of one year from date." To this letter, appellant made answer: "Bretz, W. Va., July 27, 1892. Mr. Geo. Pyle, Hulings, W. Va.—Dear Sir: Your favor of even date received, and in reply we agree not to buy any timber for one year on Laurel Fork, except what has been engaged by Mr. S. R. Blackman, with the understanding that you cut no 'Pulp' wood during the same time." These letters constitute a binding contract between said parties. On the 17th day of October, 1893, said Pyle made a general assignment by deed of trust, bearing date on that day, properly acknowledged, and duly admitted to record in Tucker county, by which he "granted, sold, released, assigned, transferred and set over to J. E. Poling, trustee, his lands, goods, and chattels, and choses in action of every name, nature, and description, * * * more particularly enumerated and described in the schedule annexed thereto, marked No. 9, to have and to hold the same unto the said Poling, in trust, nevertheless, to sell and dispose of the said personal estate, to collect the said choses in action, and dispose of the proceeds of said contract and property in the manner following, to wit: First to pay all such debts as by the laws of West Virginia, as are entitled to preference in such cases. Second to pay and discharge all the reasonable expenses cost and charges of putting in the logs cut on the Eugene Hedrick lands and for driving the same and all other logs out of Laurel Fork, by reason of the contract, between said party of the first part, and the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co. and all reasonable expenses in complying with said contract that is to say put in timber, cut and driving same as required by said contract, and all cost of carrying into effect the trust hereby created including the lawful commissions, of the party of the second part, for his services in executing the said trust. Third to distribute and pay the remainder of said proceeds to the creditors of the said party of the first part, for all debts and liabilities, which he may owe, or for which he may lawfully be held responsible to any person whomsoever, provided that should the proceeds arising from the sale of his 'assets' or by reason of said contract not being sufficient to pay all his indebtedness then said debts are to be paid ratably and in proportion." The schedule referred to above is in the words and figures following: "One team horses and harness complete, all camp equipments on Laurel Fork, in Randolph Co. consisting of bedding cant hooks saws axes and every thing belonging to me at said camp or in said county, all money due said Geo. Pyle, from the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co. by virtue of a contract between him and said Co. all that is now due and to become due by virtue of said contract and all other property not included."

At the October rules, 1899, said J. E. Poling, trustee, filed his bill in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Tucker county against appellant, the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company, George Pyle, the Hendricks Company, Limited, and L. W. James. He alleges therein the making of said contract by and between appellant company and Pyle for the sale and delivery of saw logs; the execution of said assignment; that said Pyle had completed, or nearly completed, the said contract between himself and the said Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company, at the date of said assignment; and that, after the said assignment was made, Poling, as trustee in said assignment, went on and completed the contract in every respect, as he had a right to do under said assignment, so that the full amount of plaintiff's claim, which he alleges to be $8,111.28, was due and owing to him, as assignee of Pyle, from said last-mentioned company. The bill further alleges that in May, 1895, plaintiff had instituted a chancery suit in said court against said Pyle, the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company, L. W. James, the Hendricks Company, Limited, and others (naming them), the object of which suit was to have audited and adjudicated the claims against said Pyle, secured by said deed of trust, to have the instruction of the court to the trustee as to the disbursement of the funds in his hands as trustee under said deed of assignment, and to fix and adjudicate the rights of all the parties in interest; that the said last-mentioned cause was referred to a commissioner to convene the creditors of Pyle, to ascertain the assets conveyed by said deed of trust to the trustee therein, and for other purposes, and that the commissioner reported, among other things, that said boom and lumber company was due on its said contract with Pyle the sum of $8,111.28, but it is shown by a copy of the summons, and of the return of the attempted service thereof on appellant, that no valid service was had upon, and it is agreed that no appearance of any kind was made by, it in said last-mentioned cause. Therefore the proceedings therein are void and of no binding effect upon appellant. Plaintiff, Poling, also alleges that at the February rules, 1896, an action at law was instituted in said circuit court by him, as trustee, against said boom and lumber company, for the recovery of $10,248.11, as the amount due from it upon the said logging contract made by it with Pyle as aforesaid, which action is still pending; that said defendant L. W. James some time in 1896 instituted a suit in chancery in said court against the said boom and lumber company, the Hendricks Company, Limited, J. E. Poling, trustee, and George Pyle, setting up a claim to $3,500 of the money due from said boom and lumber company to Pyle under said logging contract, by virtue of an order for $3,500 drawn by Pyle on said boom and lumber company in favor of James, dated March 20, 1893, which has not been paid; that said James, in his said bill, admitted his indebtedness to the said Hendricks Company to the amount of $425, with proper interest thereon, and that, to secure said $425, he (James) had assigned to said Hendricks Company the said $3,500 order as collateral security; that said order was then in the possession of said Hendricks Company; and that said last-mentioned cause is still pending. Plaintiff charges that said boom and lumber company is liable to him, as trustee, for the sum of $8,111.28, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1894, and he submits to the court for its adjudication the several questions arising in this cause as to the disposition of the fund to be paid to the plaintiff, as such trustee, when recovered from said boom and lumber company, and as to the respective rights of said Hendricks Company and L. W. James in the said order given to James by Pyle as aforesaid. Plaintiff prays the court to enter a decree in the cause requiring said boom and lumber company to pay to him, as trustee, said sum of $8,111.28, with interest as aforesaid, as the balance due from it on said logging contract made by it with Pyle as aforesaid; that the rights of said several parties as to the $3,500 order be ascertained and determined; and for general relief.

The defendant boom and lumber company tendered its demurrer, and also filed its answer to said bill. The demurrer says that the bill is insufficient, first, because it shows no liability for any sum of money on the part of this defendant to the plaintiff; second, because the assignment executed by the defendant George Pyle to the plaintiff does not purport to assign any sum of money which might have been due from this defendant to the said George Pyle at the time of the execution of said assignment; third, because the plaintiff's bill is based upon the carrying out by the plaintiff of the contract set up in the bill between this defendant and George Pyle, while the said Pyle's assignment does not purport to confer such power upon the plaintiff, and could not have conferred such power, even had it purported to do so.

On the 30th day of August, 1901, the cause was heard by the court upon the papers theretofore read; former orders and decrees; upon the demurrer of the defendant said boom and lumber company; upon its amended answer, and the answer of defendant L. W. James, with general replications thereto, and the special reply in writing by said boom and lumber company to said answer of James; the depositions taken and filed on behalf of both the plaintiff and said last-mentioned company; and upon all of the exhibits filed in said cause. Whereupon the said demurrer was overruled, and the cause was referred to Jeff Lipscomb, one of the commissioners of the court, to ascertain and report upon 11 different questions, which may be all condensed into, and are in substance, an inquiry of what, if anything, is due from the said boom and lumber company to the plaintiff upon the matters alleged in the bill. Under this order of reference the said commissioner made up and submitted on the 1st day of March, 1902, a voluminous statement and report, finding, as his general conclusion, that the said boom and lumber company is indebted on said contract made with Pyle as aforesaid in the sum of $8,486.00 principal, with interest thereon from July 15, 1898, to March 5, 1902, $1,992.15, making in the aggregate $8,458.24 as the amount due on the day and year last aforesaid. The plaintiff filed exceptions in writing to said report, because the commissioner had allowed therein two credits to said boom and lumber company—one for $319.42, and the other for $125. The appellant Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company also filed 13 specific exceptions to so many parts thereof, and a fourteenth to the report as a whole.

On the 28th day of August, 1902, the cause was again heard upon the papers formerly read, former orders and decrees, the said report of Commissioner Lipscomb, and upon the exceptions thereto filed by both plaintiff and appellant as aforesaid. On consideration whereof the court overruled each and every one of said exceptions, confirmed said report in accordance with the findings of said commissioner as to the amount due the plaintiff, J. E. Poling, trustee, on account of the matters set up in his bill, and adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff, J. E. Poling, trustee, should recover from the defendant said boom and lumber company $8,458.24, with interest thereon from the 5th day of March, 1902, until paid, and his costs by him about his said suit expended. From this decree said boom and lumber company was allowed an appeal. It assigns various errors, among which is the overruling of said demurrer, and refusal of the court to sustain its said exceptions to the commissioner's report.

It is not contended that the court did not have jurisdiction of the general subject-matter of the suit. It is plain that the court had such jurisdiction. To that extent, at least, the demurrer was properly overruled. In support of its demurrer, appellant's counsel cite Clark on Contracts, p. 525, where it is stated: "It is the settled rule, subject to exceptions which are apparent rather than real, that a person cannot assign his liabilities under a contract, or, to put the matter from the point of view of the other party to the contract, a person cannot be compelled to accept performance of the contract from a person who was not originally a party to it. The reason for the rule lies not only in the right of a person to know to whom he is to look for the satisfaction of his rights under a contract, but, more particularly, in his right to the benefit which he contemplates from the character, credit, and substance of the person with whom he has contracted. The exceptions to this rule are apparent, rather than real. As stated in the black-letter text, a person may assign the liabilities imposed upon him by a contract which he has made if the other party to the contract consents. This, however, as we shall see, is, in effect, a new contract. It is a rescission by agreement of the old contract, and the substitution of a new one, in which the same acts are to be performed by different parties. Another apparent exception is in this, namely, that if a person undertakes to do work for another which requires no special skill and he has not been selected for the work with reference to any personal qualifications, he may have the work done by some equally competent third person. This, however, is not an assignment of his liabilities, for he does not cease to be liable if the work is not done in accordance with the contract." Id. 525. Smelting Co. v. Mining Co., 127 U. S. 379, 8 Sup. Ct. 1308, 32 L. Ed. 246, is also cited. At pages 387, 388, 127 U. S., and page 1309, 8 Sup. Ct., 32 L. Ed. 246, Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "At the present day, no doubt, an agreement to pay money or to deliver goods may be assigned by the person to whom the money is to be paid or the goods are to be delivered, if there is nothing in the terms of the contract, whether by requiring something to be afterwards done by him, or by some other stipulation, which manifests the intention of the parties that it shall not be assignable. But every one has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. In the familiar phrase of Lord Denman, 'You have the right to the benefit you anticipate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract.' Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310, 317; Winchester v. Howard, 97 Mass. 303, 305 [93 Am. Dec. 93]; Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28 [25 Am. Rep. 9]; King v. Batterson, 18 R. I. 117, 120 [43 Am. Rep. 13]; Lansden v. McCarthy, 45 Mo. 106. * * * 'Rights arising out of contract cannot be transferred if they are coupled with liabilities, or if they involve a relation of personal confidence, such that the party whose agreement conferred these rights must have intended them to be exercised only by him in whom he actually cided."

The plaintiff contends that the contract in question was and is assignable, and supports his contention by the citation of numerous authorities. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1035, says: "As a general rule, in all cases where a contract is executory in its nature, and an executor or administrator would succeed to the rights and liabilities of a deceased party to the contract, the contract is assignable. * * * A contract in which the delectus personæ is not material, and is an agreement for services which may be as well performed by one person as another, is assignable." Contracts in which the delectus personæ is material, as where a person agrees to use his personal skill and knowledge, and has been contracted with by reason of the trust and confidence placed in him, cannot be assigned by such person while the agreement remains executory, without the consent of the other contracting party. When the assignment of a contract is made, its obligations will still rest upon the assignor, who, in case of default on the part of his assignee, must respond to the other party to the contract. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1036. It will be observed that Pyle assigned and transferred to Poling, trustee, among other things, "all money due said Geo. Pyle, from the Condon-Lane Boom and Lumber Co. by virtue of a contract between him and said Co. all that is now due and to become due by virtue of said contract and all other property not included." No personal confidence or peculiar skill on the part of Pyle seems to have been contemplated or contracted for by said company in this instance. We find no reason or authority for saying that the contract in question is not assignable, and could not be assigned to Poling, trustee, by Pyle, as alleged. We fail to see how appellant could be prejudiced by an assignment of the contract to Poling. It was required to pay no money until certain work was done, according to the very terms of the contract.

Appellant insists that the bill shows no liability from it to the plaintiff. This involves a construction of the contract. Appellant bought the saw logs from Pyle. No limit as to number or quantity is named. They were to be scaled by a scaler furnished by the company, who would be satisfactory to both parties. When scaled and branded, $1 per thousand feet was to be advanced by the company to Pyle. The logs were then to be put into Laurel Fork, not more than 15 miles from its mouth, and to be driven into said Dry Fork. The balance of the purchase price was to be paid when the logs were driven into said Dry Fork, but no time is fixed for the completion of that work. In order to expedite the driving of the logs, appellant proposed to pay Pyle an additional dollar on each thousand feet when he should put the logs into Laurel Fork, provided Pyle would put a good splash dam in Laurel Fork, to insure the coming of the logs into Dry Fork. The balance, in either event, was to be paid when the timber was in the Dry Fork at or below Laurel Fork (meaning at the mouth of Laurel Fork). Certain prices are named. It is then stated: "These prices to hold good for one year from date (July 20, 1892), and is subject to your acceptance, agreeing to sell all timber you cut during the next twelve months, at the foregoing prices, otherwise we are not bound by this letter." Recurring to the bill, it is alleged therein that Pyle, at the time of the assignment thereof by him, had completed, or nearly completed, the contract between himself and appellant company, meaning the logging contract hereinbefore set out, and that, after the said assignment was made, the plaintiff, as trustee in said assignment, went on and completed said contract in every respect. We think the allegations of the bill are sufficient, and that the demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

It will be observed that the contract fixes no time limit for the scaling, branding, or delivery of the logs. Certain advances were to be made to Pyle when they were scaled and branded. An additional advance was to be made when they were put into Laurel Fork, provided a good splash dam had then been built by Pyle to insure the coming of the logs into Dry Fork; i. e., to insure the speedy delivery of the logs at the place appointed therefor. No certain time could have been fixed for the delivery of the logs in Dry Fork, as that work depended upon the uncertainty of water, and the presence of ice in Laurel Fork, a swift mountain stream, down which the logs could be drifted only on a high stage of water therein. The parties were acquainted with the country and its physical conditions. It is therefore but fair to say that they contemplated and fully considered all of those contingencies when the agreement in controversy was made. Pyle sold, and the company bought of him, all of the timber which he might cut, during the next 12 months, at the prices named in the contract. He therefore had a right to cut timber during the entire period, and to be paid therefor the price fixed as aforesaid, upon compliance by him with the conditions specified in the contract; but it would have been an impossibility for him to have had all of the timber cut within that time by him scaled, branded, and delivered in Dry Fork, a distance from the place of scaling and branding of about 15 miles, within the said period. The offer of the company to pay to Pyle an additional dollar on each thousand feet, when the logs were put into Laurel Fork, provided he would build the splash dam, is evidence of the desire of the company that the logs should be delivered in Dry Fork as speedily as possible, and that the freshets which might occur in Laurel Fork should be fully utilized for that purpose.

If a contract other than a money demand specifies no time within which performance is to take place, the promisor is allowed such time for performance as is reasonable, taking into consideration the subject-matter of the contract. Hammon on Contracts, § 444; Boyd & Co. v. Gunnison & Co., 14 W. Va. 1; Clark on Contracts, § 251.

Chapter 119 of the Acts of 1882, Appendix to Code of 1899, provides for the adoption of trade-marks by timber dealers. Section 6 declares that "when timber is purchased by the proprietor of any such trade-mark, and the said trade-mark is placed thereon as hereinbefore provided, such timber shall thenceforth be deemed the property of such purchaser, without any other or further delivery thereof, and such timber shall thereafter be at the risk of the purchaser, unless otherwise provided by contract in writing between the parties." Section 8 further provides that "in any action, suit or contest in which the title to any timber upon which any such trade-mark has been placed as aforesaid, shall come in question, it shall be presumed that such timber was the property of the proprietor of such trade-mark in the absence of satisfactory proof to the contrary." It is proved that the trade-mark or timber brand of the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company was Z; that said Z brand was adopted by the company as its trade-mark in 1892; that all of the logs cut by Pyle on Laurel Fork under said contract were scaled and branded for the company with said trade-mark or timber brand by one J. F. Gillispie, who was employed by the company for that purpose, with the assent of Pyle; that Gillispie commenced scaling and branding the logs in 1892, and finished the work in January, 1894; and that, as the logs were scaled and branded by him, they were put into Laurel Fork at a point from 10½ to 15 miles from its mouth. For this work the company paid to Gillispie all except $5 of the portion of the expense thereof which by its agreement with Pyle it was to pay. As soon as the logs were scaled and branded by the scaler agreed upon by the parties, the title to the logs passed to, and was vested in, the vendee company. The seller, Pyle, was then entitled thereon to $1 per thousand feet; and the vendee was then entitled to a delivery thereof at the place specified in the contract before making any further payment, except the $1 per thousand, contingent on the putting in by Pyle of a good splash dam as aforesaid. Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. 685; 3 Min. Inst. 98; Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 683; Chapman v. Campbell, 13 Gratt. 105.

Appellant, in its answer filed, avers, among other things, that whatever contract was made by it with Pyle, if any, by reason of the letters set out in the plaintiff's bill, had expired, by reason of the very limitation shown on the face of said letters, long before the date of the assignment, and that, in addition to said expiration, the said George Pyle announced that he could not carry out said contract, and expressly surrendered the same, and any rights he had thereunder, before the execution of his assignment. As will be observed, the only express limitations therein upon Pyle, as to time, are that he will sell to the company all timber cut by him during the next 12 months from July 20, 1892, at the prices named. There is neither allegation nor evidence in the record that Pyle sold any timber cut by him during that year to any person except appellant.

As to the alleged surrender of the contract by Pyle, it is claimed that during the latter part of September, 1893, L. W. James sued out an attachment against Pyle for a large sum of money; that soon thereafter Pyle went to Philadelphia to get money from the aforesaid boom and lumber company to pay off this claim, but did not get it. Pyle says that, during his interview with the representatives of the company about the matter, he handed the papers then in his possession, constituting the contract, to R. F. Whitmer, in the office of the company, for examination; that when he left the office the papers were forgotten by him; and that afterwards Whitmer promised to send them to him, which was never done. On the other hand, the company produced two witnesses who swear, in substance, that about the 28th day of September, 1893, Pyle came to the office of the company in Philadelphia, and said he was in trouble; that an attachment had issued against him, and that he could not and would not carry out his contract; that he wanted to give it up; and that he then voluntarily gave it up to Mr. Lane. This evidence is in turn denied by Pyle, who further testifies that Whitmer told him that they could not pay him any money, because they had heard by telegram about the attachment, and that everything was attached and tied up. There are many more conflicting and contradictory statements in the testimony about this matter. Nothing was paid to Pyle by the company for the alleged surrender of the contract. It is proved that, soon after the making of the contract, Pyle commenced to cut and put in the logs under it; that at the time he was in Philadelphia all the logs had been cut; that a large part of them had then been scaled, branded, and put into Laurel Fork, and driven into Dry Fork; that about two-thirds of the logs had been put into Laurel Fork, and about one-half thereof had been driven into Dry Fork, when Pyle made his assignment. It appears that when Pyle was in Philadelphia, and also at the time he made his assignment, a considerable sum of money was due him from the company.

It has been held that the delivery of a note by the holder to the maker, with intent thereby to discharge the debt, discharges the debt. Vanderbeck v. Vanderbeck, 30 N. J. Eq. 265, and cases there cited. Shortly before the time of the alleged surrender of the contract by Pyle, James had sued out an attachment against, and had caused the same to be levied upon, the property of Pyle, for a large sum, afterwards fixed at $3,500 by an award of arbitrators, which was entered as the judgment of the court. The rights of other creditors had also intervened; Pyle being then insolvent, as is shown by the record, although that question is not raised. Upon the facts and circumstances disclosed, it does not seem reasonable that Pyle went to Philadelphia with intent to voluntarily and gratuitously surrender, and that he did voluntarily surrender, his said contract, and relinquish his right to the money then due and to become due thereunder, as is claimed by the company. He could have done this by letter to the company inclosing the contract. The commissioner found against the contention of the appellant upon this question, and the circuit court approved and confirmed his finding. A finding of facts by a commissioner, confirmed by the circuit court, is viewed by the appellate court with peculiar respect, and such finding will not be disturbed unless plainly erroneous. Carter v. Gill, 47 W. Va. 504, 35 S. E. 828; Keneweg v. Schlansky, 47 W. Va. 287, 34 S. E. 773. We cannot disturb the decree of the circuit court for that reason.

The company wrote and caused to be sent to Poling the following letter, the receipt of which he acknowledged by a reply on the 26th day of February, 1894:

"Feb. 22nd, '94.

"J. E. Poling, Esq., Hendricks, W. Va.—
Dear Sir: There has been sent in to us a bill for logs scaled during 1894. We fail to recognize the bill, as we have no knowledge of our buying these logs, and therefore will not accept any responsibility in regard to same.

"We presume these are the logs you spoke to Mr. Whitmer about when at Hendricks, when he distinctly states to you that the Company would in no manner, shape or form purchase any more logs other than what they had purchased, as they were compelled to put their money into the railroad. These logs you put into the river at your own risk and we will in no wise be responsible for same. Yours very truly, [Signed] Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co."

Appellant strenuously contends that by this letter it refused to receive any logs under the said contract; that, even if Pyle had the power to assign the contract to Poling, with right to Poling to carry out the provisions thereof, Poling had no right, after his receipt of the letter, to attempt to deliver the logs to the company, by floating them into Dry Fork, but that he should have proceeded in such a way as to suffer as little damage as possible, and then have sued the company for its breach of the contract. "If, during the performance of a contract, or after the time for performance arrives, one of the parties, by work or act, openly and clearly refuses to perform his promise, in whole or in part, the other party is thereupon exonerated from performing his part of the contract, and is at once entitled to bring action. Thus, if a man order goods to be manufactured for him, and afterwards, and before all the goods have been made and delivered, refuses without cause to keep his promise, the seller may recover the damage thereby sustained, without making or tendering the rest of the goods. * * * To constitute a breach by renunciation, the repudiation of the contract must be unequivocal and absolute. A mere assertion that the party will be unable to fulfill his promise, or that he intends in the future to refuse to perform it, is insufficient. There must be, in substance, an avowed determination not to abide by the contract. The renunciation must deal with the entire performance to which the contract binds the promisor, else it does not discharge the promisee. * * * The innocent party may, if he wishes, keep the contract alive for certain purposes, in spite of the other's renunciation of it, provided, always, that he must do nothing to increase the damages otherwise recoverable. In order that a mere notice of an intention not to perform may constitute a breach, the other party must act upon it. If the innocent party will not accept the other's renunciation, and continues to insist upon performance, the contract remains in existence for the benefit, and at the risk, of both parties." Hammon on Contracts, §§ 454, 456; Davis v. Bronson (N. D.) 50 N. W. 836, 16 L. R. A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 791, 797. This letter is not a repudiation or renunciation of the contract. The language, "We presume these are the logs you spoke to Mr. Whitmer about, when at Hendricks, when he distinctly stated to you that the company would in no manner, shape or form purchase any more logs, other than what they had purchased, as they were compelled to put their money into the railroad," is not such renunciation or repudiation of the contract as falls within the rule of law sought to be invoked by appellant.

The evidence shows that the last lot of the Pyle logs was scaled and branded by Gillisple in January, 1894, and that the measurement thereof amounted to 546,203 feet. All the other logs were scaled and branded during the years 1892 and 1893. The monthly statements of the logs scaled, branded, and put into Laurel Fork are, for the months of August, October, November, and December, 1892, for January, March, April, and December, 1893, and for January, 1894. It also appears that the company paid to Pyle thereon as follows:

were cut by either Pyle or Poling after the assignment of the contract by Pyle to Poling; that, after a part of the logs were driven out of Laurel Fork, Wilson, the head sawyer on the company's mill, examined and made an estimate of the logs yet in the stream; that after the assignment Mr. Whitmer, whose name is signed to a letter dated January 11, 1894, as general manager of the company, told Pyle to go on and put the logs in the stream. Whitmer also testifies that he knew that logs were put into the stream after Pyle was in Philadelphia in September, 1893. It is further shown that the company made no objection to the scaling, branding, or placing of the logs in the stream as aforesaid. J. F. Gillisple, the scaler selected by appellant, testifies that he scaled and branded 2,271,673 feet of logs, which amounted, at the prices named, to $10,248.11; that monthly statements of the timber scaled and branded by him were furnished to the company as it was put into the stream; that these logs were driven out of Laurel Fork into Dry Fork; that part of them came down Dry Fork to the said boom and lumber company's dam; that some of them were sawed on the company's mill at Bretz, some went on down the river, and some were taken out of Dry Fork and sawed into pulp wood by the company; that he saw all of these logs put into Laurel Fork; that he made it his business to see that they were properly put in and branded; that the last of the logs were branded and put into Laurel Fork in January, 1894; that George Pyle had charge of the work of driving the logs into Dry Fork, so far as he knew; and that he saw a good many of the logs driven into Dry Fork. It is also shown that 1,674,264 feet of the logs were put into Laurel Fork before the assignment, and that about one-half of the whole amount, by estimation, had been driven into Dry Fork within one year from the date of the contract. It is not contended that proper diligence was not used in the prosecution of the work, either before or after the assignment, or that the assignment of itself occasioned loss or damage to appellant. It appears that Pyle had charge of most of the work of drifting after the assignment. No error of calculation in said report of the commissioner is claimed. The exceptions are based mainly on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the several findings therein.

It is also insisted as error that the circuit court did not pass upon the exceptions made and filed by appellant to plaintiff's depositions. It does not appear by the record that the court sustained or overruled said exceptions. We cannot say what, if any, weight the court gave to the evidence so excepted to. We do say, however, that there is sufficient legal evidence in the cause to justify the general finding of the commissioner, and the decree of the court thereon. It must be presumed that the court considered only legal and proper evidence. Bank v. Prager & Son et al., 50 W. Va. 660, 41 S. E. 363. "The decree of the circuit court confirming the report of its commissioner will not be disturbed on appeal unless plainly wrong." Bank v. Bowman, 36 W. Va. 649, 14 S. E. 989.

Applying the oft-repeated rule of this court above stated, the decree of the circuit court complained of must be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Tucker county, that a final determination may be had of the remaining questions in the cause, or of such of them as may be deemed proper.

DUDLEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

INDICTMENT—ORDER OF DISMISSAL—DISCHARGE OF ACCUSED.

1. An order retiring an indictment for felony from the trial docket of a court is equivalent to the dismissal thereof, and the same may not thereafter, on motion of the state, be restored to the docket for trial.

2. If an indictment has been improperly placed on the trial docket, and the accused has been arrested on a capias to answer the same, he may be discharged therefrom on a writ of habeas corpus.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Application of James Dudley for writ of habeas corpus. From an order refusing the writ, he brings error. Reversed.

A. L. Hooten, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the State.

DENT, J. James Dudley complains of a judgment of the circuit court of Mingo county refusing to discharge him from custody on a writ of habeas corpus, as being illegally held to answer an indictment against him found at the September term, 1899, and which was retired from the docket on the 8th day of January, 1901, and reinstated thereon by the order of the court on the 8th day of June, 1903, and a capias to answer the same, under which he is now held in custody. The statement of facts is as follows: "On the 21st day of May, 1895, James Dudley was convicted of a felony in the circuit court of Mingo county, West Virginia, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a term of eighteen years. On the 8th day of April, 1899, he was granted by G. W. Atkinson, the Governor of the state, a conditional pardon, and was liberated from the penitentiary in accordance with the terms thereof. On the 1st day of June, 1899, Dudley was arrested, charged with having attempted to murder one A. B. Parlor, and was on the 18th day of July, 1899, by order of the Governor, returned to the penitentiary to serve out the balance of the sentence imposed on him, by reason of the breach of the condition of his pardon. At the September term, 1899, of the circuit court of Mingo county, the grand jury returned an indictment against Dudley, charging him with having committed an assault on the 1st day of June, 1899, on A. B. Parlor, with intent then and there to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill, and on the 18th day of May, 1900, Dudley was, by order of the circuit court of Mingo county, taken from the penitentiary to Mingo county for trial on the above indictment, and was on the 18th day of September, 1900, by order of the circuit court, returned to the penitentiary, to be therein confined under the former sentence of the court; the order reciting that the state was not ready to try the case, by reason of the absence of a material witness. On the 8th day of January, 1901, on motion of the state, by its attorney, and for reasons appearing to the court, the circuit court of Mingo county entered an order retiring from the docket the indictment found against Dudley at the September term, 1899, for his attempt to kill Parlor. On the 1st day of May, 1903, Dudley presented to the circuit court of Marshall county, West Virginia, his petition for a writ of habeas corpus; praying, for reasons therein assigned, and as set forth in this statement, that he be discharged from further confinement in the penitentiary. On the 11th day of June, 1903, the last-named circuit court entered an order discharging Dudley from further confinement in the penitentiary by reason of the sentence imposed on him by the circuit court of Mingo county on the 21st day of May, 1895. On the 12th day of June, 1903, immediately upon being released from the penitentiary, Dudley was arrested by virtue of a capias issued by the clerk of the circuit court of Mingo county, and taken to Mingo county, and lodged in the county jail thereof. On the 22d day of August, 1903, Dudley presented to the judge of the Eighth Judicial Circuit of the state of West Virginia his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, praying, for reasons therein assigned, that he be released from the custody of the sheriff of Mingo county, and for such other, further, and general relief as his case required and to the court might seem meet and proper; and on the 12th day of September, 1903, on final hearing, the prayer of Dudley was refused, and his petition was dismissed, from which order this writ was allowed. The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the order entered on the 8th day of January, 1901, by the circuit court of Mingo county, retiring the case against this plaintiff from the docket, had all the force and effect of a nolle prosequi, and worked a discontinuance of the same, and that, the case having been retired from the docket, the capias upon which plaintiff was arrested on the 12th day of June, 1903, was illegally issued; there being no indictment pending against plaintiff at the time."

So far as the order of the Governor in restoring the petitioner to the penitentiary is concerned, the illegality thereof was determined by the judgment of the circuit court of Marshall county discharging the petitioner from custody thereunder, and that matter has become res adjudicata, and cannot now be reviewed by this court. The only question for consideration here is whether the petitioner can be held to answer the indictment now pending against him in the circuit court of Mingo county. After the petitioner was restored to the penitentiary, it clearly appears that there was nothing in the way of his being tried on the indictment then pending against him, and the circuit court did send for him; but on motion of the state the trial was postponed, and he was recommitted to the penitentiary. The indictment was then, on the same motion, retired from the docket, and was not restored until after the prisoner was discharged in 1903. Section 25, c. 159, Code 1899, provides that "every person charged with felony and remanded to a circuit court for trial, shall be forever discharged from prosecution for the offense, if there be three regular terms of such court, after the indictment is found against him without a trial, unless the failure to try him was caused by his insanity; or by the witnesses for the state being enticed or kept away, or prevented from attending by sickness or inevitable accident, or by a continuance granted on the motion of the accused; or by reason of his escaping from jail, or failing to appear according to his recognizance, or of the inability of the jury to agree in their verdict." The only excuse given for not trying the petitioner as required in this section is because he had been illegally recommitted to the penitentiary by order of the Governor. It is not claimed that he could not have been tried, as he was in the custody of the law and under order of the court, but that the court and prosecuting attorney were laboring under the belief that he was legally confined in the penitentiary for his former offense, and that would render it unnecessary to try him under the second indictment. The petitioner was not afforded the opportunity to insist on a speedy trial, but was illegally held in custody, and if the indictment had remained a live indictment on the docket, while the state was illegally holding him, he might well insist that he should be discharged under the foregoing section, as his illegal detention does not come within any of its provisions; and he might well claim, as he was subject to the order of the court, that he was being held to answer the pending indictment against him, as this was the only legal cause for his detention. State v. Kellison (decided at this term) 47 S. E. 166. It is the state's fault, and not the petitioner's, that he was not brought to trial within the time prescribed. The state avoided doing so by having an order made retiring the indictment from the docket, and keeping the same so retired for more than six terms of court, at any of which, had it been proper, the petitioner might have been tried. Such retirement from the docket without the consent or fault of the prisoner must be held equivalent to a dismissal thereof for failure to prosecute. It is true, the case was not retired from the docket for failure to prosecute, but was retired from the docket to avoid the necessity of prosecution, which, so far as petitioner is concerned, and who was not consulted with regard thereto, amounts to the same thing as a dismissal for failure to prosecute. Had he been brought into court, he would have had the right to have demanded a speedy trial or a dismissal of the indictment, and the court may not do that in the absence of the prisoner which it could not do were he present. In re Bigelow, 95 Am. St. Rep. 187; People v. Matson, 129 Ill. 591, 22 N. E. 456; People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 892; In re McMicken, 35 Kan. 406. The indictment being dismissed, it could not, after a long lapse of time, be reinstated on motion of the state. State v. Rodoicich, 66 Minn. 294, 69 N. W. 25.

Prosecuting attorneys may not retire felony cases from the docket, and restore them at their pleasure. Their duty requires them to prosecute or dismiss, and they cannot at their pleasure adopt an intermediate practice to avoid the necessity of a trial, and yet prevent the dismissal of the indictment. If they fail to prosecute when they can, the law discharges the accused, and an order retiring an indictment from the docket dismisses it.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the accused is discharged from further prosecution on the indictment mentioned.

NATIONAL CASH REGISTER CO. v.
UNION BARGAIN HOUSE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1904.)

APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE.

1. Where the record is so imperfect as not to disclose error in a judgment, it is presumed to be right, and on writ of error will be affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Proceedings between the National Cash Register Company and the Union Bargain House. From the judgment the National Cash Register Company brings error. Affirmed.

T. L. Henritze and Strother & Strother, for plaintiff in error. R. C. & B. McClaugherty and D. E. French, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. In the petition for the writ of error it is said that the National Cash Register Company sold Womach, trading as Union Bargain House, a cash register, reserving title until payment of purchase money, and that E. B. Taylor & Co. levied an execution against Womach on the register, and the register company filed before the justice claim to it, asking its release from the execution, and after trial before the justice the case went to the circuit court on appeal, when it was decided against the register company, and it took out a writ of error.

There is no paper to show even a commencement of action before a justice, though from an order we may say there was. That order says an order to summon the parties was issued, but it is not in the record, but an order between the register company and Meoni & Co. and C. Womach appears. The judgment of the circuit court recites that the case was heard by the court upon agreed statement of facts filed with the papers, but the statement is not in the record. The entry in the justice's docket does say that it was agreed that Taylor & Co. were execution creditors of the Union Bargain House, and that the execution was levied on "the cash register referred to in the order herein, and which is claimed by the plaintiff"; but that order is not in the record so as to describe or identify the register, nor is the execution, nor is there proof what register was levied on, nor that it was the same sold by the register company to the Bargain House. There is notice of reservation of title printed, but not made a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise. There is no evidence to identify the register as the one sold, or as the one to which the reservation of title was reserved.

A judgment is presumed to be right, and unless we have the evidence certified, whether the case was tried by a jury, or a court in lieu of it, we cannot reverse. Robertson v. Harmon, 47 W. Va. 500, 35 S. E. 832; State v. Miller, 26 W. Va. 106. We must affirm the judgment, as we must take it to be right until shown not to be. Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386; 3 Oyc. 419; Griffith v. Corrothers, 42 W. Va. 59, 24 S. E. 569.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marshall County; Jos. R. Paull, Judge.

J. E. Hooten and Melghen & Oldham, for appellants. J. Howard Holt, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. David McConaughy executed his will by which he devised to his wife, Ann McConaughy, all of his real estate and personal property, giving her full control thereof, and to receive all the proceeds or assets arising from the same, and she to pay all just debts which he might owe at his death, and keep all the property free from incumbrances so long as she remained his widow, or until his youngest son, David McConaughy, Jr., should arrive at the age of 30 years, when, if the said David, Jr., should be living, he gave him 100 acres of the farm on which testator lived, including the dwelling house and other improvements pertaining thereto, and provided that if his wife, Ann, so desired, she should remain with him, he to keep and provide for her thereafter during her natural life; and gave to his son Samuel 100 acres of land and $500, and to his sons Robert A. and James B. each 100 acres of land, and bequeathed to his daughters, Martha L. Richardson, Sarah Ann Hogue, M. Virginia McConaughy, and Isabella F. McConaughy, each $1,000, and stated that the said Mrs. Richardson had received the $1,000 intended for her—which will was dated the 10th day of April, 1874, and admitted to probate on the 3d day of September of the same year, in the clerk's office of the county court of Marshall county. On the 16th of March, 1899, Martha L. Richardson and her husband, E. P. Richardson, sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Marshall county their subpoena in chancery against Ann McConaughy and the heirs at law of David McConaughy, deceased, and filed their bill of complaint alleging: That her father, David McConaughy, had died seised of some $40,000 worth of real estate and considerable personal property, amounting, according to the appraisement made by Ann McConaughy, the administratrix, on or about the 4th of September, 1874, to the sum of $8,969.69. That there were no debts against the estate other than a debt of $581.80 due to James A. and Elizabeth Chambers, which debt was paid by the administratrix on or about the 3d day of August, 1875. That Ann remained the widow of the testator, and David, Jr., arrived at the age of 30 years in the year 1889. That the testator by his said will disposed of only a portion of his real and personal property, and that there remained of said estate to be divided among the children of the decedent and the heirs of such children as had died all of his real estate situated in the town of Cameron and about 100 acres of farm land after the estate of Ann McConaughy therein should cease. That early in the year 1889, after said David, Jr., arrived at the age of 30 years, and the widow and the then surviving children of said decedent, viz., David W., Samuel D., Robert A., James B., Isabella F. Dean, formerly Isabella F. McConaughy, and plaintiff Martha L. Richardson, agreed upon a friendly and amicable partition of all the said real estate not disposed of by the will.

That E. P. Richardson, plaintiff and husband of Martha L., consented to and joined in said agreement with his wife, and Anna Pearl Hogue, who was then an infant, was represented in said agreement by her guardian, David W. McConaughy. The terms of the agreement were talked over previous to the 18th of February, 1889, and on that day the agreement in regard to the partition of the real estate was concluded. That by said agreement 100 acres of the home farm were conveyed to said David W. as and for the 100 acres devised to him by said will, and 100 acres of said farm in Liberty District were conveyed to Robert A. as and for the 100 acres devised to him, and 79 acres and 100 poles of said farm in Liberty District were conveyed to said James B. McConaughy as and for 100 acres devised to him, and 107 acres of the home farm in Cameron District were conveyed to said Samuel D. McConaughy as and for the said 100 acres devised to him by the will. Said conveyances were by deeds of the date of February 18, 1889, duly executed by Ann McConaughy and all the adult heirs of David McConaughy, deceased, including the plaintiffs, and delivered to the respective grantees, and all duly recorded. That it was agreed that the residue of said real estate owned by David McConaughy, deceased, at the time of his death should be partitioned among the heirs at law, and to effect such partition it was agreed to make the said Ann McConaughy the channel or means through whom conveyances should be made to the different children, and two deeds conveying all the residue of said real estate owned by said decedent to the said Ann McConaughy were made and duly executed by all his adult children, including plaintiffs, and delivered to said Ann McConaughy. One of said deeds, dated January 24, 1890, conveyed 53 acres, more or less, of the home farm, but was not signed or acknowledged by plaintiffs until the 18th of February, 1889; the other was dated February 18, 1889, and conveyed to Ann McConaughy 38 acres and 100 poles of the home farm, and all the lots and parcels of said real estate within the corporate limits of the town of Cameron—which deeds were exhibited with the bill. That recitals in said two deeds were that conveyances were made in consideration of "natural love and affection for second party, and for other good and valid considerations moving them thereto"; but the fact is alleged to be that both of said conveyances were made to said Ann in trust that she would reconvey all said real estate to the said children and adult heirs of the said decedent, according to the terms of said agreement to partition the same, and it is stated how other portions were to be reconveyed to the different heirs: "And the two-story brick building known as the 'Reinheimer Business Building' with its lots of about 250 feet front as it was then fenced in, was to be reconveyed to the said Martha L. Richardson and the defendant Isabella F. Dean, then Isabella F. McConaughy, to have and to hold the same for and during their lives, with remainder to the survivor of them during her life, and then to the said David W. McConaughy, Samuel D. McConaughy, Robert A. McConaughy, and James B. McConaughy, or to their heirs, in fee forever; but the said Ann McConaughy was to retain and reserve to herself a life estate in said property, and the balance of the farm land was to be conveyed to Samuel D. McConaughy and David W. McConaughy." That on the said 18th day of February a deed was written conveying the said two-story brick building and said lot of ground to said plaintiff Martha L. and Isabella F. in accordance with said agreement, but plaintiffs were unable to state whether said deed was signed and acknowledged by Ann McConaughy or not, but that she then and there agreed to sign and acknowledge said deed, and all the said adult children and heirs also agreed that said deed should be signed, acknowledged, and delivered by said Ann to the said plaintiff Martha and defendant Isabella F., and that, in consideration of said agreement to reconvey said property to said Martha and Isabella as stated the plaintiffs signed and acknowledged the said two deeds to Ann. That said Ann McConaughy on the 18th day of February, 1889, promised them that the said deed to Martha and Isabella would be taken by her son, together with the other deeds that were made or agreed to be made on that date, to the office of the recorder of Marshall county and placed upon record. That they believed or supposed for a long time that the deed to Martha and Isabella had been executed and placed on record, and that they knew nothing to the contrary, and supposed same had been done, until some time about the month of —, 1898. That some time in the year 1898 said Ann McConaughy leased a portion of said real estate, which was to be so reconveyed, to E. P. Richardson. Said E. P. Richardson, in consideration of said agreement made on the 18th day of February, 1889, by which the plaintiff Martha, his wife, was to become the owner of a life estate of the undivided one-half interest in said real estate, made valuable improvements on said real estate, consisting of a two-story frame business building and other improvements, costing in all the sum of $3,200. That about the month of May, 1898, said Ann made an offer to plaintiff Martha that she would give her and said Isabella immediate possession of said real estate if they would pay her the sum of $200 a year during the rest of her life. When plaintiff informed Isabella of her offer, she refused to accept it. That plaintiff Martha then accepted the offer, and plaintiffs immediately began to put the two-story brick business building in a complete state of repair, and that they laid out and expended in making such repairs about $150, which they were induced to do in consideration of said agreement made on the 18th day of February, 1889, by which said plaintiff Martha was to become the owner of a life estate in the undivided half interest in said real estate. That while they were so engaged in making said repairs some dispute arose between them and said Ann as to the interest said Martha was to have in said real estate, when, on examining the record of the recorder of deeds, plaintiffs for the first time found that no such deed had ever been left for record. They then went to Ann, and she said to them, "The deed has been lost, and I will never make another in its place," and refused to carry out her agreement to put Martha in possession, and refused to make her a deed for said real estate, as provided in the agreement of February 18, 1889. Plaintiffs further allege that Ann, David W., and James B. McConaughy and Isabella F. Dean had combined, confederated, and conspired together to cheat and defraud plaintiff Martha out of her interest in the real estate of her father which was not disposed of by his will, and that Samuel D. and Robert A. McConaughy had sided with and abetted said combination and conspiracy to cheat and defraud them, and allege that to carry said conspiracy into effect the said Ann McConaughy, by deed dated October 8, 1898, conveyed a portion of said real estate that was to be conveyed to the said Martha and Isabella to said James B. McConaughy for an alleged consideration of $500, and by deed of same date said Ann conveyed another portion of said real estate to David McConaughy Dean, an infant son of said Isabella, aged about 8 years, for an alleged consideration of $500, and by deed dated the 24th of December, 1898, said Ann conveyed another portion of said real estate to said David W. McConaughy and Isabella F. Dean for an alleged consideration of $3,000, and by the same deed she conveyed another portion of said real estate, being the residue thereof, to said David W. for an alleged consideration of $500—copies of which deeds were exhibited with the bill; that no consideration at all was paid for any of said last-mentioned conveyances, and that said deeds were made to cheat and defraud the plaintiff Martha out of her interest in the said real estate, and at the time said deeds were made by said adult grantees therein after they knew that said real estate had been assigned to the said Martha, to have and to hold an undivided one-half interest therein for and during her life after the death of said Ann McConaughy, and, if said Martha survived the said Isabella, then she was to have and to hold the whole of said real estate during her life; that said Ann had wholly violated the trust upon which the real estate so described was so conveyed to her, so far as the interest of the plaintiff Martha in said real estate was concerned, but that so far as the interests of the other defendants were concerned she executed the trust. Plaintiffs further allege that they did not know what interest the defendant Anna Pearl Hogue was to have in the real estate of the decedent, David McConaughey, but that after the said Anna Pearl Hogue became 21 years of age she executed a deed to said Ann McConaughey for the tract of land conveyed by the adult heirs by deed of the 18th of February, 1889, containing 38 acres and 100 poles, and also the real estate within the corporate limits of the town of Cameron which was described and conveyed by the said adult heirs, dated the 21st day of January, 1889, which deed made by said Ann Pearl was dated May 28, 1897, and duly recorded; that the said several parcels of real estate described in the four deeds made by said Ann McConaughey to the several heirs of the decedent, dated, the first two October 8, 1898, and the last two December 24, 1898, together comprise the real estate that was assigned to said plaintiff Martha and the defendant Isabella as their share of the real estate of said David McConaughey, deceased, by the agreement made on the 18th day of February, 1889; and prayed that the said Ann McConaughey be decreed to hold in trust the land described in the deed of the 18th of February, 1889, made by the adult heirs of David McConaughey to Ann, described as containing 38 acres and 100 poles, and also lots and parcels of land within the corporate limits of the town of Cameron; and that the said deeds made by said Ann McConaughey to James B. McConaughey et al., dated, the first two October 8, 1898, and the other two December 24, 1898, be decreed to be in violation of such trust and a fraud upon the rights of plaintiffs, and that the same be set aside and annulled so far as they affect the rights of plaintiffs in the property described therein; and that said Ann McConaughey be compelled to specifically perform the trust upon which she held the said 38 acres and 100 poles and the lots and parcels within the corporate limits of Cameron, and that she be required by good and sufficient deed to convey to plaintiff Martha L. Richardson a one-half interest in the real estate mentioned and described in said four deeds, to have and to hold for and during her natural life, and, should said Martha survive the said Isabella, then Martha to have and to hold the whole of said real estate, her life estate therein being reserved by the said Ann McConaughey, and, on her refusing to make such conveyance, that the court appoint a special commissioner to make the same, and for general relief.

The defendants, Ann, David W., Samuel D., Robert A., and James B. McConaughey and Anna Pearl Hogue and Isabella F. Dean tendered their demurrer to said bill because, among other things, the bill does not allege that the agreement "upon a free and amicable partition" was in writing, and signed by the parties made defendants, and in consequence the terms of that agreement cannot be enforced under the statute of frauds; that the agreement could not be enforced against Anna Pearl Hogue, at any event, even if it had been in writing and signed by her guardian; that the exhibits are inconsistent with the allegations of the bill, and, taken together, show that there is no equity in the bill; that there is no agreement or memorandum in writing of that agreement signed by Ann McConaughey agreeing to reconvey the property as alleged; that no time is alleged in which said reconveyance was to be made, and that, if Ann McConaughey was to retain a life estate in said property, plaintiff could have no interest until after her death; that there is no averment in the bill of any agreement in writing that Ann McConaughey would execute any such conveyance, or that she signed, acknowledged, and delivered the deed alleged to have been written on February 18, 1889, and because the laches of plaintiffs in setting up their pretended claims after the lapse of more than 10 years is a complete bar to the same, which bar defendants plead by way of analogy to the bar of the statute of limitations, and also plead the statute of limitations of 10 years to any such contract or agreement as that pretended to have been made; that the bill is multifarious in having set up said contract as the one to be enforced, and then attempting to set up another and different contract for the leasing of said real estate by Ann to Richardson, without exhibiting said contract or giving its terms in full, which terms would show the statements with respect to the first contract to be utterly unfounded in fact; that the bill is further multifarious in setting up a contract alleging to have been entered into in the month of May, 1898, between Ann McConaughey of the one part and Martha L. Richardson of the other, said allegations being wholly at variance with the allegations immediately preceding, to the effect that Ann had already leased the property to E. P. Richardson; that the said defendants Ann, David W., James B. McConaughey, and Isabella F. Dean had combined, conferred, and conspired together to cheat and defraud plaintiff Martha L. Richardson out of the real estate of her father, and that Samuel D. and Robert A. McConaughey had aided and abetted in said combination and conspiracy, and had stated no grounds in the bill upon which to rest such allegation; that the exhibits filed with the bill showed that said Ann McConaughey was the owner in fee simple of said real estate alleged to have been conveyed by the said adult heirs, and could do what she pleased with the same without giving plaintiffs any ground for complaint. On the 5th day of June, 1899, the cause was submitted on the demurrer, the demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiffs not desiring to amend the bill, the same was dismissed.

It is insisted on the part of the appellees that the case comes within the doctrine laid down in Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, while the appellants claim that it is clearly covered by the exceptions in said case set out, as stated in syllabus 2, to which the rule is not properly applicable. Judge Green, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says, "It is a general rule of evidence that parol testimony cannot be admitted to vary or add to a written contract, and especially a contract or deed conveying lands," and cites quite a number of authorities, which see on page 576. And in point 3 of the syllabus in that case it is held: "If a party obtains a deed without any consideration upon a parol agreement that he will hold the land in trust for the grantor, such trust will not be enforced, as it would violate the statute of frauds, and this general rule to permit parol evidence to establish such a trust"—the rule constituting the first point in the syllabus of the case, "Parol evidence cannot be admitted to vary or add to a deed as a general rule." Syllabus, point 3, applies to deeds made without any consideration upon a parol agreement. With much more force it would apply where there is valuable consideration.

The conveyances made in case at bar, upon which the trust is sought to be established, recite on their face that "the parties of the first part, in consideration of their natural love and affection for second party and for other good and valuable considerations moving them thereto, do grant," etc.; the grantee being the mother of the grantors. These deeds convey the property with general warranty, and it is not alleged in the bill that the conveyances were without consideration. In Troll v. Carter, cited, Judge Green cites Porter v. Mayfield, 21 Pa. 263: "There are cases wherein trusts may be proved by oral testimony, but not in violation of the rule that protects written agreements against such testimony. As a deed of conveyance is intended to define the relations between the parties to it, it is not contradicted when it is shown that the vendee purchased in trust for a third person, for such evidence only establishes a new and consistent relation. But evidence that at the time of the conveyance the vendee agreed to hold the title in trust for the vendor is a flat contradiction of the written instrument executed by the parties as the bond and evidence of their relation, and would make it void from its very inception. Oral testimony can have no such power. As between vendor and vendee, such testimony cannot be heard to change a title absolute on its face into a trust." It was, however, held in Lingelfelter v. Ritchey, 58 Pa. 485 [98 Am. Dec. 308], that parol evidence might be received to establish a trust in favor of the grantor. But the decided weight of authority as well as reason sustains the position that 'parol evidence that at the time of the conveyance the vendee agreed to hold the title in trust for the vendor' is not admissible. See Leeman v. Whitley, 4 Russ. 423 (5 Eng. Cond. Ch. Cases, 746); Hogan v. Jaques et al., 19 N. J. Eq. 123 [97 Am. Dec. 644]; Squire v. Harder, 1 Paige, 494 [19 Am. Dec. 446]; Farrington v. Barr et al., 36 N. H. 86. But the correctness of the other position taken by the court in Porter v. Mayfield, 21 Pa. 264, that, 'as a deed of conveyance is intended to define the relations between the parties to it, it is not contradicted when it is shown that the vendee purchased in trust for a third person, for such evidence established a new and consistent relation,' is by no means so obvious." It will be seen that, while Judge Green agrees with the case of Porter v. Mayfield as far as it holds that parol evidence is not admissible to establish a trust in favor of the grantor, he questions the proposition that the deed "is not contradicted when it is shown that the vendor purchased in trust for a third party." This last proposition, as held in Porter v. Mayfield, has, however, been sustained by this court in Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329.

It is not alleged in the bill that the parol agreement was to hold in trust for the grantor the property conveyed, but it is claimed that it was to be held in trust—a life estate in part of it, to begin at the death of the grantee, to the plaintiff Martha L. Richardson and Isabella F. Dean, her sister, and to the survivor of them; the remainder to D. W. McConaughy and others or to their heirs in fee. The bill does not allege that this agreement was in writing, but that it was agreed to be in writing, and plaintiffs supposed that a deed to that effect was executed and placed upon record, as defendant Ann McConaughy had agreed to do; that the same was to be placed on record by her at the same time that her deeds, by which she holds the property, were recorded; that plaintiff did not discover that said deed had never been recorded until she examined the records in 1898. The conveyances to Ann McConaughy are dated February 18, 1889, which is the date of her verbal agreement, as set up in the bill, to execute a writing or deed reserving to plaintiff her rights in the premises, while this suit was commenced on the 16th day of March, 1899, more than 10 years after said parol agreement, relied upon by plaintiffs, was made. Appellees insist that the laches of plaintiffs in setting up their pretended claim after the lapse of more than 10 years is a complete bar, and defendants plead it by way of demurrer as analogous to the bar of the statute of limitations. In Troll v. Carter, cited (Syl., point 8), it is held that the courts will not enforce a parol trust where a great lapse of time has intervened since the absolute deed was executed, and where the grantee has during such time acted as the absolute owner of the property, unless the laches of those claiming to be cestuis que trust is satisfactorily explained. In the case at bar there is no attempt at explanation, unless it can be said that plaintiffs thought the defendant Ann McConaughy had, 10 years prior to the bringing of this suit, in pursuance of her promise, placed upon record a deed preserving the rights of the plaintiff. It was certainly the duty of plaintiffs, if such promise was made on the part of Ann McConaughy to place such deed upon record, to know that it was done as promised. It is not alleged that such deed was executed or delivered, and nothing claimed but a mere verbal promise on the part of Ann that she would have such a deed recorded in favor of plaintiff.

Plaintiff was guilty of gross laches, and makes no explanation to entitle her to relief. There is no error in the decree, and the same is affirmed.

POFFENBARGER, P. (concurring). The bill alleges a conveyance by the plaintiffs and other heirs to Ann McConaughy of certain real estate upon the understanding and agreement that she should immediately execute to the grantors, severally, deeds reconveying to them certain portions of the land so conveyed to her, reserving to herself life estates in the several tracts so to be reconveyed, and that the particular tract to be conveyed to the plaintiffs was described and identified, and a deed for the conveyance thereof to them prepared for execution by the said Ann McConaughy. The conveyance to her was a step in the performance of an antecedent agreement for the partition of real estate among the grantors, subject to a life estate therein to the grantee. Ann McConaughy, under this agreement, was to act as a sort of conduit or agency for the exchange of titles in effecting partition, and the titles were to pass in and out of her instantaneously. It was upon this agreement that the conveyances were made to her. The bill does not allege that she took the land conveyed to her upon a trust for the grantors. It does not say she agreed to hold the lands for them. It does not attempt to set up an express parol trust in contradiction of the deed. It attempts to allege that she committed a fraud upon the grantors in refusing to perform a contract upon the faith of which the conveyances were made to her. The facts alleged in the bill and proposed to be established by parol evidence, if they were sufficiently alleged, constitute what, in law, is termed a "constructive trust"—a trust springing out of a fraud—and to such a trust the statute of frauds does not apply. The case is, therefore, not within the third point of the syllabus in Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, but falls within the exception to the statute of frauds mentioned in point 2 of the syllabus of that case, which says, among other things: "If a grantee in a deed has procured it by fraud, he will be held by a court of equity to be a trustee of the real owner." This is a principle almost as old as the statute of frauds itself. At an early day the courts established the doctrine that a statute which had been enacted for the purpose of preventing and suppressing frauds and perjuries could not be allowed to become itself an instrumentality or engine for the perpetration of fraud.

"A second well-settled and even common form of trust ex maleficio occurs whenever a person acquires the legal title to land or other property by means of an intentionally false and fraudulent verbal promise to hold the same for a certain specified purpose—as, for example, a promise to convey the land to a designated individual, or to reconvey it to the grantor, and the like—and, having thus fraudulently obtained the title, he retains, uses, and claims the property as absolutely his own, so that the whole transaction by means of which the ownership is obtained is in fact a scheme of actual deceit. Equity regards such a person as holding the property charged with a constructive trust, and will compel him to fulfill the trust by conveying according to his engagement." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1055.

"The fraud against which equity will relieve, notwithstanding the statute, is not the mere moral wrong of repudiating a contract actually entered into, which, by reason of the statute, a party is not bound to perform for want of its being in writing. This was early laid down by Lord Macclesfield, Chancellor, in a case arising upon a promise of a defendant, about to marry, that his wife should enjoy all her own estate to her separate use after the marriage, which promise, as one made 'upon consideration of marriage,' could not regularly be enforced. His lordship declared that, 'in cases of fraud, equity should relieve, even against the words of the statute,—as, if one agreement in writing should be proposed and drawn, and another fraudulently and secretly brought in and executed in lieu of the former, in this or such like cases of fraud, equity would relieve; but where there is no fraud, only relying upon the honor, word, or promise of the defendant, the statute making those promises void, equity will not interfere.'" Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 439.

"Parol evidence is admissible to establish a trust, even against a deed absolute on its face, if it would be a fraud to set up the form of the deed as conclusive. Lord Hardwicke stated 'that the court adhered to this principle, that the statute of frauds should never be understood to protect fraud, and therefore, wherever a case is infected with fraud, the court will not suffer the statute to protect it.' Lord Thurlow added that 'the moment you impeach a deed for fraud you must either deny the effect of fraud upon the deed, or you must admit parol evidence to prove it.' If this was not so, the law would be reduced to this absurdity: If a fraud could once succeed in procuring the transaction to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, it would be protected by the law itself, and there would be no possible means of reaching and correcting the wrong. But in such case the bill must contain a clear and distinct charge of fraud. Therefore, whenever the bill sets out a clear case of fraud, parol evidence will be admitted to prove it, even if the effect of such evidence is to contradict, vary, alter, or destroy written instruments. The mere refusal of a grantee to execute, or the denial of the existence of an invalid parol trust upon which he promised to hold the property, is not such a fraud as will take the case out of the statute. But where a valuable interest passes to one on the faith of a contract he refuses to perform, equity will compel restitution or give other appropriate relief. In any case, if the trust arises from the acts of the parties, and not exclusively from their agreements, the statute of frauds is not a bar to the proof." Perry on Trusts, § 226.

But the bill is defective in this: that it fails to allege or charge that the defendant Ann McConaughy fraudulently procured the making of said conveyance to her. It should have charged that she procured the making of said conveyance by falsely and fraudulently representing and promising that she would immediately reconvey a certain portion of the land in accordance with the agreement of partition, and took said conveyance fraudulently intending, at the time, not to comply with her said promise to reconvey, and, with the like fraudulent intent, has refused to comply with said promise. Manning v. Pippen, 95 Ala. 537, 11 South, 56; Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 521; Perry on Trusts, § 226. The bill only charges that, after having made this agreement and obtained the conveyance in pursuance thereof, she refused to perform. This is not enough. Mere breach of the agreement does not raise a trust and take the case out of the statute of frauds. Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 94a, 439. The same work, at section 441, says: "A simple illustration of the rule that, when the statute of frauds has been used as a cover to a fraud, equity will relieve against the fraud, notwithstanding its provisions, is found in a case reported by Viner, and stated by him to have occurred in Lord Nottingham's time, and to have been the first instance in which any equitable exception to the statute appears. There was a verbal agreement for an absolute conveyance of land, and for a defeasance to be executed by the grantee; but he, having obtained the conveyance, refused to execute the defeasance, and relied upon the statute, but his plea was overruled, and he was compelled to execute according to his agreement. Here the attempted fraud consisted not merely in refusing to do what he agreed, but in deceiving the plaintiff out of his property. And the case is analogous to that put by Lord Macclesfield, as falling within the rule, where one agreement in writing is proposed and drawn, and another fraudulently and secretly brought in and executed in lieu of the former."

It may be that the facts set up in the bill, if established by evidence, would sustain the charge of fraud. Browne on Statute of Frauds, §§ 94a, 439. But the bill ought to charge fraud in express terms. Nothing is to be considered here but the bill, as the case stands upon the ruling of the court upon the demurrer, and the courts say the bill must contain a clear and distinct charge of fraud. Irnham v. Child, 1 Bro. Ch. 94; Portmore v. Morris, 2 Bro. Ch. 219; Forsyth v. Clark, 3 Wend. 637; Gouverneur v. El-mendorf, 5 Johns. Ch. 79; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 2 Ala. 571. In Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, 583, Judge Green directs particular attention to the want of any charge of fraud in the bill or the evidence.

Intent is a necessary element of fraud in such case. The agreement may have been made, and the conveyance taken, in good faith and with an honest intention to reconvey, and the fraudulent design of dishonestly retaining the property or disposing of it in violation of the agreement may have been formed afterwards. This would amount to no more than a breach of the agreement, and the bill alleges nothing inconsistent with such a state of facts. The court cannot assume that there was fraud in the procurement of the conveyance. It must be alleged as well as proved. It is fraud in acquiring the title, not merely in the retention of it, that raises the trust. If the evidence establishing such fraud were before the court, an amendment could be allowed, but the court cannot say whether an amendment would avail anything or not. Hence, under the rule, the plaintiffs having declined to amend in the court below, the decree of dismissal must be affirmed.

For the foregoing reasons, I concur in the decision, but not in all the reasoning of the opinion prepared by Judge McWHORTER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1904.)

ELECTIONS — BALLOTS — DEFEASANCE — WRITING CANDIDATE'S NAME — DISTINGUISHING MARKS — CANCELLATION.

1. Two of four columns on a ballot sheet are defaced. The Republican column is not defaced. The Democratic is defaced by broken lines as to all its offices and candidates except two, and their names are skipped by the lines, and thus left on that ballot, but their names are written in the Republican column for the same offices for which they stand in the Democratic column. The Republican ballot only has been voted. The voter has not voted two ballots.

2. Though a candidate's name is written in the space above the office on a ballot, it will be held a vote for him for the office below his name, where the printed name for that office is erased, and that above the written name is not erased.

3. The provision in Code 1899, c. 3, § 34, that where a name is substituted for one on a ballot it must be written in the space below the printed name, is directory. Though the name is not there written, the vote will be counted for the written name for the office for which it is plainly intended.

4. Distinguishing marks on a ballot will not cause its exclusion from the count.

5. Though lines through the heading of a ballot or through the ballot are not used, still if other marks of cancellation are used, and they plainly indicate that the ballot has not been voted, the ballot is effectually defaced, and cannot be counted.

6. Though defacing lines do not pass entirely through a ballot or its heading, yet, if it is manifest that the voter did not intend to vote that ballot, the defacement is sufficient.

7. Defacing marks to cancel a ballot must be within the ballot column or its heading. Words only above the heading or elsewhere outside the ballot, such as "I vote this ticket," do not select that ballot and cancel the others.

8. A name is written in the space between two offices, and the printed names of the candidates are not erased. The ballot counts for the office above the written name and for that name, not for the candidate for the office below. It would be otherwise if the printed name of the candidate for the office below were erased.

9. A ballot from which some of the offices and names of candidates for them have been cut entirely out with a knife, instead of being erased with a pen or pencil, is a good ballot for the offices and candidates left in it. The provision of the statute requiring erasure with pen or pencil is directory.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Action by Frank W. Doll against I. L. Bender. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Flick, Westenlaver & Noll and Faulkner, Walker & Woods, for plaintiff in error. Forrest W. Brown, H. H. Emmert, and A. G. Dayton, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. At the election in Berkeley county in November, 1902, Frank W. Doll was the Democratic nominee for the clerkship of the county court, and I. L. Bender the Republican nominee. The canvassing board found that Bender had been elected by a majority of four. Doll demanded a recount, and upon it the board found that Doll received 2,135 votes and Bender 2,146, giving Bender a majority of 11. The contestation was as to 146 ballots, and they were withdrawn from the mass, and made a part of the record. Doll carried the case to the circuit court by a writ of certiorari, and upon it that court found that Bender had received 2,146 votes and Doll 2,141. From the judgment of the circuit court declaring Bender elected Doll has sued out a writ of error in this court.

The ballot sheets have four columns, Democratic, People's Anti-Ring Ticket, Prohibition, and Republican. We adhere to the law stated in Morris v. Board, 49 W. Va. 260, 39 N. E. 500, and Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690, that the voter must select and use one, and only one, ballot from those on the ballot sheet. We reject those violating this rule. In this connection, take a specimen sheet. The People's and Prohibition columns or ballots are canceled by lines. No line in the Republican column. Three broken, not continuous, lines cancel all names and offices on the Democratic ballot, except for county commissioner and the candidate, Parks, and school superintendent and the candidate, Shirley, the lines skipping these, and leaving them untouched. In the Republican column, in the space between the place assigned for prosecuting attorney and commissioner, the name of Parks is written, and in the space between the place assigned for county clerk and county superintendent the name of Shirley is written. The printed candidates for commissioner and superintendent are erased. This sheet raises several questions. Does it violate the rule that a voter must use only one ballot? If the names of Parks and Shirley had not been written in the Republican ballot, and for the same offices for which they stood on the Democratic ballot, it would be a case of two ballots. Though their names yet remained on the Democratic ballot, yet they are written for the same offices on the Republican. A voter cannot vote twice for the same person at the same election for the same place. By leaving the Republican column untouched, we say that one was selected, and, seeing the names of Parks and Shirley written in it, we see that the voter intended to vote for them, and this is the plainer because he has left them on the Democratic ticket. But their presence there is surplusage, performing no office. We see all the balance of that ballot erased. A voter uses two columns where one person is voted for on one ballot, another on another, or where the same person is voted for on one ballot for one office, and on another for another office. Code 1899, c. 3, § 84, says that a ballot can be defaced by erasing its party heading, or drawing lines clear through it, "or in any other way indicating that the same has not been voted." Considering that the Democratic ballot is erased except as to Parks and Shirley, that their names are written in the Republican ballot for the same offices and the Republican candidates erased, and that the latter ballot is without defacement, we conclude that the intent was to select it and discard the Democratic column. The Democratic ballot was canceled.

A graver question arises on this ballot. Can it be counted for Bender? Bender's name is printed for clerk, and in the space below it, required by statute to be there for the purpose of allowing the voter to vote for some one other than Bender by erasing his name and writing in the space another name, the voter has written "J. W. Shirley," making it read, "For Clerk of the County Court, I. L. Bender, J. W. Shirley." As the statute says that when this blank space has a name written in it, and the printed name is not erased, the ballot shall be counted for the written name, it may be said this is a vote, not for Bender for clerk, but for Shirley. Inspection of the two ballots tells us that such was not the intent of the voter. He did not intend to vote for Shirley for clerk, because Shirley appears on the Democratic ballot as Democratic nominee for school superintendent, and the voter let his name stand for that office in the Democratic ballot, thus voting for him for that office, and wrote his name in the Republican ballot just above the words "For County Superintendent of Schools," and erased the name of the Republican nominee for that office. If he had not left Shirley's name for superintendent in the Democratic column, it would not be so plain, but that indicates for what office for Shirley he desired to vote in the Republican column. Placing the name of Shirley above the words "For County Superintendent" does not change the sense; for the words, "J. W. Shirley for County Superintendent" mean the same as "For County Superintendent J. W. Shirley." And the fact that he dealt with Parks in the same way confirms this view. He intended to vote for him for county commissioner, and did not intend to vote for prosecuting attorney, though he put the name of Parks in the space below the name of the candidate of that office, instead of that below that of the candidate on the Republican ballot for commissioner. He did not intend to vote for Parks or Shirley for offices for which they were not running. He erased the Republican names for those offices, and left the Republican candidates for prosecutor and county clerk, showing what offices he desired Parks and Shirley to fill. But it will be said that this view ignores Code 1890, c. 3, § 34, saying that a voter desiring not to vote for any candidate on the ballot "may strike out the name so printed on said ballot, and write in the blank space next following the name of the candidate or person for whom he so desires to vote. But if he fails to strike from said ballot the name printed thereon the name written in said blank shall alone be counted." It is urged that in Morris v. Board, 49 W. Va. 251, 38 S. E. 500, the opinion holds the statute in general sense mandatory, and particularly that the law requiring a voter who does not wish to vote for the printed candidate to write another name in the space below the printed name is mandatory, so that the substituted name must be put in that space, and, if it is not, it is no vote. It will be seen that the reference in that case to the space below the printed name was as an argument under the statute to show that one column must be selected and made the sole expression of the voter's will. The question whether, after one column has been selected and the others erased, the voter must write the substituted name in that space, and nowhere else, was not up in that case. This case does present, in the ballot now in hand, that question. In that case it is definitely stated that there are provisions in this statute that are merely directory. We did not intend to hold that the provision as to putting the name in this space is mandatory. It was not in the mind. We now say that when the voter has used one ballot we can investigate his intention as to his vote. It was the law, before the enactment of the Australian ballot, that the voter's intent must be sought and observed from his ballot. His ballot might be awkward and irregular, but, where his intent is plain, that intent must stand. We cannot think the new system has wholly abrogated this rule. The paper is a ballot still to express intent. We cannot think that we cannot look at intention. Some cases do hold that under this new system, looking at its object to suppress fraud, bribery, and other election evils, the voter must strictly follow the statute; that the Legislature has told him just how he shall vote, and departure from it loses him his vote. But the better opinion seems to be that generally, where the statute does not expressly or by plain implication reject the ballot, it is not to be cast out. Though we cannot let the voter use two ballots, can we not say what he meant by the one selected? For this position I would first call upon the statute itself in that clause of section 66 reading, "And any ballot, or part of a ballot, from which it is impossible to determine the elector's choice of candidates, shall not be counted as to the candidate or candidates affected thereby." This tells us that we must take this one ballot, scrutinize and find out the voter's intention, and say, if it is at all possible to do so, for whom he intended to vote. This language of the statute is alone a warrant for the position just stated. So is general law. See Parker v. Orr, 158 Ill. 609, 41 N. E. 1002, 30 L. R. A. 227; Opinion of Judge Ellis, Parker v. Hughes, 64 Kan. 216, 67 Pac. 637, 56 L. R. A. 275, 91 Am. St. Rep. 229. See Dunlevy v. County Court as to intention of voter, 47 W. Va. 513, 35 S. E. 956. "Though a candidate's name is written above the name of the office on the ballot, it will be construed for him where the printed name below name of office is erased." Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer (Ill.) 17 N. E. 232, 8 Am. St. Rep. 351. Therefore the vote was for Shirley for superintendent, the name of the nominee for that office being erased, and it was not a vote for Shirley for clerk, but for Bender.

Another question: Some of the ballots have the names of persons on their backs. One has the words "Good bye" at the foot of a column. Another the figure 4 where a printed name is erased. Another has part of the offices on a ballot cut out with a knife. Section 79 provides: "No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot, nor suffer or permit any other person to do so, by which it may be afterward identified as the ballot voted by him. Whoever shall violate any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony," and be confined in the penitentiary. Section 76 condemns others for inducing voters to place names or other distinguishing marks on ballots. These names, and perhaps some other marks on these ballots, would be distinguishing marks under the statute; but we do not discuss what are distinguishing marks, since we have concluded that they do not make ballots void. These provisions against such marks or earmarks are among the most important enactments in this statute, it is true, being intended to defeat bribery, intimidation, and all sorts of corruption in elections by covering the ballot with the veil of entire secrecy. Contracts made against a statute prohibiting an act and imposing a penalty for doing it, are void. Things done in contravention of such a statute are void. But a vote is not a contract. Elaborate discussion has been had as to these marks. It may not be without value to refer to some of the cases. "A ballot so prepared by a voter as to contain distinguishing marks, which, if permitted to be passed, would enable it to be identified, cannot be counted." Kelly v. Adams, 183 Ill. 193, 55 N. E. 837. And in Parker v. Orr, 158 Ill. 909, 41 N. E. 1002, 30 L. R. A. 227, it is held that this is so even if the statute contain no prohibition, so vital is the object of the provision. See Perkins v. Bertrand, 192 Ill. 58, 61 N. E. 406, 85 Am. St. Rep. 315; Parker v. Hughes, 64 Kan. 216, 67 Pac. 637, 56 L. R. A. 275, 91 Am. St. Rep. 216; Vallier v. Brakke, 7 S. D. 343, 64 N. W. 180; Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68; note in Taylor v. Bleakley, 49 Am. St. Rep. 243; Coughlin v. McElroy (Conn.) 43 Atl. 854, 77 Am. St. Rep. 301; Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 528, 27 Pac. 779, 13 L. R. A. 761, 25 Am. St. Rep. 212. Some courts hold that, to be a distinguishing mark, it must have been made with intent that it be such; but I venture for myself to say that the statute declares any mark to be such if it identify the ballot, let the intent be what it may, unless by accident or clumsiness. We hold that such mark does not destroy the ballot, on the principle that a citizen can be disfranchised only by clear expression of legislative intent to do so. The Legislature has not said that this mark shall reject the ballot. It had the particular matter under consideration. It selected its penalty. It made the act a crime, but did not add that the ballot should not be counted. In section 66 we find specified several causes for which ballots shall not be counted, and this affords reason to say that it was not intended to make this mark a ground of rejection. The Legislature has not commanded the courts to reject a ballot for this cause. The statute is the sole chart, guide, and authority as to elections. It is fairly to be presumed that, if the Legislature intended a distinguishing mark to destroy a ballot, it would have said so while enumerating grounds for rejecting ballots. I think it will appear from cases cited above that the weight of authority is that if the statute does not expressly reject a ballot for this cause, it counts; especially opinions in Parker v. Hughes, 64 Kan. 216, 67 Pac. 637, 56 L. R. A. 275, 91 Am. St. Rep. 216, and Patton

v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 397, 31 South. 98, 90 Am. St. Rep. 73. I will add that the Illinois act rejects all ballots not made out as it directs.

Here is a ballot sheet having the Republican column clear, and the three other columns have the party headings untouched, but just below them are large crosses like the letter X, erasing some candidates and leaving many others untouched. These crosses run down the columns about one-third, leaving two-thirds unerased. It is claimed the Republican ballot cannot count, because the voter has voted three ballots. The Code, § 34, directs the voter to select one ballot on the sheet, and then adds that "every other ballot on the same sheet shall be defaced by drawing one or more lines with pen and ink or indelible pencil from the top to the bottom thereof, or across the heading thereof, or in any other way indicating that the same has not been voted." It is true these crosses only cover parts of the ballots, but they are found in three columns or ballots alike, and the fourth is not defaced, "indicating" that the voter intended to destroy three ballots and vote the remaining one. Whilst he did not run a line from top to bottom or across the party headings—the two modes of defacement specified by the statute—yet we think these crosses come in under the words, "or in any other way indicating that the same has not been voted." They show that the intention was to erase the three columns.

Here is another ballot sheet. The two middle ballots are erased by lines clear through, except they leave the party headings and the place for Congressmen. The Anti-Ring column has no printed name for Congressman, the Prohibition has. The Republican ballot leaves the heading and congressman, Alston G. Dayton, untouched, and all other places for officers and printed candidates are erased by short straight lines erasing the offices to be filled and printed names of candidates, except that it leaves untouched "For Prosecuting Attorney, Ward B. Lindsay," and "For Clerk of the Circuit Court, L. Dew Gerhardt." The Democratic ballot is not in any way erased. The names of Lindsay and Gerhardt are written in it in spaces below the names of J. M. Woods and Samuel L. Dodd, the Democratic candidates for prosecuting attorney and clerk of the circuit court. We hold that the voter has selected the Democratic ballot and destroyed the others. He has transferred to the Democratic ballot the names of Lindsay and Gerhardt, and so they are on both ballots, but the transfer takes them from the Republican ballot. Under principles stated above, their names on the Republican ballot do not make the voter vote two ballots. The voter's intent to vote for them is plainly shown by leaving them on the Republican and transferring them to the Democratic ballot. But he voted for three congressmen, it will be said. We cannot think he intended to do this. We think he intended to vote for John T. McGraw, Democratic nominee, for that place. The Democratic ballot has no erasures except in such transfer of Lindsay's and Gerhardt's names. This fact induces the court to say that, as the statute allows the voter to destroy a ballot "in any other way indicating that the same has not been voted," the voter designed to efface every ballot but the Democratic.

Here is a sheet on which the voter has not touched the Democratic column, but on the other three has drawn lines half way down, leaving the party headings, erasing the Prohibition congressman, Rev. R. M. Strickler, leaving the Republican candidate, Alston G. Dayton, and places and candidates for several offices on the Prohibition and Republican columns. He leaves the name John B. Wilson, the only printed name on the People's ballot, for clerk of the circuit court. We think that the voter has indicated sufficiently that he rejected all other ballots but the Democratic, although his erasure lines do not erase some candidates on those rejected ballots.

We reject ballots wanting names of one or both poll clerks, because the names of two poll clerks are a most material earmark to attest the genuineness of a ballot; but why give the reason when section 66 expressly says that such a ballot is void, and shall not be counted? Kirkpatrick v. Deegans, 53 W. Va. 275, 44 S. E. 464.

Here is a ballot sheet which has the Democratic ballot undefaced. In the next there are crosses about the middle. In the Republican ballot a line clear through, except that it has the congressman untouched. The party headings are untouched. There are the places and names of numerous candidates untouched in the two middle columns. We conclude that it is a good ballot, because we think the crosses in two columns and the long line nearly through the Republican column indicate with fair certainty that the voter intended to vote the Democratic ballot, because it is untouched by any mark and the others are marred. Whilst we require the voter to use one ballot, we must not be too rigid and captious as to the manner of the defacement of other ballots, because the statute says that any marks of defacement which "indicate" that the voter intended not to vote a ballot will do.

Here is a ballot sheet having a line drawn just under the letters of the party headings of all the ballots except the Democratic, and a pencil mark over the words "Republican Ticket," erasing them. In the People's Anti-Ring column a line from its top down two inches, then crossing the line dividing that column and the Prohibition column and entering it and going down to the bottom of the Prohibition column. Another line begins at the bottom of the People's Anti-Ring column and runs up it to nearly the line just described. There is but one name on that ticket, and it is erased by the line. There are the names of the offices and three printed names left in the Prohibition column untouched. A line runs from top to bottom of the Republican ballot. The Democratic ballot untouched. It is plain that the Democratic ballot was voted; the others not voted, but canceled.

Here is a ballot sheet having three lines from the top halfway down the ballots; the names of some candidates and their offices left in two of them. The Republican ballot is untouched, except that the name of Dayton for congressman is erased and McGraw's written in the space below, and for commissioner Crozinger's name erased and that of Parks written in the space below. How can we doubt that the voter selected the Republican ticket, amended it, and canceled all others?

Here is one having crosses and lines erasing two ballots, headings and candidates and offices from two of the ballots, and eight crosses over the candidates and offices on the Republican ballot, but leaving four offices and candidates on it not defaced. The Democratic ballot has no sign of mark on it. We hold the three other ballots canceled.

Here is one with lines in three columns from congressman to bottom, leaving headings and names of three congressmen, the other column having no printed name for Congress. In the Democratic column one candidate has been erased, and a name put in: but in other respects it is just as printed. We hold that all the ballots but the Democratic were erased.

Here is one having three columns erased. The Democratic column is untouched, save that the name of Doll is erased, and just to the right of his name Bender's name is written, his name crossing the line between the columns. Though the name is not in the space below, and one half of it inside and the other outside the column, it is a good vote for Bender. The intent to vote for him is plain.

Here is a ballot sheet without the sign of any mark in any of the four columns or their headings. Just above the Republican ticket are the words, "I vote this ticket." It is plain the vote was intended for the Republican ticket. But no marks are on the ballots. The statute contemplates marks of erasure, and they inside the columns, or through the headings, whatever the mark may be. These columns are just as printed. Such an indication as this will not do. The words do not necessarily refer to any one ballot, though likely meant to select the Republican. They are a mere memorandum on the same paper, but not a part of the ballot.

Here is a sheet with three columns clearly erased by lines from top to bottom. No lines or marks in the Democratic column. In it Doll's name is erased, and Bender's written in the space above, instead of in the space below. So with several other names. The writing of the name above the designation of the office does not destroy the vote for Bender. As he is on the Republican ticket for a certain office, writing it in above that same office in the Democratic and erasing it from the Republican column shows that the intent was to vote for him for that same office. We cannot say that writing "Bender" in the space above clerk of county court shows that he intended to vote for him for the office above, clerk of circuit court, because Dodd's name is erased for the latter office, and Gerhardt, the Republican candidate for that office, written in. Failure to write a substituted name in the proper space is not fatal where intent is plain. We must not use the Australian ballot to defeat plain intent and the sacred right of suffrage.

A ballot has the name of a Democratic candidate for clerk of circuit court erased, and Bender's written in the space below and Doll's left for clerk of county court. It is a vote for Doll, not only because Bender's name is written in below the clerk of circuit court, but the candidate for that office is erased, and Doll's untouched.

A sheet leaves all headings, has a cross over all of the printed names of candidates for Congress, thus erasing them, but A. G. Dayton's name is written under the place for that office in the Prohibition ballot. The name of David Deck, Prohibition nominee for county clerk, is erased, and Bender's name inserted in the space below. Other names are so inserted in that ballot. We hold that the Prohibition ballot was voted; the others rejected by the cross-marks specified above.

Here is a sheet from which the voter, to make sure that he did not vote for four Democratic names, cut them out with a knife. The remainder of the ticket is good. He has used a knife to erase the candidates instead of a pen or pencil. Objection may be made to this as a strong distinguishing mark, but cannot as one of mutilation. The balance of the Democratic ballot is clear. He has cut out only part, not canceled the whole ballot.

A sheet has the Democratic, People's, and Prohibition ballots properly erased. Three lines run from prosecuting attorney, inclusive, down to the bottom of the Republican ticket; others covering the names of several offices and candidates, including the office of clerk and name of Bender, thus erasing them; but the voter, having thus erased Bender and Zeller, the Republican candidate for superintendent, has written in the space below, over the erasing lines, the names of Doll and Dunn, the Democratic and Prohibition candidates for clerk of county court and school superintendent. Though these pencil erasing lines erase the names of three candidates for other offices, the voter has again erased them with ink. We think this shows intent to vote for Doll and Dunn.

A sheet has all party headings intact, the congressman also; the balance of People's Prohibition, and Republican ballots erased by lines. On the Democratic ballot a line runs from the congressman down, erasing all names to county clerk, skipping it, and then resuming and going on to bottom. We think all three ballots, except Democratic, were erased, and that the Democratic was voted as to congressman and clerk.

Other specimens of ballots could be given, but these will suffice to illustrate the legal principles ruling the case.

Upon a canvass of the contested ballots we find that Bender received 2,181 and Doll 2,128 votes, and we therefore affirm the judgment of the circuit court, which declared Bender elected and affirmed the judgment of the canvassing board.

POFFENBARGER, P. (concurring). All the controverted ballots in this case were disposed of under the principles laid down in Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690. No difficulty whatever was experienced in reaching a unanimous conclusion as to every one of them. Many ballots counted by the board of canvassers and the circuit court were rejected here, and some not counted by said board, and probably not counted by the court, were counted here, and in every instance of counting and rejecting the court acted with perfect unanimity. My purpose in writing this opinion is, therefore, not to criticize or dissent from any conclusion involved in the decision. It is merely to elaborate upon, and express in my own language, some of the principles which governed the action of the court in passing upon the ballots.

There were 148 of them, presenting diverse methods of marking and raising numerous questions. Most of them, however, called for the application of the statute requiring defacement of all the ballots on the sheet except the one voted, and the principal questions raised in this connection were, what amounts to a defacement, and how is the intention of the voter to deface to be ascertained and determined from the marks found on the ballot sheet? The statute provides that the voter shall deface the ballots not voted "by drawing one or more lines with pen and ink or indelible pencil from the top to the bottom thereof, or across the heading thereof, or in any other way indicating that the same has not been voted by the voter." Under the last clause of the statute as quoted above it was considered and held that a small cross, a straight line up and down the ballot of any length, a number of small crosses at various places on the ballot, or any other sort of line or lines on the ballot or in the heading thereof, is prima facie a defacement of that ballot. In the first instance, then, the ballots alone are examined, and, if it is found that there are marks of some kind on all but one of them, the voter is deemed to have sufficiently manifested his intention to deface all the ballots except the one left unmarked. In order to deface a ballot, therefore, it is not necessary in all cases that the line or lines shall be across the heading thereof, or so drawn as to cover all the names on the ballot. But this prima facie intention of defacement may be rebutted and overthrown by something else appearing on the sheet. On some of the ballot sheets the two middle ballots were wholly defaced by lines drawn from the top to the bottom, while the Democratic had a broken line drawn through it, leaving one or more names on it undefaced, while on others the Republican ballot was in the same condition. In the absence of anything appearing on the sheet to the contrary, this Democratic ballot would be deemed to have been defaced. But on turning to the Republican ballot it is found that the names thereon immediately opposite the undefaced names on the Democratic ballot have been stricken out, and all the balance of the Republican ballot left unmarked. This circumstance overthrows the prima facie defacement of the Democratic ballot by showing the intent of the voter to vote for part of the candidates on the Republican ticket and part of the candidates on the Democratic ticket, contrary to the mandate of the statute, and there is no defacement of either the Republican or the Democratic ballot. This is illustrated by the ballots found on page 290 of the record, top page, 292, 302, 304, 310, 314, 336, 342, 360, 364, 468, 390, 396, 398, 402, 414, 416, 420, and others.

This principle is further illustrated by another class of ballots, a representative of which is found on page 284 of the record. The Democratic ballot is prima facie destroyed by a broken line, which omits to mark out two names. The two middle ballots on the sheet are defaced by cross-marks through the headings thereof. The two names on the Republican ballot immediately opposite the two undefaced names on the Democratic ballot are crossed out. If nothing further appeared, this ballot would be rejected for the reasons above given, as the prima facie defacement of the Democratic ballot is overthrown and rebutted by what appears so far on the Republican ballot. But all this is changed by something further apparent on the Republican ballot. The two undefaced names on the Democratic ballot are written under the two names defaced on the Republican ballot, which shows conclusively the intent of the voter to do all his voting on the Republican ballot. That in the Republican ballot, which, without anything further appearing therein, would have negated the intent to deface the Democratic ballot, manifested by the broken line drawn through it, is overthrown by the transfer of the names, and the prima facie defacement of the Democratic ballot remains unaltered. Further illustrations of this will be found on pages, 159, 195, 213, 251, 255, 306, 312, 320, 344, 358, 388, and 418. A ballot held to be good under this rule is found on page 261. The broken line in the Democratic column left two names untouched—Dodd for circuit clerk and Doll for county clerk. The Republican ballot had the name of Dodd's opponent stricken out and Dodd's transferred. Prima facie, the Democratic ballot was defaced, and there was nothing anywhere on the sheet to the contrary except the marking out of Gerhardt's name, and this circumstance, which would have destroyed the ballot, was itself overthrown by the transfer of Dodd's name. Bender's name not having been stricken out, nothing appeared on the sheet to indicate that the remaining unmarked name on the Democratic ballot was voted.

As between Bender and Doll, the ballot last above described falls under the rule under which the ballot found on page 209 of the record was counted. By a broken line all the names on the Republican ticket were defaced except that of Bender. The two middle ballots were entirely defaced. The Democratic ballot was free from any mark, except one indicating the vote on the road law. It was held that nothing appeared on the sheet to negative the intent to deface the Republican ballot, manifested by the broken line, and that the entire Democratic ticket had been voted, and the Republican ticket defaced. Upon the same principle the ballots found on pages 141 and 354 were counted.

A peculiar ballot is found on page 322. The Republican, Prohibition, and Anti-Ring ballots are thoroughly defaced by a line drawn from the top to the bottom of each. The Democratic ballot has all the names marked out by a broken line drawn from top to bottom except those of Dodd for circuit clerk and Doll for county clerk. This was rejected by the board of canvassers. It was counted here for Doll, it being held that there is a presumption that the voter intended to vote for somebody, and he had not violated the mandate of the statute by attempting to vote for persons on more than one ballot without transferring the names into a single column. He had thoroughly defaced all the ballots except the Democratic ballot. Upon that ballot he had placed marks which, in the absence of anything to the contrary, would have manifested a sufficient intent to deface it. But this prima facie defacement is overthrown and rebutted by leaving two names on it unmarked. The court held the two names to be an undefaced part of the ballot, to be counted under section 66, which impliedly says a part of a ballot shall be counted if it is possible to ascertain from it the elector's choice of candidates. Every other ballot was thoroughly defaced, and part of this one left undefaced. It is a part of a ballot, and no mandatory provision of the statute is violated by counting it. A similar ballot is found on page 308, where the Republican, Prohibition, and Anti-Ring ballots are defaced by a line drawn through each of them from top to bottom, and the Democratic ballot has a line drawn from the heading down to and through the name of the candidate for prosecuting attorney, leaving all other names on that ballot unmarked. This ballot also was rejected by the board of canvassers, but counted here.

A ballot sheet not counted by the board of canvassers or by this court is one found on page 382. On each of the ballots a line begins with the senatorial ticket, and runs to the bottom, except that the line on the Democratic ticket is broken so as to leave one name at the break unmarked. Prima facie all of the ballots on this sheet are defaced. The congressional candidate on each of them is left unmarked, and one additional candidate on the Democratic ticket. There is no more reason to say that the voter intended to vote for a man on any one of these ballots than there is to say he intended to vote for a man on either of the other.

These illustrations are sufficient to indicate the application of the principles upon which questions concerning cancellation of ballots were determined. The other class of questions in the case relate to the intent of the voter as to candidates whose names appeared upon, or are written by him in, the column or ballot he voted. Whatever may be said of the expression in the opinion in Morris v. Board, 49 W. Va. 251, 38 S. E. 500, which is said to have intimated that the statutory provision which says a voter desiring to vote for a person whose name does not appear on the printed ballot selected by him shall erase the name of the person whom he wishes to displace by that of another candidate, and write the name of such other candidate in the blank space below the name erased, is mandatory, it is certainly true, as an examination of the opinion in that case will show, that the point did not arise in the case, and nothing called for a decision upon it. It appears in the opinion in the form of a question. It is also true that it was expressly stated in Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 574, 39 S. E. 690, that "if the voter has placed the names of all persons for whom he offers to vote in one column, and has thus prepared his ballot, his vote should be counted if his intention can be ascertained from that ballot, although he may not have written the names in the exact places in the column designated by the statute." This declares that provision of the statute to be directory, and not mandatory. The question did not arise in that case, but it had arisen in Dunlevy v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 513, 35 S. E. 956, and had been there decided in the same way. The statute does not prohibit the counting of the ballot for the person whose name is transferred because of failure to write it in the space prescribed therefor. No provision of the statute has been declared to be mandatory except in those instances in which it was declared by the Legislature that the ballot should not be counted in case of failure to comply with the statutory requirement. Section 66 does not say every ballot from which the voter's intention as to candidates can be ascertained shall be counted, but it contains a provision from which it is naturally and reasonably to be inferred that such was the legislative intention. It prohibits the counting of "any ballot, or part of a ballot, from which it is impossible to determine the elector's choice of candidates." The converse of this, namely, that any ballot or part of a ballot from which it is possible to determine such choice, shall be counted, must be true. If so, the rules of law governing inquiries as to the intent of the voter, except so far as controlled by the statute, must govern in determining from the ballots selected and voted the persons for whom the elector voted, and in passing upon the ballots to which names have been transferred these rules, in so far as they are unchanged by the statute, have been applied.

DENT, J. (concurring). I concur in the result in this case for the reason that according to the rules and principles of Dunlevy v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 513, 35 S. E. 956, the Republican candidate, I. L. Bender, had a majority over his Democratic opponent, Frank W. Doll, of not less than 14. The result of this decision gives the Republican candidate a majority of 3. If the question asked in Morris v. Board, 49 W. Va. 230, 38 S. E. 500, to wit, "Under these authorities I think I may ask whether the plain requirement of our statute that the voter shall select one ballot only is not mandatory, and whether that provision that he shall place a substitute candidate's name in a particular blank space under the erased name is not also mandatory," had been wholly answered in the affirmative, the latter clause relating to the blank space would have caused the rejection of 11 more ballots, 8 of which were for Bender and 3 for Doll, would have changed the result reached, and elected Doll by 2 majority. Such a holding, in my opinion, as given in Dunlevy v. County Court, is not justified by the statute, and would have been a positive breach of moral law. I am aware that there are some people who at least profess to believe that elections, being human institutions, are governed solely by human inclinations, and are not subject to the supervision or control of that moral code of ethics promulgated by God through the greatest of all human law-givers from Sinai's hoary summit. This, however, is a great and grievous error, for the eighth commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," forbids not only larceny as defined in the Criminal Code, but also the unjust deprivation of every person's civil, religious, political, and personal rights of life, liberty, reputation, and property—even though done under the sanction of legal procedure. While the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet," rebukes even the desire to do such things. The selfish disregard of these plain inhibitions of both revealed and natural law, supported by the dictates of a pure conscience, brings on political corruption, poisons the very fountain head of civil authority—the ballot box—and ends in disrespect to all law, followed by lawlessness, fraud, rapine, murder, and lynching by rope, fire, and torture. A broken moral law, by whoever done, however done, and wherever done, is certain to bring its retribution, which may fall on the head of the innocent and pure, but for which the aggressor must some day, somewhere and somehow, make full restitution. This is a lesson which men are slow to learn and unwilling to receive, although the history of the past is but a record of one half of its profound truth, while the other half awaits the revelations of eternity. With my unshaken and fixed belief in the moral law, the supreme rule of Almighty God, the final triumph of perfect righteousness, and the sure punishment of all iniquity, I could not do otherwise than concur in sustaining the expressed will of the people, bound as I am by the oath of office under which I hold my commission. A cross and a crown of thorns are far more to be preferred than success achieved through the broken laws of God.

While I concur in the result, I cannot yield assent to the mandatory character of the statute relating to the choice of the voting column, except that, when more than one of the ballots have nothing on them to indicate which one of them was not voted and which was, then neither of them should be counted, for the reason that the choice of the voter as to any office is nonascertainable. The present opinion saps the foundation from under such holding and leaves it suspended on the mere dictum of the court. The reason for the law having ceased, the law ceases with it. Its continuance in operation can have but one effect alone, and that is it may compel the election officers to sometimes defeat the will of the people by rejecting ballots on which voters have plainly made their intention appear. It accomplished no other purpose in this case, except it caused the rejection of 38 ballots with the intention of the voter so plainly written on the face thereof that no one could be deceived thereby. Twenty-three of these ballots were for Bender, and 15 thereof for Doll, making a net loss of 8 to Bender. If Bender had lost 4 more or Doll 4 less, or Bender 2 more and Doll 2 less, the result of the election would have been changed.

CINCINNATI, P., B. S. & P. PACKET CO.
v. BELLVILLE et al.

April 1, 1904.)

PROHIBITION—WHEN LIES—INFERIOR COURTS—
JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—JUDGMENT—ENTRY.

1. Prohibition will not lie to restrain an inferior court from exercising jurisdiction in a particular case, in a class of cases of which such court had jurisdiction.

2. Although the statute requires that a judgment of a justice shall be entered within 24 hours after trial (Sundays excepted), a judgment rendered within such time, but entered after the time thus directed, is not void.

3. Where a judgment in an action tried before a justice is rendered and publicly announced by the justice on the day and at the close of the trial, although the clerical work of entering the judgment upon his docket is not performed until a few days thereafter, the statute is substantially complied with.

4. After a justice has rendered and publicly announced his judgment in an action at the close of the trial, the entry thereof upon the justice's docket is purely ministerial, and not judicial.

Error from Circuit Court, Cabell County;
E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Petition by the Cincinnati, Portsmouth, Big Sandy & Pomeroy Packet Company against Samuel Bellville and others for a writ of prohibition. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. K. Cowden and W. S. Laidley, for plaintiff in error. Wallace & Fitzpatrick, for defendants in error.

McWHORTER, J. J. M. McCoach & Co. brought their suit before a justice of Cabell county against the Cincinnati, Portsmouth, Big Sandy & Pomeroy Packet Company, claiming judgment for money due on contract for $25. The case was tried on the 26th day of March, 1902. The justice rendered judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum of $14.38. On the 5th day of April, 1902, the defendant packet company filed its petition in the circuit court of Cabell county, praying for a rule against Samuel Bellville, the justice who rendered the judgment, and the plaintiffs, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded, prohibiting said justice from proceeding further in said action, and from issuing execution or taking any further steps for the collection of said judgment. The grounds for such prohibition, as set out in the petition, are that on the day fixed in the summons for the trial of said cause, and the defendant having appeared on the 21st of January, 1902, the cause was by agreement continued from time to time until the 26th day of March, when the defendant appeared and made defense to said action, and, after hearing all the evidence adduced upon the trial, the said justice, on the said 26th day of March, 1902, rendered judgment therein against the defendant for said sum of $14.38, with interest and costs; that, although said judgment was so rendered, the justice did not enter up the same within 24 hours (Sundays excepted) after the judgment was rendered; that he did not enter up said judgment on the 27th, 28th, or 29th of March, but that he did, afterwards, more than 72 hours after the time said judgment was rendered, wrongfully and illegally enter up the judgment on his docket; that after the same was entered up notice was given to plaintiff that on the 5th day of April, 1902, at 2:30 o'clock, defendants would move the justice to set aside and annul the judgment so entered, on the ground that it was illegal, because not entered within 24 hours after its rendition, but the justice overruled the motion and refused to set aside the judgment; and that, unless prohibited, the justice would continue to usurp and abuse his power as such justice, and exceed his legitimate power in such case, by issuing execution on said judgment, and proceed to collect the same. The circuit court issued the rule; the plaintiff appeared and moved to quash the petition, and demurred thereto, and prayed that the rule be discharged; and the court sustained the demurrer and discharged the rule, and entered judgment against defendant for the costs in the proceedings, when defendant procured a writ of error to said judgment.

It is contended by plaintiff in error that this case is controlled by the case of McClain v. Davis, 37 W. Va. 330, 16 S. E. 629, 18 L. R. A. 634. That was a case which had been to this court before. A. J. Lowther in 1886 had brought suit against Davis, and on the 8th day of April, 1886, had the verdict of a jury in the case, tried before two justices, in his favor for $184 and costs. No entry was made of any judgment on said verdict. Afterwards a justice issued an execution. Notice was given to the plaintiff to quash the execution. The justice overruled the motion to quash, and refused an appeal from his judgment. An appeal was granted, however, by the circuit court, and on motion of plaintiff the appeal was dismissed as improvidently awarded, and Davis brought it to this court on writ of error, and the court held that the circuit court erred in dismissing the appeal, and the justice erred in overruling the motion of the defendant, Davis, to quash the execution, for the reason that there was no judgment on which it could have been legally issued; and the case was remanded to the circuit court for trial on the appeal. Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. 20. On the 20th of March, 1888, the two justices who tried the case entered judgment upon the said verdict as of the 8th day of April, 1886. Plaintiff, Lowther, died, and his administrator made a motion before the justice to revive the judgment in his name, which motion was opposed by the defendant, and the justice refused to revive, and on appeal to the circuit court his action was affirmed. The administrator brought it to this court on writ of error, and the judgment of the circuit court was here affirmed. McClain v. Davis, 37 W. Va. 330, 16 S. E. 629, 18 L. R. A. 634. At page 332, 37 W. Va., page 630, 16 S. E., 18 L. R. A. 634, it is said in the opinion: "In the first place, the case may be regarded as a res adjudicata; this court having in effect directed the execution to be quashed upon the ground that no such judgment had been rendered or entered. It is true that the record now produced of an attempt on the part of the two justices to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc was not then before this court; but the principle often announced is that everything litigated on the former trial, or which might and ought to have been litigated, is closed by the final adjudication here." The question raised in the case at bar is not directly passed upon in the said last-named case.

In 23 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 209: "Prohibition cannot be used in place of the ordinary remedies provided by law for review and correction of errors. Accordingly it will not lie where there is an adequate remedy by appeal, writ of error, or writ of certiorari. Even the erroneous decision of a jurisdictional question, the court having jurisdiction of the general class of cases to which the particular case belongs, is not ground for issuing a writ of prohibition, since there is an adequate remedy by appeal. The writ will not lie to restrain an inferior court from exercising jurisdiction in a particular case, in a class of cases of which such court had jurisdiction." And cases are there cited. In McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134, syllabus, point 2: "The rule is well established that, where the inferior court has originally jurisdiction of the cause, the writ of prohibition will lie only where such court, during the proceedings or in the conduct of the trial, clearly exceeds its legitimate powers in some collateral matter arising in the cause over which it has no authority; but, unless it has so exceeded its authority, on an application for such writ the court above will not inquire whether it has decided right or not."

In Hutchinson's Treatise, § 131, it is said: "Although the statute requires that a judgment of a justice shall be entered, as we have seen, without delay, or within twenty-four hours after trial (Sundays excepted), a judgment entered after the time or the day thus directed by the statute is not absolutely void. It is irregular, but will be effectual as a judgment until reversed or properly set aside"—citing McClain v. Davis, 37 W. Va. 330, 16 S. E. 629, 18 L. R. A. 634, and other authorities. In Hall v. Tuttle, 6 Hill, 88, 40 Am. Dec. 382, it is held: "Though statute require judgment to be forthwith rendered and entered upon the return of a verdict, a judgment rendered in due time will not be reversed because not entered in the docket until two or three days thereafter." See note at the end of this case, 40 Am. Dec.

In Conwell v. Kuykendall, 29 Kan., syllabus, point 2, it is held: "Where a judgment in an action tried before a justice of the peace is rendered and publicly announced by the justice by the fourth day after the close of the trial, both days inclusive, section 115,

c. 81, Comp. Laws 1879, is substantially complied with, although the clerical work of entering the judgment on the docket is not completed until a few days thereafter." In Stallcup v. Baker, 18 Ohio St. 544, it is held that the rendition of judgment by a justice on a verdict of the jury is a judicial, and not a ministerial, act, and neglect on his part to render judgment on such verdict within the time required by law to make it valid is not a breach of his official bond, conditioned that he "shall well and truly perform every ministerial act that is enjoined upon him by law and by virtue of said office." In Stephens v. Santee, 49 N. Y. 35, it is held that the entry of judgment is in no respect the exercise of judicial power, but the performance of a mere ministerial act. "An omission, therefore, to make such an entry, will not render the entire proceedings a nullity. It may be made by the justice at any time, and will, for the purpose of sustaining the proceedings, be regarded as made." Christopher v. Van Liew, 57 Barb. 17, was a case where a justice rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and by mistake in his docket entered a judgment in favor of defendant, and, a transcript thereof being filed and docketed in the county clerk's office, the plaintiff was compelled to pay the judgment. The justice was held liable as for an act of ministerial neglect and carelessness, by which the plaintiff had been directly injured; and it was also held that the justice had the right to correct such a mistake in his docket the moment he discovered it, the error being merely clerical. In Robinson v. Kious, 4 Ohio St. 593, the court holds that the statute, which provides that "upon a verdict the justice must immediately render judgment accordingly, does not make a judgment rendered upon a subsequent day absolutely void, but it makes it irregular, and for such irregularity, when not waived, it is reversible."

The announcement of the conclusion arrived at by the justice is the judgment. The entry of it upon his docket is simply the evidence of the judgment. The petition for rule in case at bar alleges the rendition of the judgment on the 26th day of March, the day of the trial of the case. Both parties litigant knew precisely what the judgment was. There is no dispute about the jurisdiction of the justice, both of the person of defendant and of the subject-matter in controversy.

DUNBRACK v. NEALL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 1, 1904.)

INSURANCE—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—INTEREST OF MORTGAGOR—ACCOUNTING BY MORTGAGEE.

1. By verbal agreement, N. sold to D. certain real estate on March 23, 1896, for $2,500, but the contract was not completed by the payment of $625, cash payment, and execution and delivery of the deed from N. to D., and deed of trust by D. to J. S. N., trustee, to secure the deferred payments, aggregating $1,875, until June 29, 1896; the deeds bearing the first-named date. On the 4th day of June, 1896, N. took an insurance policy on the buildings in her own name for $2,000, and paid the premium thereon. After the completion of the contract, N. offered to assign to D. the insurance policy upon repayment to her by D. of the premium, which D. refused to do. N. then assigned the same, with the assent of the insuring company, to D., and the said company indorsed on the policy, "This policy is hereby transferred and assigned to A. C. Dunbrack with loss, if any, payable to J. S. Neall, trustee for Mary A. Neall, as his interest may appear," which policy was held by J. S. N., trustee. Held, said insurance was for the sole benefit of N., and D. had no interest in said policy.

2. Where a creditor secured by trust deed procured insurance on the trust property for his own benefit, and the premium was paid out of his own money, the trust debtor cannot require the creditor to account to him for money received on account of such insurance.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by A. C. Dunbrack against Mary A. Neall and others. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. W. G. Worley, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. By deed dated the 28th day of March, 1896, Mary A. Neall and James A. Neall, her husband, of Philadelphia, Pa., by J. S. Neall, their attorney in fact, conveyed to A. C. Dunbrack certain parcels of land therein described, being in the town of Parsons, in Tucker county, in consideration of $2,500, of which $625 was paid in cash, and three notes signed by A. C. Dunbrack, bearing even date with the deed, for $625, payable, respectively, on or before the 28th days of March, 1897, 1898, and 1899, and being the deferred installments of purchase money on said property. On the same day said Dunbrack executed a deed of trust to J. S. Neall, trustee, on the same property, to secure the payment of said notes. While the deeds bear date on the 28th of March, the transaction was not really consummated and the deeds delivered until the 29th day of June, 1896. On the 4th day of June, 1896, before the transaction had been completed in writing, Mary A. Neall insured the building on the property so conveyed in the Scottish Union & National Insurance Company for $2,000. After the execution of said deed of conveyance and trust deed, on the 27th of July, 1896, she indorsed on said policy an assignment of the same to A. C. Dunbrack, subject to the consent of the insurance company; and, on the 7th of August following, the insurance company, by its agent, indorsed its consent to said assignment, and at the same time entered thereon the further indorsement: "This policy is hereby transferred and assigned to A. C. Dunbrack with loss, if any, payable to J. S. Neall, trustee for Mary A. Neall, as his interest may appear." On the 18th of May, 1897, the insured building was burned. The trustee, Neall, gave notice to sell the property conveyed by said deed of trust, to be sold on the 18th day of August, 1897. On the 12th day of August, 1897, Dunbrack presented his bill of complaint against Mary A. Neall, J. S. Neall, trustee, and the Scottish Union & National Insurance Company, to the judge of the circuit court of Tucker county, praying an injunction to restrain the trustee from selling the said property on the 18th of August, or any other day, until the further order of the court, and that the trustee be required to give bond as required by law, and that he be required to produce said insurance policy, with a full statement of all steps taken by him to collect the same, and that said insurance company be required, on its part, to answer and set up in said suit why said insurance policy had not been paid by it, and any defense, if any it had, against such payment, and that said company be required to pay the face of said policy, $2,000, and interest thereon, into court, to be paid by it to the said Neall direct upon her said trust deed, and that plaintiff, after being permitted to retain the cost of the suit, might be permitted to pay to said Mary Neall the balance due on said trust deed, if there be any balance then due, and that she then be required to release said trust deed and relieve the said land from the lien thereon, and for general relief.

Plaintiff, in his bill, alleges the assignment by Mrs. Neall to plaintiff with the knowledge and assent of said company, and his own assignment thereof to Trustee Neall as security for said purchase money; that the said policy was delivered by plaintiff to the trustee, who was a nonresident of the state of West Virginia, and a resident of Colorado; and alleged that said insurance policy was necessarily a primary security for said trust debt, and, by every construction of law and equity, and the understanding of parties, in case of destruction of property by fire the same was to be immediately collected and paid upon said debt, and to the relief of the land, and there was no good reason why such collection and application should not be made by the trustee, and that no just defense could be made by the company to making such payment; that, by reason of said $2,000 insurance, plaintiff "was estopped from taking further insurance on said building"; that said trustee, acting through his local attorney, had not collected said policy, nor taken any steps to do so, nor produced the policy, nor allowed plaintiff, in his behalf, to take legal steps for its collection, but, on the contrary, had advertised said land for sale under said trust deed, and that, unless this court of equity would intervene to prevent, the property would be sold at great loss and detriment to plaintiff; that plaintiff was advised that, under the circumstances, a court of equity would intervene and lend its assistance to stop the high-handed outrage, by staying and enjoining the trustee from making sale until he had collected said insurance and applied the proceeds to said debt, or demonstrated by proper legal proceedings that the same was uncollectible, and further he had submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court by executing a proper bond, so that plaintiff might have some assurance that the trust debt would be properly paid to the beneficiary and any balance to plaintiff; and the court, having and taken jurisdiction for this purpose should take such jurisdiction for all purposes, and should in this proceeding require said trustee to produce and file his insurance policy, and require said insurance company to at once make any and all defense it might have to the payment of its liability thereunder, and, if it should appear that no just defense existed, require it to pay the amount at once into court, to be applied to payment of said trust debt, and the plaintiff be permitted to pay the balance to the entire discharge of said debt and relief of said land. The defendants, Mary A. Neall and J. S. Neall, trustee, filed their joint and separate answers, showing that the deed of conveyance and trust deed were delivered on the 29th day of June, 1896, the acknowledgment of the trust deed by Dunbrack bearing that date, and the cash payment of $625 being made on that day; that the policy of insurance was taken by Mary A. Neall on the 4th day of June, while she was uncertain as to whether the sale to Dunbrack would be consummated; that she paid the whole of the premium thereon, and that, when plaintiff complied with the terms of the sale, she, by her agent, offered to assign said insurance policy to plaintiff if he would pay her the premium which she had paid thereon, which plaintiff refused to do; she then set about to get the policy so transferred that, in case of loss of the building, she would be able to receive some of the benefit from her said insurance, and accordingly, by the consent of the company, had the indorsement made and indorsed on said policy, in which condition it was at the time of the fire which destroyed the building; that, after the destruction of the building, respondents made proof of loss, and demanded payment of the insurance company, but the company refused to pay until the trustee should exhaust his remedy under the trust deed by sale of the land, establishing the amount of his loss, if any, as provided in the indorsement on said policy, save and except the sum of $1,000, which the said trustee received and accepted in full settlement of his claim against the said insurance company. The trustee then advertised the land to be sold on the 18th of August, 1897. Respondents denied that it was ever agreed between them and plaintiff that the policy should be taken and held by them as a primary or any other kind of security; that plaintiff refused to pay the premium, and he had no legal or equitable right to have the benefit of the policy, or of any part of it; and denied that they had a contract of understanding with the plaintiff that in case of fire they should collect the amount of the policy and apply it on the purchase money, or that there was any understanding or agreement to that effect, or any other effect, which would relieve plaintiff from the payment of the purchase money due by him; and that the allegations of plaintiff's bill that such an agreement and understanding were entered into were utterly false and untrue; and denied that their insurance being in force prevented plaintiff from taking insurance in his own name; that no action had been instituted upon said policy, because of the provision of said policy that the same should be paid to respondent Neall, trustee, "as his interest may appear," which condition, when met by the demand of said insurance company that his interest could only be made to appear after having exhausted the real estate embraced in the deed of trust, had presented such a question that respondent had not made that risk by entering suit upon the policy; and denied the right of plaintiff to be entertained in this court, and denied every allegation in the bill not admitted in the answer, and prayed that the injunction be dissolved.

The Scottish Union & National Insurance Company filed its answer, admitting that it had issued the policy to Mary A. Neall; that Mary A. Neall offered plaintiff to have said policy assigned to him if he would repay her the premium which she had paid therefor, but he flatly and positively refused to do so, and she did not assign said policy to him; that she then set about to devise some plan whereby she could derive some benefit and advantage from said policy, which by the terms of a condition therein became void when she sold said property; accordingly she, by her agent, informed respondent, through its agents, that she had sold the property, taking a trust deed to secure the unpaid purchase money, and asked that the policy be so transferred that she could have the benefit of it in case of fire, and it was arranged by proper assignment that the loss, if any, should be payable to Neall, trustee for Mary A. Neall, as his interest should appear, all of which was done without having or asking the consent of the plaintiff; and averred that, plaintiff having utterly and absolutely refused to have anything to do with said policy, the same must now stand on the same footing as a policy of insurance taken by a mortgagee for his own and sole benefit, and the plaintiff could have no benefit of said insurance, either against respondent, or as a credit upon the purchase money due by him to Mary A. Neall, and that the adjustment and payment of said policy was wholly a matter between the respondent and Neall and her trustee, and denied that plaintiff had any interest whatever in said policy of insurance; and filed with its answer a copy of agreement of settlement for $1,000 between itself and J. S. Neall, trustee, for Mary A. Neall, as well as a copy of the policy.

On the 15th of December, 1897, the cause came on to be heard upon the bill and the said answers, and general replications thereto, and exhibits filed with the bill and answers, and depositions, and upon a motion to dissolve the injunction; and the court was of opinion that the cause, upon the pleadings and proof, was for the plaintiff, and overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, and was further of the opinion that plaintiff, Dunbrack, was entitled to have the full amount of the insurance policy mentioned in the proceedings applied to and set off against the purchase money and to the defendant Mary A. Neall; that the assignment of said policy by said company to Neall, trustee, and the settlement made by the company with said trustee was without the plaintiff's authority, and not binding upon him; that, by reason of the admission and ratification of such compromise by the defendant Mary A. Neall, she was bound by such compromise, so far as plaintiff was concerned, but that she would be entitled to recover from the plaintiff the balance of said purchase money, after deducting the amount of said insurance policy, with its proper interest, less any sum paid for such policy by said Mary A. Neall, with its proper interest, and any proper costs incurred by her in collecting the debt, said costs to include any advertisements of sale under the deed of trust, but no commissions for making sale, no sale having been made, and, in account stated, the plaintiff would be entitled to the costs of this suit; and that an order of reference should be had in the cause to state an account according to the opinion of the court set forth in the order; and referred the cause to one of the commissioners to report accordingly.

The defendants tendered a bill of review on the 23th of November, 1898, which was rejected. The commissioner filed his report, dated the 7th day of March, 1898, to which report Mary A. Neall and J. S. Neall, trustee, filed their six several exceptions: First, "because no report whatever, should be made in this cause"; because the insurance policy became mortgagee's insurance after the sale to Dunbrack and the assignment of the policy, and payable to Neall, trustee, as his interest should appear as was clearly shown by the evidence taken before the commissioner, and that Dunbrack was not entitled to have the benefit thereof, but that the insurance company was entitled to be substituted to the lien of Mary A. Neall to the extent of the payment made by it to her on said policy; because, by the evidence of Dunbrack himself, he was not entitled to any benefit of said policy, because he never paid for the same, never had it in possession, and was not entitled to it until he had repaid the premium, and, not having repaid the premium at the time of the loss, was not entitled to have the possession of it, or receive any of the benefit thereof; because the proposed assignment of said insurance policy to Dunbrack was entirely conditional and contingent upon his repayment of the premium to Mrs. Neall, which he never did; and because the commissioner allowed no compensation whatever to the trustee, Neall, for his services.

On the 28th day of November the cause was brought on to be heard upon the papers, orders, decrees, and report of the commissioner, and the exceptions thereto, the depositions of witnesses, and exception of the plaintiff to the reading of the deposition of F. C. Carroll, when all exceptions to the report were overruled, and the exception to the reading and excluding of the deposition of F. C. Carroll was sustained, and the commissioner's report in all other respects confirmed; and it appearing from the report of the commissioner, Conley, that there was a balance due Mary A. Neall on account of her vendor's lien from the plaintiff, Dunbrack, of the sum of $31.30, after giving Dunbrack credit as in the report set forth, which report shows that he was credited with the whole amount of the policy, $2,000, it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the vendor's lien of said Mary A. Neall against the property was fully satisfied, and it perpetuated the injunction; but which decree was without prejudice to the rights of Mary A. Neall or her trustee against the defendant insurance company, if any such rights she might have, and the right to proceed against the same by any proper proceedings. From which decree said Mary A. Neall appealed.

Was the decree of December 15, 1897, appealable? This decree failed to adjudicate the principal issue made by the allegations of the bill, viz., the liability of the insurance company on the policy for $2,000; the prayer of the bill being that the said company be required to pay the amount of the policy, with interest thereon, into court, and that the same be paid to the defendant Mary Neall upon her said trust debt. In Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 215, the syllabus is as follows: "(1) The provision of the statute authorizing appeals to this court in chancery causes, wherein there is a decree 'adjudicating the principles of the cause,' authorizes such appeal only where the decree appealed from adjudicates all the controversies between the parties raised by the pleadings or otherwise in the cause. (2) Where the record in a cause shows that the pleadings present two or more controversies between the plaintiff and the different defendants, only one of which was passed upon by the circuit court, and the others left undecided, this court will dismiss the appeal, as having been improvidently awarded." The case of Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. 914, is to the same effect. See, also, Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 673, 2 S. E. 863. And in the case of Kanawha Lodge v. Swann, 37 W. Va. 176, 16 S. E. 462 (syll. point 3), it is held: "Interlocutory decrees cannot be appealed from, except in cases provided for in section 1, c. 135, of the Code of 1899; and an order referring the cause to a commissioner in chancery to make an account is, in general, not an appealable decree." The decree of December 15, 1897, being an interlocutory decree, the rejection of the bill of review tendered by defendant becomes immaterial.

The exception taken by plaintiff to the deposition of F. C. Carroll, as being irrelevant and improper, under section 85, c. 130, Code 1899, was improperly sustained by the court, and should have been overruled, and the deposition read. The deposition was taken before the commissioner before the making of his report, and was concerning a matter not adjudicated in said decree of December 15th, and did not come within the purview of said section 85. Plaintiff's own deposition fails to support the allegations of his bill. He states that he thinks it was in July, 1897, he and Mr. Scott were talking over the matter, and Scott calculated the interest and principal of the notes due Mrs. Neall to amount to $2,018 and some cents; that he went over and got Mr. Maxwell to count it up, and he made it $2,022.80; that he then offered Maxwell the $2,000 policy, or what interest witness had in it, and counted him out the $22.80, the amount claimed by Mr. Maxwell that was due to Mrs. Neall. On cross-examination he stated that he didn't remember of ever seeing the insurance policy; never had possession of it; that he knew nothing of Mrs. Neall assigning the same to him, only what Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Keim, the agent of the company, told him; that Mr. Keim told him that it was made over to him in his favor, and witness told Mr. Maxwell what Keim said, and Maxwell said he didn't think it was any use, unless witness held the policy and paid for it; that he had not the money then to pay for it, and told Maxwell he would try and raise the money, and send for it, but failed to do so. He states also that he executed the deed of trust and made the cash payment, he thinks, on the same day. The date of the acknowledgment of the deed of trust is the 20th day of June, 1896. Witness F. C. Carroll testifies that he was the adjuster of the Scottish Union & National Insurance Company employed to adjust the loss; that Dunbrack told witness that Maxwell had asked him to pay this premium, but that he refused to do it, as he did not feel able to carry any insurance; that he also said that, if he wanted any insurance, he would take it out himself, or something to that effect; that Maxwell had told him that unless he paid the premium he was to receive no benefits from the insurance, and that he told witness in the same conversation that he had nothing to do with witness, and that his attorney had advised him that he could make Neall put his building back, and he should look to Mr. Neall, and not to the insurance company; that he did not intimate to witness during all the conversation that he had any contract with Mrs. Neall, or J. S. Neall, trustee, by which he was to have any benefit from the said insurance policy. Witness states that at two different times after the loss occurred he was at Parsons, and on both occasions visited Mr. Dunbrack, and had quite a long conversation with him, and that during the whole of either conversation he made no claim or intimation that he had any claim against the Scottish Union & National Insurance Company. On the contrary, he admitted that he did not know that the policy was in force at the time of the fire, and stated to others after the fire that he had no insurance; repeatedly saying that he had nothing whatever to do with witness or the company that he represented. W. B. Maxwell testified that he acted as agent for Mrs. Neall in selling the property to Dunbrack; that on or about the 28th of March he had a verbal contract with Dunbrack to sell him the property on the terms set out in the deed, but that he failed to make the cash payment until about the 29th of June; that on the 4th of June he secured for Mrs. Neall the insurance policy in controversy; that some days afterwards, by the direction of either Mr. or Mrs. Neall, he offered Dunbrack to have the said insurance policy assigned to him if he would repay Mrs. Neall the premium paid by her; he flatly refused to pay this premium, and said the matter did not affect him; that he then said to him, if he did not repay her the premium, that he would have the policy so assigned as to operate for Mrs. Neall's benefit in case of loss, and he would not get any benefit from it, and accordingly, at his advice, the policy was assigned as he told Dunbrack it would be; that Dunbrack never at any time offered or promised to pay the premium; on the contrary, he refused to do so. Mr. Dunbrack was again put on the stand, and contradicted what Mr. Maxwell said about his refusing to pay for the policy, and says he went to Mr. Keim to have the property insured, and he informed him that Mrs. Neall had the property insured, and wouldn't give two policies on the same property. "When I came back I told Mr. Maxwell about it, and he told me, yes, that was right—he had—but said, if I would raise him the money, he would have it turned over to me. I told him then I hadn't the money to spare, but, as soon as I could, I would do so. He at this time promised to have it assigned over to me as soon as I raised him the money." At the time this insurance policy was taken out by Mrs. Neall, the contract between her and plaintiff had not been consummated, and she took out the insurance purely on her own account and in her own name; and after the contract was completed, and the deed of conveyance delivered, and also the deed of trust, and after the refusal of plaintiff to repay to her the premium on the insurance and take an assignment of the policy, she took steps to have the same by assignment, and by the action of the company to place her in position to receive the benefit of the policy as a mortgagee, in case of fire, as she had been divested of the legal title to the property, and could only hold insurance as a mortgagee. In section 449, 2 May on Insurance, it is said: "Where a mortgagee insures his own interest without any agreement between him and the mortgagor, the latter has no claim to have any portion of the loss recovered applied to the discharge of his debt." Olting McIntire v. Plaisted, 68 Me. 363. In last-named case, at page 365, in the opinion, it is said: "It is well settled that a mortgagor cannot require a mortgagee to account to him for money received for insurance where there is no contract between them to that effect, and the insurance was procured by the mortgagee for his own benefit, and the premium was paid out of his own money." Olting Oushing v. Thompson, 34 Me. 496; White v. Brown, 2 Osh. 412; King v. Insurance Company, 7 Osh. 1, 54 Am. Dec. 683. Also in Insurance Company v. Woodbury, 45 Me. 447, it is held: "If a mortgagee insures his own interest without any agreement between him and the mortgagor therefor, and a loss occurs, the mortgagor is not entitled to any part of the sum paid upon such loss, to be applied to the discharge or reduction of his mortgage debt." See, also, Carpenter v. Insurance Company, 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. Ed. 1044. Plaintiff having utterly failed to maintain the allegations of his bill, he clearly had no interest in the policy of insurance.

The decree of the circuit court must be reversed, and this court, proceeding to make such decree as to the circuit court should have rendered, will reverse the decree, dissolve the injunction, and dismiss the plaintiff's bill.

FEELY v. BRYAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 18, 1903.)

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—PREFERENCE—VALIDITY.

1. Any writing charging a debt on property, though not a formal mortgage, is an equitable mortgage or lien.

2. Under section 2, c. 74, Code 1899, if one lend money to a solvent person, with the agreement that a mortgage is to be made on certain property to secure the loan, and later, when insolvent, the borrower makes the mortgage, it is not a good preference as to other debts existing at the date of the mortgage.

3. A transfer or charge by an insolvent debtor, free from actual fraudulent intent as to creditors, preferring a particular debt, is not, as to debts contracted after its recordation, a preference, contrary to section 2, c. 74, Code 1899.

4. In a suit to impeach a preference made contrary to section 2, c. 74, Code 1899, any creditor filing his demand for allowance before a commissioner under a reference to ascertain the insolvent's debts thereby unites in the attack upon the unlawful preference, and is entitled to share in the insolvent's estate.

5. Several creditors with separate demands attack a mortgage as a preference condemned by section 2, c. 74, Code 1899, and a decree adjudges the property to be for the benefit of all the insolvent's creditors, and decrees out of it particular sums to the several creditors. These sums cannot be added to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court for an appeal by the creditor preferred by such mortgage.

Dent, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by W. A. Feely against S. J. Bryan and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

J. P. Scott, for appellant. Cunningham & Stallings, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Bryan and Gillespie had a drug store in Tucker county, and Bryan purchased Gillespie's interest, and to pay for it Bryan, on June 22, 1900, borrowed $1,100 of Feely upon the agreement that Bryan was to execute a deed of trust or mortgage on the drug store to secure Feely. No mortgage was at the time given, but on October 27, 1900, Bryan made a sealed instrument reciting that he was indebted to Feely in the sum of $1,100, and saying, "and for the security of said sum I do hereby mortgage and assign" to the said W. A. Feely a soda fountain, some bottles, and the stock of drugs. This obligation was antedated to June 22d. It was acknowledged and recorded October 27th. On February 19, 1901, the drug store stock was levied upon under three executions in favor of Cunningham & Stallings, the S. Wilson Cigar Company, and O. M. Haines for several debts, whereupon Feely obtained an injunction restraining sale under the executions. The court appointed a receiver, and he sold the stock at $700, and the fund is in court to abide its order. In this suit Cunningham & Stallings, the cigar company, and Haines filed answers, averring that, when Bryan made the mortgage to Feely, Bryan was insolvent, and therefore it operated for the benefit of all his creditors, under section 2, c. 74, Code 1899. Upon the evidence the court held that Bryan was insolvent at the time of making the mortgage, and sent the case to a commissioner to ascertain all debts of Bryan and fix their shares in the fund. He reported a large number of debts, among them debts contracted by Bryan after the loan and after the mortgage. He also reported Bryan was insolvent. Feely excepted to the finding of Bryan's insolvency, and because debts of Haines & Co., Coffman, and James Clark Distilling Company were reported to share in the fund; those debts arising after the recordation of the mortgage. The court decreed that all the debts share pro rata in the fund, and Feely appeals.

Counsel contends that the obligation executed by Bryan to Feely is nondescript, contains no words of grant like a deed of trust, and cannot operate as a lien or mortgage. Under the principle often stated that every express agreement in writing showing intent to make some particular property, real or personal, security for a debt, or assigning or promising to assign it as such security, is an equitable lien or mortgage, this instrument so operates. Fid. Ins. Co. v. Railroad, 33 W. Va. 761, 11 S. E. 58; 2 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 436, 441. I think the evidence clearly shows that the finding of the commissioner and judge of the fact that Bryan was insolvent on the date when the equitable mortgage was executed is correct. But he was not at the date of the loan, at which time he agreed to give a mortgage. What is the effect of this agreement afterwards executed by the mortgage? Does it make the mortgage stand as if made at the date of the loan? If it does, then it is a lawful preference, even under section 2, c. 74, Code 1899, as a mortgage given at the time of a loan is not a preference condemned by it. I admit the rule suggested by counsel that for some purposes equity regards that as done which is agreed to be done, and on this principle the law is that an agreement to give a mortgage for a valid debt is treated in equity as a mortgage. 1 Jones on Mortg. § 163. But we are dealing with a statute, and we must go by it. It says that if a loan be made, or other debt be "contracted at the time such transfer or charge was made," it is not a preference contrary to the statute, but a valid charge. The requirement in letter is that the loan and mortgage must be at the same time. A loan was made under agreement to secure it by mortgage, and was afterwards executed. The act declared that mortgages made in contemplation of insolvency, with the design to prefer one creditor over another, should operate for the benefit of all, and provided that the act should not affect a mortgage to "secure a debt or liability created simultaneously with such mortgage." It was held that the mortgage had no preference, because not made simultaneously with the creation of the debt. Darnell v. Lewis, 94 Ky. 455, 22 S. E. 843. See Bank v. Hunt, 11 Wall. 391, 20 L. Ed. 190. The court said the language means that the execution of the mortgage and the creation of the debt must be simultaneous. The promise to execute a mortgage in future to secure a debt that day made is not a simultaneous act. Besides, to substitute the promise for the act of executing the mortgage would allow a debtor, in contemplation of insolvency, to make the preference that it was the object of the statute to prevent. See Ahern v. White, 89 Md. 409. I confess that my first impression was that, as the loan bettered the estate of Bryan, and as a mortgage would have been good if executed when the loan was made, and as, before any creditor had fixed lien by execution on Bryan's property, the mortgage was executed, it ought to be good. But, first, there is the letter of the act requiring the loan and mortgage to be contemporaneous; and, second, any other construction would open wide the door to defeat the good designed by the statute by allowing oral evidence of a promise to make a mortgage. It gives fraud and perjury a chance to do their work. We must give the act a construction which will best protect the business world, and it is apparent that safety to business will be promoted by the construction we give. Therefore we hold that said mortgage has no preference over other debts. But we hold the decree erroneous in allowing debts not existing at the date of Feely's mortgage, because the statute says that the insolvent's property shall go pro rata to "all the debts of such insolvent existing at the time such transfer or charge is made." What possible equity can a subsequent creditor have to complain of the mortgage, unless kept off the record? All the debts, so far as the report shows, are dated after the mortgage; but perhaps and likely some of the judgments were on debts antedating the mortgage. The answer alleging they antedated the mortgage was denied.

It is said that there is error in the decree in that it decreed shares in the fund to people who did not attack the mortgage. Only three creditors filed an answer attacking the mortgage, but a number of others were reported as creditors of Bryan by the commissioner. They did not otherwise appear. But it has been held that, when a case is before a commissioner to ascertain debts, a creditor may there informally present his claim, though not a formal party, and thereby he becomes an informal party. He thereby asks relief, and he can appeal. Hogg's Eq. Prin. 614; Wilson v. Carrico, 50 W. Va. 336, 40 S. E. 489; Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, 30 S. E. 102; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 656. Observe that the statute allows him to come in at any time before final decree. By so coming in without petition he subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and will by decree be made to share the burden of costs, whether he agrees to do so or not. So coming in is a sufficient attack on the preference.

The answer attacking the mortgage was filed more than four months after the recordation of the mortgage, and was thus too late; but there was no exception to that matter of it attacking the mortgage. The answer makes no parties, and is not formal as an answer calling for affirmative relief, yet is substantially sufficient as such and, had there been a plea of limitation to that matter of it, or an exception, it would have been error to decree on that matter.

Having come to the conclusion that there is reversible error, I run against the question of jurisdiction, as we must have jurisdiction to justify a reversal. No one of the creditors except Feely gets a sum out of the fund amounting to $100. Added, they amount to more than that sum. Can they be added together for jurisdiction? The debts are distinct, have no unity; but combined they take from Feely more than the sum of $100. "Several and separate interests of different appellees cannot be united so as to make up the jurisdictional amount, where such parties could not have united their interests if a recovery had been had against them. Neither codefendants nor coplaintiffs can unite their separate and distinct interests for the purpose of giving appellate jurisdiction." "Separate judgments cannot be added to give jurisdiction. Though the legal question may be the same, the judgments are distinct." 2 Cyc. 560, 567; Henderson v. Wadsworth, 115 U. S. 276, 6 Sup. Ct. 40, 29 L. Ed. 377. Henderson v. Wadsworth applies the rule to both sides. "In suits to enforce separate liens it is the several amounts of each claim, not the aggregate sum of all in one suit, which determine the jurisdictional amount. The appellate court cannot acquire jurisdiction by uniting on an appeal two judgments wholly separate and distinct." 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 725. Upon these principles it was held that if several claiming under a trust deed suing the trustee for a settlement obtain a decree directing him to pay each a separate sum, where the decree failed to charge him with an item over $100, there was no jurisdiction for appeal though the sums would aggregate over $100. Fleishman's Adm'r v. Fleishman, 34 W. Va. 342, 12 S. E. 713. Several judgment creditors brought a suit to sell land to pay them, which was dismissed, and they were refused right to add their judgments. Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Grat. 167. If the landowner had appealed in case the judgments had been decreed against his land, the same result would have followed. Wherein is this case otherwise? True, several hundred dollars is taken from Feely, but each creditor has taken his own separate sum from him. It is a contest between him and that creditor as to that sum. The suggestion contra is that it is a fund which is the bone of contention. So would it be as to the land against which several judgments are decreed. In Bank v. Stout, 113 U. S. 684, 5 Sup. Ct. 695, 28 L. Ed. 1152, a bank claimed a fund over the jurisdictional amount, and several creditors sued to subject the fund, and several debts were decreed to be paid out of it. On appeal by the bank it was held that it could not combine the several amounts decreed against the fund in order to give appellate jurisdiction. There, as here, the bank denied liability for the fund, claimed it as its own, and the debts decreed out of it damaged it more than the jurisdictional sum if added. The court said: "This suit was not for the whole fund, but only for the complainant's pro rata share. After the suit was begun, the intervening creditors were allowed to come in each for his separate share of the assets. On their intervention the case stood precisely as it would if each creditor had brought a separate suit for his separate share of the fund. The decree in favor of the several creditors has precisely the same effect, for the purposes of an appeal, that it would have had if rendered in such separate suits." In Seaver v. Bigelow, 5 Wall. 208, 18 L. Ed. 595, several creditors with separate debts sought to set aside a deed as fraudulent, and their bill was dismissed, and the court said they had separate demands which could not be added. In Schwed v. Smith, 106 U. S. 188, 1 Sup. Ct. 221, 27 L. Ed. 156, creditors sued to set aside a judgment and subject a fund realized by execution under it, and the fund was by decree taken from the party claiming under the judgment. On appeal he was not allowed to aggregate the several sums decreed against the fund for jurisdiction. That is this case. In Gibson v. Shufelt, 122 U. S. 84, 7 Sup. Ct. 1066, 30 L. Ed. 1063, will be found a clear discussion of this subject, reviewing and discriminating Supreme Court cases. A debtor assigned property to secure a preferred debt of more than $5,000, and then for creditors generally, and two of his creditors sued in separate suits to set aside the preference, and a decree gave one of the creditors over $5,000 and to the other a less sum. On appeal by the preferred creditor it was held that there was no jurisdiction for him as to the party decreed less than $5,000, but as to the other there was. So, in Rich v. Lambert, 12 How. 347, 18 L. Ed. 1017, a libel was filed by several cargo owners against a vessel, and various sums decreed against it; some more, some less, than $2,000, but aggregating $10,000. The appeal by the shipowner was dismissed as to those appellees decreed less than the amount for jurisdiction, because no single libellant was decreed the jurisdictional amount. So, in Oliver v. Alexander, 6 Pet. 143, 8 L. Ed. 349, where a number of seamen filed a libel against a vessel, and each was decreed a less sum than required for jurisdiction, the case was dismissed, and an addition of the sums refused. It was said that, although the libels were in form joint, yet the decrees were several. So, under our statute involved in this case any number of creditors may unite in a suit to attack a preference; still that does not unify debts that are separate. The joint suit is the only remedy—only procedure—to avoid multiplicity of suits and accumulation of costs. In Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Waterman, 106 U. S. 235, 1 Sup. Ct. 181, 27 L. Ed. 115, a mortgage was foreclosed on a railroad, and the purchasers took it subject to debts of intervening creditors, and appealed from a decree ordering them to pay various sums amounting in all over the amount for jurisdiction, and the appeal was dismissed as to those who had not sums decreed up to that amount. So, in Has- sall v. Wilcox, 115 U. S. 598, 6 Sup. Ct. 189, 29 L. Ed. 504, a like decision was made where a trustee in a railroad mortgage appealed from a decree in favor of several creditors. The appeal was dismissed as to those recovering less than the jurisdictional sum, and retained as to those recovering more. In Chamberlin v. Browning, 177 U. S. 605, 20 Sup. Ct. 820, 44 L. Ed. 906, creditors of Scott claiming under assignment from him sought to prevent attaching creditors from enforcing their attachments, and, failing, appealed; but it was held that, as the relief sought against the attaching creditors was "the defeat of distinct and separate claims of each attaching creditor so far as it affected the real estate of Scott, and as no defendant was asserting a claim which aggregated the amount required to confer jurisdiction upon this court, the case is dismissed for want of jurisdiction." These cases show that each debt is separate, not added. For these reasons we hold that there is no jurisdiction to reverse the decree, though there is error in it. I might have avoided discussion of other matters than jurisdiction had this question occurred to me before writing upon them; but as it is written, though it may be thought to be, for want of jurisdiction, not binding authority, yet the other points decided reflect the opinion of all the members of the court, and therefore will be published.

DENT, J. (dissenting). The question in controversy here and in the circuit court between Feely and the defendants was as to whether Feely's debt of $1,100 was entitled to priority over the other debts against the estate of S. J. Bryan. As to the amount and validity of the several debts there was no question, and there was no controversy in regard thereto. The defendants, however, attacked the plaintiff's deed of trust as a fraudulent preference under section 2, c. 74, of the Code of 1899. The circuit court so held, and the plaintiff appeals.

Said section 2 provides that such fraudulent preference "shall be taken to be for the benefit of all creditors of such debtor," thus making it a common source of title to all of them. In the 1st Ed. Plead. & Prac. 721, the law is properly stated to be "where several parties sue jointly for the recovery of money or property claiming under one common right, and the adverse party is wholly unaffected by the manner in which it may be apportioned in case of recovery, it is the aggregate sum of their several claims which determines the amount in controversy." In the present case Feely is wholly unaffected by the manner in which the fund is proportioned among the creditors in case he is defeated. He claims the whole thereof by virtue of his trust deed, and they claim his trust deed is a fraudulent preference as to them, and they, under the statute, are entitled to the common benefit thereof. The statute permits and compels them to sue jointly, not as a matter of convenience, but because it confers upon them a common benefit and a joint interest. A creditor may not sue separately to get the benefit of a fraudulent preference, as he may sue to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, but his suit is for the common or joint benefit of all creditors. The validity of the preference is the joint matter of controversy, and, in so far as the person preferred is concerned, is the amount of his lien, and, so far as the other or attacking creditors are concerned, is the joint amount of their debts if they are less than sufficient to cover such preference, and, if more than sufficient, then the preference determines the amount in controversy. The true rule is laid down in 2 Cyc. 569: "Where several claim under the same title, the validity of which title is necessarily involved in the determination of the cause, the appellate court will have jurisdiction notwithstanding the individual claim of no one of the plaintiffs exceeds the jurisdictional amount, if the whole amount involved is sufficient. And if the appellees' right to sue and stand in judgment against appellants in a contract by the terms of which contract more than the jurisdictional amount is involved, is denied by appellants, this constitutes the matter in dispute. And where the amount decreed against appellant consists of several sums in favor of various appellees, no one of which sums would come within the jurisdictional amount, and the aggregate of which amount is in excess of the jurisdictional limit, it is held the defendant may appeal." The amount in controversy here is undoubtedly the amount of Feely's preferred lien, its validity as a preference being assailed by those who are jointly interested in its overthrow, and who, if they succeed, are entitled to share in it as a common source of title. The statute does not avoid it, but holds it to be for the joint benefit of all the creditors. Kuner v. O'Neill, 39 W. Va. 515, 20 S. E. 589; Argand Refining Company v. Quinn, 39 W. Va. 535, 20 S. E. 576; Wolf v. McGugin, 37 W. Va. 552, 16 S. E. 797.

On Rehearing.

BRANNON, J. Upon rehearing the question of jurisdiction for this appeal has been carefully reconsidered, but we are unable to change the decision that there is no jurisdiction for the appeal. Feely's attorney seems to admit that, if the litigation is not one between Feely and Bryan, there is no jurisdiction, and he therefore seeks to sustain the position that the contest is only between them, not one between the creditors of Bryan; and, assuming this premise, he would apply the ordinary rule between plaintiff and defendant in money demand—in other words, between Feely, creditor, and Bryan, debtor—and say that it is the amount claimed by a plaintiff creditor against a defendant debtor which gives jurisdiction, not what the plaintiff recovers. But this premise is not correct. This is not a suit between Feely and Bryan. Bryan makes no contention against Feely. There is no issue between them. The contest is purely one between conflicting creditors of Bryan. They fight for the bone. Some of those creditors levied executions on the chattels on which Feely claimed a mortgage, and he filed an injunction against those executions, based on his mortgage; and those creditors answer, and seek to defeat the mortgage, or at least defeat its preference of Feely's debt, and get their proportions. This shows it to be a litigation between the creditors.

I think the authorities cited in the first opinion ample to deny jurisdiction, but I will add some further ones. A boat of the B. & O. R. R. Co. collided with a barge, and the owners of the barge and its cargo sued the boat, and one sum was decreed the owner of the barge, another to the owner of the cargo. The court held that the owner of the boat could not add the two recoveries for jurisdiction. Ex parte Baltimore & O. Co., 106 U. S. 5, 1 Sup. Ct. 35, 27 L. Ed. 78. The distinction between cases where there may and may not be aggregation of sums for jurisdiction is drawn in that case. Suppose any one of the creditors in this case had been denied his debt. He could not appeal. Neither could his adversary. The right ought to be mutual. 2 Cyc. 568; Tupper v. Wise, 110 U. S. 398, 4 Sup. Ct. 26, 28 L. Ed. 189; Hawley v. Fairbanks, 108 U. S. 544, 2 Sup. Ct. 848, 27 L. Ed. 820. In 2 Cyc. 569, we find that: "Where several claim under the same title, the validity of which title is necessarily involved, the appellate court will have jurisdiction, notwithstanding the individual claim of no one of the plaintiffs exceed the jurisdictional amount, if the whole amount involved is sufficient." That does not apply in this case. That is where the plaintiffs under a common or collective right sue, as in the case of distributees suing for their portions of the personal estate of a decedent. Shields v. Thomas, 17 How. 3, 15 L. Ed. 93. Where there is a common demand by several by one and the same title, and the sum recovered goes according to their several rights in distribution, and the adverse party is not interested in the distribution, that is the case. But does that apply to a case where different persons are claiming different debts on different grounds, each of them being adverse to the party a several ground? "Where several plaintiffs claim under the same title, and the determination of the cause involves the validity of that title, and the whole amount exceeds $5,000, this court has jurisdiction as to all such plaintiffs, though the claim of none exceeds $5,000; but where the matters in dispute are separate and distinct, and are joined in one suit for convenience or economy, the rule is the reverse as to claims not exceeding $5,000." N. O. Pacific v. Parker, 143 U. S. 42, 12 Sup. Ct. 364, 36 L. Ed. 66. In the case of preferences our statute, for convenience and economy, to end all claims in one suit, allows different creditors to use one suit for relief, however diverse their claims may be; but that is matter of remedy, and does not show that they claim under one and the same title. In this case the debts were separate, not born of and supported by a common title. The creditors claimed against and over Feely's mortgage. That mortgage did not originate or sustain their rights. And does not Fleshman's Adm'r v. Fleshman, 34 W. Va. 342, 12 S. E. 713, stand contrary to the above citation from 2 Cyc.? In this case each creditor's debt aggrieved Feely only to its amount, and that, too, separately. Each creditor took from the fund only his amount. Feely does lose more than $100. So does the judgment debtor lose his land when divers judgments, each under $100, are decreed against it. So the party charged to be a fraudulent vendee. He could not aggregate the debts decreed against him. If he has an appeal, it is not on account of amount, but because the case involves title to land. If there be a suit to annul a fraudulent conveyance, and divers debts are decreed, and one creditor appeals, and succeeds in reversal, it does not affect the decree as to other creditors not appealing, because they are separate debts. In this case the sums decreed to the creditors were not decreed collectively, or because of a common right. Some cases may be found to the contrary. We do not see that Hicks v. Roanoke, 94 Va. 741, 27 S. E. 596, is. That was an appeal by a trustee representing a fund. The whole was in him, though afterwards to be distributed. Freeman v. Dawson, 110 U. S. 264, 4 Sup. Ct. 94, 28 L. Ed. 141. The case of Winchester v. Colfelt, 27 Grat. 777, adds the amounts decreed against the debtor for jurisdiction, but in the later case of Williams' Adm'r v. Clark's Representatives, 93 Va. 690, 25 S. E. 1013, the opinion, whilst following that case, condemns it as unsound, and approves Schwed v. Smith, 106 U. S. 183, 1 Sup. Ct. 221, 27 L. Ed. 156, cited in the first opinion.

ACQUIRED TITLE—BONA FIDE PUR-CHASER—NOTICE.

1. Practical construction of contracts is that given to agreements by the parties themselves by acts subsequently done with reference to the contracts. To such exposition of contracts the courts pay high regard, and will effectuate it if they can do so consistently with the rules of law.

2. If one conveys land with general warranty, which at the time he does not own, or the title to which is defective, but he afterwards acquires good title to the same, such acquisition inures to the benefit of his grantee.

3. Where a subsequent purchaser has actual notice that the property in question was incumbered or affected, he is charged constructively with notice of all of the facts and instruments, to the knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry into the incumbrance or other circumstances affecting the property, of which he had notice.

4. One who claims the protection of a court of equity as a bona fide purchaser must show that he had acquired the legal title before notice or knowledge of facts equivalent to notice.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by E. W. Clark and others against G. W. Lambert and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. C. & B. McClaugherty and Flournoy, Price & Smith, for appellants. A. W. Reynolds and J. S. Clark, for appellees.

MILLER, J. Appellant George W. Lambert appeals from a final decree made and entered against him and David G. Sayers by the circuit court of McDowell county on the 12th day of December, 1901, in the chancery cause of E. W. Clark and others, trustees, against them. The cause was formerly in in this court upon an appeal (Clark et al. v. Sayers et al., 48 W. Va. 33, 35 S. E. 882), and the decrees then appealed from were reversed, without prejudice to either party; and the cause was remanded to the circuit court, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings and proof in accordance with the truth, that there might be a fair and final determination of the controversy between the litigants.

The decree complained of here is, in part, that the deed from defendant D. G. Sayers to the defendant George W. Lambert, bearing date of the 24th day of November, 1891, conveying one-third undivided interest in the tract of 3,226 acres of land referred to in the cause, be set aside and annulled as fraudulent, and as a cloud upon the title of plaintiffs to said tract of 3,226 acres of land; that the estoppel arising from the covenants contained in the deed from the defendant D. G. Sayers and others to Joseph I. Doran, dated November 17, 1882, referred to in the cause, be enforced against said D. G. Sayers; that said Sayers shall convey by deed to the plaintiffs, or to such person or corporation as they shall direct, all of the title to one-third undivided interest of the said tract of 3,226 acres of land, the title to which was derived by compromise, purchase, and conveyance from the heirs of Joseph Jackson, Jr.; and that said Sayers and Lambert be perpetually enjoined from asserting or disposing of their claims of title to one-third of said 3,226 acres of land under the said compromise and conveyance from the heirs of Joseph Jackson, Jr., and under the said deed from Sayers to Lambert.

stated, are as follows: By patent of the commonwealth of Virginia, bearing date on the 1st day of December, 1854, there was granted unto George W. G. Brown, Samuel L. Graham, and Joseph Jackson, Jr., a certain tract of land, containing 3,226 acres, lying in Tazewell county, Va. (now McDowell county, W. Va.), on the waters of Sand Lick creek, and on the waters of Spice creek, on the Laurel branch and other small branches, but mostly on Sand Lick creek, all being waters of Tug river, adjoining a tract of Wm. P. Cecil of 662 acres, a tract of James B. Harman of 150 acres, and adjoining a survey of James B. Harman of 131 acres, which tract is bounded as follows: Beginning at two chestnut oaks by a cliff of rocks on the east side of Sand Lick ridge, about 20 yards from the top of said ridge on Spice waters, a corner of Wm. P. Cecil's 662-acre tract, etc. No partition of this tract of land appears to have ever been made by and between the said patentees thereof; but the land was entered on the landbooks, and charged with the taxes thereon in their several and respective names, as follows, to wit, 1,075 acres thereof being charged to each, and assessed with the taxes thereon in his individual name. By conveyances subsequent to said patent, the title of the Brown undivided third interest in said land became vested in Mary Ladd, and the Graham undivided third interest became vested in Joseph Mullins. The land was entered on the landbook, and charged with taxes thereon as follows: Mary Ladd, 1,075 acres; Joseph Mullins, 1,075 acres; and Joseph Jackson, Jr., 1,075 acres.

The Mary Ladd 1,075-acre part was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon, and sold to said D. G. Sayers. The clerk of the county court of said county of McDowell, by his deed bearing date on the 17th day of September, 1881, executed and delivered to said D. G. Sayers (by the name of David G. Sayers) a deed in which it is, among other things, recited that on the 6th day of November, 1877, at a sale of the real estate theretofore returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes due thereon in the said county of McDowell, said Sayers became the purchaser of a tract of land of 1,075 acres, being one undivided one-third part of 3,225 acres in said county which formerly belonged to, and was returned delinquent in the name of, Mary Ladd, for the nonpayment of the taxes due thereon for the year 1876. The description of the land as given in the said deed is the same as that contained in the patent hereinbefore recited. The deed further recites that the tract of land as described and bounded contains in all 3,226 acres, of which 1,075 acres, being the one undivided third part thereof, was sold and thereby conveyed, be the same more or less. Said deed is recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 353, in the office of the clerk of the county court of said county.

By his deed, bearing date on the 22d day of September, 1881, similar in form to the above-mentioned deed, except as to the name of the delinquent owner designated therein, the said clerk also conveyed to said Sayers another tract of 1,075 acres, which formerly belonged to, and was returned delinquent in the name of, Joseph Mullins, for the nonpayment of the taxes due thereon for the year 1878, and was purchased by said Sayers at a sale thereof for said taxes on the 4th day of November, 1879. This deed is also recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 355. The entire tract of land is bounded therein, and described as containing in all 3,225 acres, of which 1,075 acres, being the one undivided one-third part thereof, was sold as aforesaid, and thereby conveyed to Sayers. By deed executed by David G. Sayers and wife, Henry Harrison and wife, and John Graham, Jr., to Joseph I. Doran, bearing date on the 27th day of October, 1881, the grantors therein conveyed unto Doran three several tracts of land situated in McDowell county, on the dividing ridge, Horsepen creek, and Big creek, one of them containing 820 acres, being the same tract of land conveyed by the clerk of the county court of McDowell county to Sayers by deed dated August 31, 1881, and recorded in McDowell county in Deed Book No. 5, at page 335; one other of them containing 820 acres, being the same land which the said clerk, by deed dated September 1, 1881, recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 332, granted and conveyed unto said Sayers; and the other of them, containing 1,075 acres, being an undivided one-third part of said tract of 3,225 acres, and being the same tract of land which the clerk as aforesaid, by deed dated September 22, 1881, recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 355, granted and conveyed to Sayers. The deed then says: "And the said David G. Sayers has heretofore sold an undivided moiety or half part of said three tracts of land to said Henry Harrison, and the said David G. Sayers and Henry Harrison, in and by a certain instrument of writing bearing date the 27th day of August, 1881, agreed to sell said three tracts of land to the said John Graham, Jr., and the said Henry Harrison and wife and John Graham, Jr., have united with the said David G. Sayers and wife in this present deed for the purpose of vesting a perfect title in fee simple in and to said premises in the said Joseph I. Doran." This deed is recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 399 et seq.

On the 4th day of March, 1882, by their deed of that date, said David G. Sayers and wife conveyed to J. H. Divine "all the following described real estate lying and being in the county of McDowell, on Sand Lick, a tributary of Tug Fork of Tug river, being one undivided one-third part of 3,225 acres conveyed to D. G. Sayers on the 17th day of September, 1881, by John F. Johnson, clerk of the county court of McDowell county, by deed which is duly recorded in the clerk's office of said county in Deed Book No. 5, at page 353. Said land adjoins a tract of 662 acres of W. P. Cecil, and a tract of 150 acres of James B. Harman, and for a more particular description of said land reference is made to said deed made by said Johnson, containing 1,075 acres, more or less, and being an undivided third part of said 3,225 acres as aforesaid," etc.

On the 6th day of November, 1882, John F. Johnson, clerk of the county court of McDowell county, by his deed of that date, which was admitted to record on the 28th day of December, 1883, and was recorded in Deed Book No. 7, at page 7, in said clerk's office, granted to said Sayers the tract of 1,075 acres, being one undivided one-third part of 3,225 acres which formerly belonged to, and was returned delinquent in the name of, Joseph Jackson, Jr.

On the 17th day of November, 1882, said Sayers and wife, and Henry Harrison and wife, for the consideration of $1,612.50, of which $906.25 was paid in cash, the residue to be paid in 12 months thereafter, and for which balance, to wit, $806.25, a lien was reserved upon the land, by their deed of that date granted and conveyed to said Joseph I. Doran "all that certain tract, piece, or parcel of land situate on Sand Lick, a tributary of the Tug Fork of Sandy river, adjoining a tract of Wm. P. Cecil of 662 acres, adjoining a tract of James B. Harman of 150 acres, and adjoining a survey of James B. Harman of 181 acres, and bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning at two chestnut oaks," etc. (setting out the boundaries of the 3,226 acres as given in said patent), "being the same tract of land one undivided one-third part of which (was) taken as having been returned delinquent in the name of Mary Ladd for the nonpayment of taxes due thereon for the year 1876, and sold at the door of the courthouse of said McDowell county on the 6th day of November, 1877, to the said David G. Sayers, to whom John F. Johnson, Esq., clerk of the county court of said county, made a deed, bearing date September 17, 1881, since recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 353; and another undivided one-third of which was taken, as having been returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1878, as the property of Joseph Mullins, and sold at the door of the courthouse of said county on the 4th day of November, 1879, to the said David G. Sayers, to whom the said John F. Johnson, clerk as aforesaid, made a deed, bearing date September 22, 1881, which has since been recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 355. And the said David G. Sayers has since sold to the said Henry Harrison one undivided one-half of said undivided two-thirds of said tract of land, but has never made to him a deed therefor, and for that reason the said Henry Harrison and wife now join in the present deed, with the said David G. Sayers, for the purpose of divest-

The said David G. Sayers and Henry Harrison, in and by their said deed, covenanted that they would warrant generally the lands thereby conveyed, that they had the right to convey the same to the said party of the second part, that the said party of the second part should have quiet possession of the said land, that they would execute such further assurances as might be requested, and that they had done no act to incumber the same.

By their deed bearing date on the 24th day of November, 1891, Sayers and wife granted to appellant George H. Lambert, in fee, with covenants of special warranty, one-third undivided interest in all that certain tract of land situate in the county of McDowell, on the waters of Sand Lick creek, Spruce creek, and Laurel branch, but mostly on Sand Lick creek, tributaries of Tug river, containing in quantity 3,226 acres, and being the same tract of land granted by letters patent of the commonwealth of Virginia on the 1st day of December, 1864, to G. W. G. Brown, Samuel L. Graham, and Joseph Jackson, Jr., the tract of land thereby conveyed being the one-third undivided interest in said 3,226-acre tract, and being the same undivided interest in said land which had been conveyed to said Sayers by Francis H. Jackson, Josephine Jackson, and June F. Jackson, children and heirs at law of Joseph Jackson, Jr., deceased, by deed. The deed last above referred to was executed by the said Jacksons to Sayers, bears date on the 21st day of October, 1891, and recites that, whereas there was then pending in the circuit court of McDowell county three several chancery suits instituted by said June F. Jackson, Francis H. Jackson, and Josephine Jackson, respectively, against said Sayers, the object of each of which suits was to set aside, vacate, and annul a certain tax sale of the land thereafter mentioned, at which sale said Sayers became the purchaser thereof, and to annul and set aside the deed for said land which had been made to said Sayers by the clerk of the county court of McDowell county in pursuance of said tax sale (thereby meaning and referring to the tax sale and the tax deed hereinbefore mentioned, bearing date on the 6th day of November, 1882), and that the matters in controversy between the parties in said suits had been compromised. The deed further states that the said Joseph Jackson, Jr., patentee, was the father of the said grantors in the deed, that they derived title to said land from their said father by descent, and that they will warrant specially the said undivided third part of said 3,226 acres so conveyed by them.

There is also in the record a deed made by Joseph Mullins to Joseph I. Doran, bearing date on the 15th day of July, 1884, by which said Mullins granted and released all his claims in and upon said tract of 3,226 acres of land to Doran. The deed contains this clause: "The interest or claim intended to be hereby conveyed, and without any recourse whatever on said Joseph Mullins, being the one undivided third thereof conveyed by Samuel L. Graham and wife to Joseph Mullins by deed of the date of the 27th day of February, 1868. * * * And being the same land mentioned and described, and the same interest of claim conveyed in the deed from D. G. Sayers and wife and H. Harrison and wife to Joseph I. Doran of date of November 17, 1882, and of record in said clerk's office, in Deed Book 6, pages 40, 41, 42, and 43."

The original bill, bill of review, amended and supplemental bill, and bill of revivor filed in the cause by plaintiffs, state all of the foregoing facts and many others. It is shown by the record, and conceded by counsel, that the appellees, plaintiffs below, have title to all of said entire tract (which is in some of the papers described as 3,225 and in others 3,226 acres), except such claim or title thereto as appellant Lambert may have under the said deed of Sayers and wife to him bearing date on the 24th day of November, 1861. The present controversy between the parties seems to be as to the true meaning and legal effect of the said deed of Sayers and wife, and Harrison and wife, to Doran, bearing date on the 17th day of November, 1882.

Appellees contend that this last-mentioned deed conveyed to Doran the Jackson third, or 1,075 acres, of said 3,226-acre tract, while appellant Lambert claims that it did not and does not convey said Jackson third or interest, but that the third conveyed to Doran thereby was and is either the Ladd or the Mullins interest. As before stated herein, on the 4th day of March, 1882, less than four months after the execution of said deed to Doran, Sayers and wife conveyed to Divine the Brown-Ladd interest in the whole tract. It is not likely that Sayers at that time had overlooked the fact that he had executed the deed to Doran as aforesaid. It cannot, with much semblance of reason, be said that the deed last mentioned was intended by Sayers to convey, or that it did convey, the Graham-Mullins interest to Divine. Besides, the deed of Sayers and Harrison and their wives, respectively, and Graham, to Doran, of October 27, 1881, refers to and grants the 1,075 acres conveyed to Sayers by the clerk of the county court by deed of September 22, 1881, which is recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 355. Thus, it is fixed beyond question that the interest in the 3,226 acres conveyed by this last-mentioned deed is the Graham-Mullins third. It is also shown by this deed that before its execution Sayers had sold to Harrison an undivided half interest in said three tracts, to wit, 820, 820, and 1,075 acres, respectively, and that Sayers and Harrison had by their writing bearing date on the 27th day of August, 1881, agreed to sell said three tracts last mentioned to Graham. This explains why said Harrison and Graham joined Sayers in the deed, and it also disposes of the one-half interest of Harrison in one of the two undivided thirds or interests in said tract of 3,226 acres, bought by him from Sayers, hereinafter referred to.

In the deed of Sayers and Harrison and their wives, respectively, to Doran, bearing date on the 17th day of November, 1882, one undivided third of the entire tract is granted to Doran. In order to identify the land thus conveyed, the boundaries of the 3,226 acres are set out in the deed. Then it is stated therein that it is the same tract from which was taken, and sold for nonpayment of taxes due thereon, the Mary Ladd interest or third; that another third, to wit, the Mullins interest, had also been sold for delinquent taxes thereon; and that both of said interests had been conveyed by deeds to Sayers, the purchaser thereof, giving the dates of said last two mentioned conveyances. The interest thus fixed and conveyed by Sayers and wife and Harrison and wife to Doran by their last-mentioned deed is the Jackson one-third interest in the entire tract. This deed, after referring to the sales and deeds and the recordation thereof to Sayers as aforesaid, further recites that said David G. Sayers has since sold to said Henry Harrison one undivided one-half of said undivided two-thirds of said tract of land, but never made to him a deed therefor, and for that reason the said Henry Harrison and wife join in the present deed with the said David G. Sayers for the purpose of divesting their equitable title to said land. The above language indicates that after Sayers had obtained from the clerk deeds for the Ladd and Mullins interests in said land, and before the date of the last-mentioned deed—November 17, 1882—Sayers had sold one undivided half of said two undivided thirds to Harrison. Sayers at that time had also procured his tax deed of November 6, 1882, for the Jackson interest. He had before that date, on the 4th day of March, 1882, sold and conveyed the Ladd interest to Divine, without the joinder of Harrison in the deed therefor to Divine.

The three several interests in the land had not been partitioned, allotted, or designated. At that time—November 17, 1882—but one of said undivided thirds remained unconveyed by Sayers. Harrison had already, with Sayers, conveyed to Doran his undivided half interest in the Mullins undivided one-third of said tract of land. He was entitled to a one-half interest in one other undivided third of said entire tract. There being none other than the Jackson interest remaining unconveyed, Harrison was entitled to his one half interest therein. For that reason, it seems, he joined with Sayers in the deed of November 17, 1882.

By adopting this view, we take the practical construction put upon the whole transaction by the parties themselves. The three tax deeds to Sayers, the two deeds from Sayers and others to Doran, and the deed from Sayers and wife to Divine are thus made consistent with each other and given full force and effect. No violence is thereby done to the rights of the parties thereto. Practical construction of contracts is that given to agreements by the parties themselves by acts subsequently done with reference to the contracts. To such exposition of contracts the courts pay high regard, and will effectuate it if they can do so consistently with the rules of law. Hammon on Contracts, § 399. Sayers derived title to the whole of said entire tract by and through the three several tax deed to him. Whether such title was perfect or imperfect, it is not necessary to decide. While it is shown that Mullins brought a suit against Sayers, attacking the tax deed by which his interest in the land was conveyed to Sayers, and the Jackson heirs also instituted three several suits to set aside the tax deed which granted their interests in the land to Sayers, yet it must be remembered that all of those suits were compromised, and neither of the said tax deeds was canceled, but each was left in full force and effect. The recital in the said deed of Joseph Mullins to Doran, bearing date on the 15th day of July, 1884, that the Mullins interest therein conveyed was and is the same land mentioned and described, and the same interest and claim which was conveyed, in the deed from D. G. Sayers and wife and Henry Harrison and wife to said Joseph I. Doran of the date of November 17, 1882, is not true in fact. The deeds, taken together, do not support the contention of appellant as to that recital. The deed last mentioned, however, is not important in the disposition of the case. As we have shown, the title of Sayers to the whole of the 3,226 acres, and to each undivided third part thereof, was acquired by him through and by the said three tax deeds, neither of which was ever set aside or canceled. The recital in the said Mullins deed made more than three years after the deed of Sayers and others to Doran, confirmatory of Doran's title already vested, being the language of Mullins, could neither divest Doran of any title, or be set up as an estoppel in this suit against his grantees.

As between the original parties, a recital unnecessary to the conveyance will not operate as an estoppel. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 995. A party making a deed is not estopped, as between the original parties to it, by recitals unnecessary to the conveyance. Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 149, 65 Am. Dec. 498. Recitals in a deed estop all parties and privies, as a general rule, but this rule does not extend to mere description or non-essential averments. In the deed of July 15, 1884, the recital that it was the same interest and claim which was conveyed by Sayers and others by their deed of November 17, 1882, was unnecessary and nonessential to the conveyance by Mullins of his interest in the land, if he then had any interest therein.

A mistake in the recitals of a deed, referring to a previous deed of marriage settlement between the grantors, may, in equity, be shown by the grantees by introducing in evidence the deed referred to in the recitals. Bower v. McCormick, 23 Grat. 310. A recital in a deed only operates as an estoppel in cases in which the declaration of the grantor would be evidence. A recital is not competent to show title in the grantor. Joeckel v. Easton, 11 Mo. 118, 47 Am. Dec. 142. An examination of all of the deeds in the record relating to the said lands establishes beyond question that the recital in the Mullins deed was and is an incorrect statement, unfounded in fact.

Reverting to what has been said, it will be seen that Sayers and Harrison, and their wives, respectively, and Graham, by their deed of October 27, 1881, conveyed to Doran the three said several tracts of land, to wit, 820, 820, and 1,075 acres, respectively, lying on the dividing ridge between Horsepen creek and Big creek; the latter tract being the Mullins interest in the 3,226 acres. The consideration stated in the deed is $3,980, of which $1,980 was paid in cash, and the balance, $1,980, was to be paid in 12 months from that date. A lien upon the land was reserved by Sayers and Harrison in the deed, to secure the payment of the unpaid purchase money, to wit, said $1,980. By their deed of release bearing date on the 23d day of October, 1882, said Sayers and Harrison acknowledged the receipt from Doran of $1,980, which, with the like amount theretofore paid to them by him, was in full payment for the tract of land conveyed by them to Doran by their deed of October 27, 1881, recorded in Deed Book No. 5, at page 399; and they thereby released and discharged the said Joseph I. Doran of and from all claim and demand under said deed, and especially released and discharged the said land thereby granted of and from the vendor's lien for the balance of purchase money expressly reserved by them in said above-recited deed. On the same day, to wit, on the 23d day of October, 1882, said David G. Sayers and Henry Harrison, by their certain writing signed and sealed by them, and bearing the date last aforesaid, bargained, sold, and conveyed to Joseph I. Doran and his heirs in fee simple, with warranty of title, covenants of quiet possession, and freedom from incumbrance, a certain tract or parcel of land situate in the county of McDowell, containing 1,075 acres, more or less, adjoining the lands of Joseph I. Doran and J. H. Divine, and bounded as follows: "Beginning at part of a tract sold by us to Jos. I. Doran on Sand Lick." It is provided in the writing "that the party of the second part [Doran] shall be allowed one month from the date hereof to dig upon, and explore said lands for minerals, and, in addition thereto, to complete this bargain by paying for the land, one dollar and fifty cents per acre, one half cash, balance in six months," etc. This is followed up by said deed of Sayers and Harrison and their wives, respectively, to Doran, dated November 17, 1882, after Sayers had obtained his tax deed for the Jackson interest in said land.

The said deed of Mullins to Doran of July 15, 1884, was executed for the consideration of $250, the receipt of which is acknowledged by Mullins in the deed. There is also in the record a receipt of Mullins to Doran, bearing date on the 15th day of July, 1884, which is indorsed on the deed, for said $250; and also a receipt of Harrison and Sayers to Doran, bearing date on the 16th day of July, 1884, in the words and figures following: "Received of Joseph I. Doran, two hundred and fifty dollars to be a credit on the purchase money for certain lands sold by the undersigned to said Doran, lying in McDowell County, West Virginia. And a lien reserved in the conveyance of said land for part of the purchase money; and this payment we are to credit on the margin of the deed book in which said conveyance is recorded. [Signed] Harrison and Sayers. By H. Harrison."

By their certain deed of release, bearing date on the 29th day of April, 1886, Harrison and Sayers, and their respective wives, thereby, remised, released, quitclaimed, and forever discharged the said tracts or parcels of land, and particularly all those certain three tracts or parcels of land conveyed by Henry Harrison et ux. et al., by deeds dated October 27, 1881, November 17, 1882, and November 17, 1882, respectively, recorded in McDowell county, W. Va., in Deed Book No. 5, at page 399, No. 6, at page 43, and No. 6, at page 40, respectively, situate in said county, "one thereof beginning * * *; the other thereof situate on the waters of Sand Lick creek, and on the waters of Spice creek, on Laurel branch and other small branches, but mostly on Sand Lick creek, all waters of Tug river, adjoining a tract of William P. Cecil of 662 acres; a tract of James B. Harman of 130 acres, and bounded as follows: Beginning at two chestnut oaks by a cliff of rocks on the east side of San Lick Ridge, about twenty yards from the top of said ridge on Spice Creek waters, a corner of W. P. Cecil's 662 acre tract * * * containing 3,226 acres.

* * * So that the said Joseph I. Doran and the South West Virginia Improvement Company, their heirs, successors and assigns, shall and may hereafter have, hold, occupy, and enjoy all and singular the premises now owned by them, respectively, in said above mentioned deeds, particularly described, and every part thereof, with their appurtenances, without any molestation, interruption, eviction of the said Henry Harrison and David G. Sayers, or either of them, or their or either of their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or of any other person or persons, natural or corporate, whomsoever, claiming, or to claim by, from or under, them or either of them, or by or with their or either of their acts, means, consent, or procurement." The above-recited papers show that Harrison was a joint owner with Sayers of the Mullins undivided third of said tract of 3,226 acres of land, and of the proceeds of the sale thereof to Doran; that he was also considered and treated as a joint owner with Sayers of the remaining or Jackson undivided third therein, and of the proceeds of the sale thereof, but was not considered or treated as a part owner of the Brown-Ladd third.

Therefore the facts conclusively established are that Sayers acquired title by his tax deeds and otherwise to all of the tract of 3,226 acres of land; that he sold, but did not convey, to Harrison an undivided half interest in two of the undivided thirds of said entire tract; that Sayers conveyed one of the undivided thirds, to wit, the Ladd interest, to Divine, but Harrison did not join in that deed; that Sayers and Harrison, and their wives, respectively, and Graham, sold and conveyed to Doran the Mullins interest in said land, for which Sayers and Harrison received the purchase money, and executed and delivered to Doran a release of the said vendor's lien on the 23d day of October, 1882; that, there being but one undivided third of the land then unsold and unconveyed, to wit, the Jackson third, Harrison was entitled, as between Sayers and himself, to one undivided half thereof; that Sayers and Harrison then executed the writing to Doran of October 23, 1882, which is an option to Doran to buy the said remaining one undivided third of said land; that said third was and is the Jackson interest; and none other; and that said Jackson interest was and is conveyed to Doran by the deed of Sayers and Harrison, and their wives, respectively, of November 17, 1882. The last-mentioned deed conveyed to Doran all the right, title, and interest which the grantees therein were then entitled to in the said Jackson interest or third of the 3,226 acres of land. On the 21st day of October, 1891, the deed by the Jackson heirs was executed to Sayers. Thirty-four days thereafter, Sayers, by his deed of the 24th day of November, 1891, attempted to convey said Jackson interest to appellee Lambert.

This leads us to a consideration of the legal effect of the covenants in the deed of Sayers and Harrison to Doran of the 17th day of November, 1882. In Burners v. Keran, 24 Grat. 42, it is held that if a person conveys land with general warranty, and does not own it at the time, but afterwards acquires the same land, such acquisition inures to the benefit of the grantee, because the grantor is estopped to deny, against the terms of his own warranty, that he had the title in question; but it does not operate actually to transfer the estate subsequently acquired. The court cites 4 Kent, Com. 98: "If the conveyance be with general warranty, not only the subsequent title acquired by the grantor will inure by estoppel to the benefit of the grantee, but a subsequent purchase from the grantor, under his after-acquired title, is equally estopped, and the estoppel runs with the land." Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92. Mr. Justice Story, in Carver v. Astor, 4 Pet. 86, 7 L. Ed. 791, says: "In the next place it shows that such estoppel binds all persons claiming the same land, not only under the same deed, but under any subsequent conveyance from the same party; that is to say, it binds not merely privies in blood, but privies in estate, as subsequent grantees and alienees. In the next place, it shows that an estoppel which (as the phrase is) works on the interest of the land runs with it into whosoever hands the land comes." In Myers v. Croft, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 291, 20 L. Ed. 562, it is held that a grantor, not having perfect title, who conveys for full value, is estopped, both himself and others claiming by subsequent grant from him, against denying title; a perfect title afterwards coming to him. Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. 618, 19 L. Ed. 800. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1022, citing a long array of authorities in support thereof, says: "In most states the covenant of general warranty is held not only to estop the grantor and his heirs from setting up an after-acquired title, but also actually to transfer the estate subsequently acquired, as if it had passed by the deed in the first instance." Applying the foregoing principles, the conveyance by the Jackson heirs to Sayers inured to the benefit of Doran as against Lambert, unless Lambert's contention in the case be well founded.

Appellant, in his answer to plaintiff's bill, in part says: That he is an innocent purchaser, for valuable consideration, without notice, actual or constructive, of any real or pretended claim of plaintiffs the land in controversy being unoccupied, wild, and uncultivated, and he having had no actual notice in any way, and no constructive notice. He admits "that his codefendant D. G. Sayers, who is his grantor, represented to him that he [Sayers], having compromised with the heirs at law of Joseph Jackson, Jr., had a perfect and indefeasible title to said land, and that respondent, having seen the conveyance to Sayers from the Jackson heirs, dated October 21, 1891, * * * purchased the land." Appellant contends that there is nothing in the deeds, hereinbefore and hereafter referred to, sufficient to put him on notice that the Jackson interest had been purchased by Sayers, or conveyed by him and others to Doran. The tax deeds to Sayers for the Mullins and Ladd interests, and the deeds from Sayers and others to Doran, and from Sayers and wife to Divine, for those interests, respectively, were each on the record in the proper office when Lambert took his deed from Sayers. Lambert admits that said deeds were on the record. In the deed from the Jackson heirs to Sayers, the tax sale and tax deed to Sayers for that interest are referred to. The tax deed last mentioned was also recorded at that time, as well as the said option, and the subsequent deed of Sayers and Harrison to Doran.

It is further shown by the evidence that Lambert was in the employ of the plaintiffs, or the company for which they are trustees, as their agent; that his employment began in the latter part of 1888, or early part of 1889; that he received a monthly salary for looking generally after their interests, namely, placing tenants on their lands and preventing trespasses thereon; that, before the date of the deed from Sayers to him, he knew of the plaintiff's claim to the said land; that he was told of the claim of plaintiffs about the 20th day of October, 1891, and that he had access to the maps of the lands of plaintiff, on which the land in controversy was shown. On March 1, 1890, Lambert, while acting as the agent of plaintiffs, caused a written lease to be prepared between plaintiffs and one Rose, whereby the Harrison and Sayers and the Divine tracts of land were leased to Rose. It is proved that the Harrison and Sayers tract mentioned in said lease is the land in controversy. The lease recites that the plaintiffs are the owners of said two tracts of land. All of this occurred before Lambert had paid any money to, or completed his said purchase of the land from, Sayers. Possession by Rose, the tenant of plaintiffs, placed on the land by Lambert, was sufficient notice to him to put him upon inquiry as to plaintiffs' claim. Campbell v. Fetterman's Heirs, 20 W. Va. 398. There are many other things disclosed by the record relating to the said land sufficient to have put a man of ordinary caution and prudence upon inquiry as to the true ownership of the Jackson interest therein. In Fidelity Co. v. Railroad Co., 32 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. 180, it is held that, where a subsequent purchaser has actual notice that the property in question was incumbered or affected, he is charged constructively with notice of all the facts and instruments to the knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry into the incumbrance or other circumstance affecting the property, of which he had notice. Notice is actual when the purchaser knows of the existence of the adverse claim, or, perhaps, when he is conscious of having the means of knowledge, and yet does not use them; and it is immaterial whether his knowledge results from direct information, or is gathered from facts and circumstances. 2 Minor, Ins. 978. Whatever puts a man upon inquiry amounts, in judgment of law, to notice, provided the inquiry becomes a duty, and would lead to the knowledge of the requisite fact by the exercise of ordinary diligence and understanding. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 792, and cases cited. To entitle an innocent purchaser without notice to protection in equity, the text-books do not assert, nor has any case been found to adjudge, that he must hold under a general warranty deed; but it is no doubt the law that, where a person bargains for and takes a mere quitclaim or deed without warranty, it is a circumstance, if unexplained, to show that he had notice of imperfections in the vendor's title, and only purchased such interest as the vendor might have in the property. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 834. The deed of the Jackson heirs to Sayers contains a special warranty only, and the said deed from Sayers and wife to Lambert contains a similar covenant. One who claims the protection of a court of equity as a bona fide purchaser must show that he has acquired the legal title before notice or knowledge of facts equivalent to notice. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 839. Under the facts and circumstances of this case as disclosed by the record, we must hold that Lambert was not an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration of the Jackson interest in said land, without notice of plaintiffs' claim of title thereto and ownership thereof.

For the reasons stated, we affirm the decree.

THOMAS COUNTY COM'RS v. HOPKINS.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 31, 1904.)

JUDGE—JURISDICTION IN VACATION.

1. A judge of the superior court has no jurisdiction at chambers and in vacation to render a final judgment upon a verdict previously rendered at a regular term of the court.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

W. M. Hammond, for Thomas County Com'rs. Theo. Titus, for T. N. Hopkins.

SIMMONS, C. J. A petition for mandamus was filed by Hopkins against the commissioners of Thomas county. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and a trial had. The jury found for the petitioner, and the defendants moved for a new trial. The motion was overruled, and the movants sued out a writ of error to this court. It was held that the case was prematurely here, as no mandamus absolute had ever been granted. The writ of error was dismissed, leave being given the plaintiffs in error to file their exceptions as exceptions pendente lite. Commissioners v. Hopkins, 118 Ga. 643, 45 S. E. 433. Subsequently the judge rendered a final judgment granting the mandamus absolute, and the defendants sued out another writ of error. The defendants in error filed a cross-bill of exceptions. Upon an examination of the record we find that the judgment below was rendered at chambers and in vacation, and no order appears reserving the right to render the judgment at such a time. The rendition of a judgment is a judicial act, and must be performed in term, and a judgment rendered in vacation, in the absence of authority so to do, is absolutely void. 1 Black on Judg. (2d Ed.) § 179. The verdict of the jury in the present case was returned during a regular term of the court, and there is no law in this state authorizing the rendition of a judgment in such a case in vacation. The judgment rendered was therefore a nullity, and must be disregarded. It follows that the status of the case is exactly the same as when it was here before. It was then said that, "until a judgment granting a mandamus absolute is rendered, the case is still pending in the court below." No lawful judgment having yet been rendered, the case is still pending in the court below, and this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the writ of error or the cross-bill. Whenever final judgment is rendered, the defendants may except, and assign error upon the exceptions pendente lite. Inasmuch as leave was before granted the plaintiffs in error to file their bill of exceptions as exceptions pendente lite, we now grant leave to the defendant in error to withdraw his cross-bill of exceptions from the files of this court and file it in the court below as exceptions pendente lite.

Writs of error dismissed. All the Justices concurring.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al. v. JONES.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 31, 1904.)

APPEAL—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL—COSTS.

1. There was no evidence authorizing a recovery against the Georgia & Alabama Railway, and therefore the court erred in refusing a new trial as to that company.

2. The case being for decision by a court of six justices, and they being evenly divided in opinion as to whether it was erroneous to refuse a new trial as to the Seaboard Air Line Railway, the judgment as to that company stands affirmed by operation of law.

3. Direction is given that the costs of this writ of error be equally divided between the Seaboard Air Line Railway and the defendant in error.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al. v. JONES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 9, 1904.)

REHEARING—APPLICATION—WHEN MADE——GROUNDS—REMITTITUR—FORWARDING —RECALLING.

1. The Supreme Court will, during the term at which a judgment is rendered, and before the remittitur has been forwarded to the clerk of the trial court, when dissatisfied with the judgment, of its own motion order a rehearing of the case.

2. There being no law expressly authorizing the parties to a case to apply for a rehearing, whether such application will be entertained, and, if entertained, what disposition shall be made of it, are questions addressed entirely to the sound discretion of the court.

3. No such application will be entertained in any case after the remittitur has been forwarded to the clerk of the trial court, even though presented during the term, and before the remittitur has reached the office of the clerk of the trial court. See, in this connection, Cooper v. Brewing Co., 88 S. E. 347, 113 Ga. 1.

4. In the absence of a statute regulating the matter, the court may by rule fix the time in which the remittitur shall be forwarded to the clerk of the trial court.

5. Under existing rules, unless otherwise ordered, the remittitur is required to be forwarded to the clerk of the trial court "as soon as practicable after the expiration of ten days from this court's approval of the minutes containing the judgment." Rule 35, as amended February and March, 1900. See 108 Ga. vi, 36 S. E. v.

6. Whether the remittitur shall be forwarded earlier than the time fixed in the above rule is a question addressed to the discretion of the court.

7. The mere fact that the six justices are evenly divided in opinion as to what should be the judgment in a case, and that as a result of such division the judgment of the trial court stands affirmed by operation of law, is no reason for granting a rehearing in a case.

8. A rehearing will be granted on motion of the losing party only when it appears that the court has overlooked a material fact in the record, a statute, or a decision which is controlling as authority, and which would require a different judgment from that rendered.

9. After a judgment of the Supreme Court has been pronounced and entered upon its minutes, and the remittitur issued and transmitted to the trial court, and there received, the Supreme Court loses jurisdiction over the case, and can make no further order having the effect to alter or change the judgment pronounced.

Aliter where the remittitur has been transmitted as the result of a mistake, irregularity, inadvertence, fraud, or the like. Zorn v. Lamar, 71 Ga. 85; Hayes v. State, 16 S. E. 270, 91 Ga. 43; Legg v. Overbagh, 4 Wend. 188, 21 Am. Dec. 115, and notes; 13 Enc. P. & P. 864. See, also, in this connection, Cooper v. Brewing Co., 88 S. E. 347, 113 Ga. 1; Knox v. State, 39 S. E. 330, 113 Ga. 930.

10. It follows from the foregoing that the Supreme Court cannot recall its remittitur after the same has been filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court, where it has been regularly issued and transmitted in accordance with the deliberate order and judgment of the court. 13 Enc. P. & P. 865.

11. The application for leave to file a motion for a rehearing in the present case is denied.

BUTLER, STEVENS & CO. v. GEORGIA & A. RY. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 31, 1904.)

REFERENCE—AUDITOR'S REPORT—EXCEPTIONS—SALES BY PLANTERS—PASSING OF TITLE.

1. The neglect of a party excepting to an auditor's report on matters of fact, or on matters of law dependent for their decision upon the evidence, to point out by appropriate reference to the auditor's brief of evidence, or to attach as exhibits to his exceptions, those portions of the evidence relied on to support the exceptions, renders the report of the auditor of little or no assistance to the court, and is a sufficient reason, in an equity case, for refusing to approve the exceptions of fact and for overruling the exceptions of law.

2. The provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 3546, are applicable only to planters and commission merchants.

(a) A planter, as used in that section, is one who is engaged in the business of producing crops from the soil; and it is immaterial whether he sows and reaps with his own hand, the hand of a tenant, the hand of a cropper, or the hand of a hired laborer.

(b) A planter may avail himself of the protection of the section above cited in any cash sale of cotton which may be made by him, without reference to whether it was produced by him or acquired from another.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Bill of interpleader by the Georgia & Alabama Railway against the Bank of Unadilla and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and Butler, Stevens & Co. bring error. Affirmed.

Adams & Adams and Travis & Edwards, for plaintiffs in error. E. A. Hawkins, Lawton & Cunningham, W. R. Leaken, Guerry & Hall, T. M. Jelks, Jno. I. Hall, and Whipple & McKenzie, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. 1. The Georgia & Alabama Railway brought a petition in the nature of a bill of interpleader against the Bank of Unadilla, Butler, Stevens & Co., and others, for the purpose of having the title to certain bales of cotton determined. The case was referred to an auditor. Butler, Stevens & Co. filed exceptions both of law and fact to the auditor's report, and the judge overruled all of the exceptions. Error is assigned upon this ruling, so far as it relates to eight exceptions—four classified as exceptions of law, and four as exceptions of fact. Three of the exceptions of fact complain that certain findings of the auditor are contrary to the evidence, and one complains that there was no finding of the auditor on a certain issue: it being contended that, under the evidence, the auditor ought to have made a finding in favor of Butler, Stevens & Co. on this issue. Three of the exceptions of law are dependent for their determination upon the evidence. In no one of the seven exceptions just referred to is the evidence relied on to support the exception set forth, nor is reference made to the portion of the auditor's brief of the evidence in which such evidence may be found. It is not absolutely necessary that the exception shall set forth all of the evidence necessary to a decision of the question raised, but each exception should at least be accompanied with such a reference to the auditor's brief of evidence as will enable the judge to turn readily to those portions of the brief of evidence which should be examined in passing upon the exception. The object of a reference to an auditor or master is to relieve the court of the labor of examining the mass of evidence, much of which is often irrelevant; and, unless the foregoing rule is observed, the report of the auditor will be of little assistance to the court. This rule is well established in chancery, and we know of no statute, decision, or rule of court in this state which has abolished or modified this salutary requirement. In Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. 103, 6 L. Ed. 429, it was held: "Exceptions to the report of a master are to be regarded by the court only so far as they are supported by the special statements of the master, or by a distinct reference to the particular portions of testimony on which the party excepting relies. The court does not investigate the items of an account, nor review the whole mass of testimony taken before the master." Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in the opinion, says: "It may be observed generally that it is not the province of a court to investigate items of an account. The report of the master is received as true, when no exception is taken; and the exceptions are to be regarded so far only as they are supported by the special statements of the master, or by evidence, which ought to be brought before the court by a reference to the particular testimony on which the exceptant relies. Were it otherwise—were the court to look into the immense mass of testimony laid before the commissioner—the reference to him would be of little avail." See, also, Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 238; Jones v. Lamar (C. C.) 39 Fed. 585; Farrar v. Bernheim, 74 Fed. 435, 20 C. C. A. 496; 17 Enc. P. & P. 1052. In Brown v. McKay, 51 Ill. App. 295, 299, Mr. Justice Waterman, in referring to exceptions of the character of those under consideration in the present case, says: "These exceptions require the court to search through the mass of evidence to determine if they are well taken. There is a neglect to point out what the evidence is upon the conclusions of the master which the party disputes. Such a practice renders the report of the master of no assistance to the court, and is one which the court is under no obligation to tolerate." The failure of the excepting party to specify the places in the auditor's brief of evidence where the evidence could be found which was necessary to a decision of the questions raised by the exceptions above referred to was a sufficient reason for refusing to approve the exceptions of fact and overruling the exceptions of law. See Hudson v. Hudson, 119 Ga. 637, 46 S. E. 874.

2. There is an exception of law which raises the legal question as to who is a planter, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 3546. As this exception is so framed that it can be determined by a mere reference to the auditor's report, and without reference to the brief of evidence, it does not fall within the rule of practice above laid down, and is the only exception which can be properly considered. J. G. Brown, Sr., Hodge & Eubanks, and J. W. Hodge each claims to be a planter, and to have sold a portion of the cotton in controversy to Jelks on cash sale, and that, under the provisions of the section of the Code above referred to, he could assert his title against Butler, Stevens & Co., notwithstanding they were bona fide purchasers without notice from Jelks. The auditor found that Brown was a farmer, and that the cotton sold by him to Jelks was raised by him on his own land, that Hodge & Eubanks acquired the cotton sold by them from their tenants in payment of rent and supplies furnished, except as to two bales which were collected by them in their mercantile business; and that J. W. Hodge was a farmer, and the cotton sold by him to Jelks was raised on land owned by him by tenants, who paid their rent and for their supplies with cotton raised by them on the rented premises. The act of 1854, with the amendments made from time to time, is now embodied in the section of the Code above mentioned, which is as follows: "Cotton, corn, rice, crude turpentine, spirits turpentine, rosin, pitch, tar, or other products sold by planters and commission merchants on cash sale, shall not be considered as the property of the buyer until fully paid for, although it may have been delivered to the buyer: provided, that in cases where the whole or any part of the property has been delivered to the buyer, the right of the seller to collect the purchase-money shall not be affected by its subsequent loss or destruction." The title of the act of 1854 was, "An act for the protection in certain cases of planters and cotton sellers within the state of Georgia." Acts 1853-54, p. 56. We do not think this act was intended to embrace all sellers of cotton, but that its scope was limited to those sellers embraced within the classes mentioned, viz., planters and commission merchants. It was not passed for the benefit of all cotton sellers, but for the benefit only of those classes of sellers who answered the description of planters and commission merchants. It has been held that one who answered to the description of commission merchant, and who made a sale of his own cotton, was entitled to avail himself of the protection that this act affords. National Bank v. Augusta Cotton Company, 104 Ga. 403, 30 S. E. 888. If a commission merchant selling cotton is entitled to the protection of the act, whether he is selling on commission or not, it would seem that a planter is entitled to equal protection, whether he is selling cotton raised by himself, or cotton acquired in any other way. It may be that the case just cited gave too liberal a construction to the act in favor of commission merchants; but, following the line of construction indicated by that decision, it inevitably results that a planter is entitled to the protection in any cash sale of cotton that he may make.

As we have reached the conclusion that all planters are entitled to the protection of this law in all cash sales of cotton made by them, it becomes necessary to determine who is a planter, within the meaning of the act. In Roberts v. Railway, 75 Ga. 227, Mr. Chief Justice Jackson, in discussing this act, defined planters to be "those who plant something in the ground, or sow something therein, which produces fruit or increase from this planting and growing from the soil, such as cotton, corn, or rice." It is claimed that this language restricts the definition of planters to those who are themselves actually engaged in the cultivation of the soil; but we do not think the learned chief justice intended the words he used to have this narrow and restricted meaning. "Planter" is defined by the Standard Dictionary to be "one who plants; an owner of a plantation." By Webster, as "one who owns or cultivates a plantation." By the Century Dictionary, as "one who owns a plantation." From these definitions, we think the true meaning to be given to the word "planter," as used in the act, is one who is engaged in the business of producing crops from the soil; and it is immaterial whether he sows and reaps with his own hand, with the hand of a tenant, the hand of a cropper, or the hand of a hired laborer. Under this view of the law, all of the parties above referred to were planters. All belong to one of the classes protected by the law under consideration, and, belonging to these classes, they had a right to avail themselves of the protection afforded, not only as to sales of the crops made by them, but as to sales of any cotton which they owned.

LATIMER v. IRISH-AMERICAN BANK et al.

EQUITY—TRIAL TERM—CONSENT—RES JUDICATA
—OBJECTIONS TO PLEADINGS—ANSWER—
PARTITION—DEBTS—BILL OF REVIEW.

1. The first term of an equity case is the trial term, when all the parties consent. It follows that, when such consent is given, the parties have the same rights and liabilities at the first term that they would have in the trial of the case at the second or any subsequent term.

(a) A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the same parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which, under the rules of law, might have been put in issue, in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered.

(b) The exception to the foregoing rule, in cases in which the party had a good defense of which he was entirely ignorant, or was prevented from availing himself of his defense by fraud, or accident, or the act of the adverse party, is unavailing, unless these grounds of relief are unmixed with negligence or fault on his part.

(c) Objections to the pleadings on both sides are required to be made at the first term.

2. A defendant in every case may set up in his answer any matter which, under the English rule, should be the subject of a cross-bill.

(a) Where the petitioner in an equitable proceeding for a partition seeks to charge her severed interest with her debts to the defendants, their answer, praying a judgment for their debts, is germane to the petition.

(b) Equity does nothing by halves, but gives complete relief.

3. Although the debts on which the decree was rendered in the equitable partition proceeding were not quite due, the decree will not be reopened on that ground alone; it appearing that the plaintiff in that proceeding set out these debts in her petition for partition without any reference to their not being due, that she made no objection at the hearing of the case on that account, and that the notes evidencing her indebtedness matured before the bill of review was filed, and before any effort was made to enforce the decree as to these debts.

4. The pleadings in the partition case were sufficient to authorize the decree rendered.

5. It was not necessary to the validity of the decree that the answers of the defendants should have been marked "Filed" by the clerk; the answers having in fact been in the hands of the court, and having been considered in making the decree.

6. While inadvertent errors in a decree may be corrected, the general rule is that a bill of review will not lie against a consent decree.

7. There is no specification of any fraud in the procurement of the decree.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; W. T. Gary, Judge.

Action by Annie K. Latimer against the Irish-American Bank and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. H. Callaway, for plaintiff in error. W. K. Miller, D. G. Fogarty, J. O. C. Black, and Wm. H. Barrett, for defendants in error.

TURNER, J. This case comes to this court upon a writ of error sued out by Annie K. Latimer, the plaintiff in the court below, who thus brings under review the judgment of that court dismissing an equitable proceeding instituted by her against the Irish-American Bank and certain other parties defendant. The nature of this proceeding, as well as the allegations upon which she relied for the relief sought, may readily be gathered from the following statement of the case set forth in the brief submitted by her counsel:

"Plaintiff in error brought an equitable petition against defendants in error, for the purpose of setting aside certain judgments rendered against her in a decree in a partition proceeding in Richmond superior court on October 22, 1901. * * * Her petition and the exhibits thereto set forth the following facts: In September, 1901, plaintiff owned a one-fifth undivided interest in the estate of her father, which also covered the trust estate left by her mother. The remaining four-fifths interest in said estates were owned by her brother, W. C. Pollard, and her three sisters, Mrs. Brantley, Mrs. Stuart, and Mrs. Giles. Her brother, W. C. Pollard, her husband, W. E. Latimer, and her brother-in-law, H. B. Stuart, were the administrators upon her father's estate. Latimer, her husband, was heavily involved, owing a large indebtedness, among others, to the defendant banks, who were threatening criminal prosecution. Under these circumstances, plaintiff, at the instance of her husband, her brother, and brother-in-law, during September, 1901, executed the following notes and conveyances, all to be used in paying off and securing her husband's indebtedness: September 16, 1901, to Martin & Bush, $750, with conveyance of one-fifth undivided interest in father's and mother's estates, as security; September 17, 1901, note to Stuart for $800, and to Pollard for $400; September 23, 1901, conveyance to Pollard and Stuart of her one-fifth undivided interests in said estates to secure said notes; September 27, 1901, to Pollard, two notes, one for $225, the other for $774.43; and on the same date a third conveyance to Pollard on her one-fifth undivided interest in said estates—all of said notes maturing 60 days after date. Plaintiff received no money on any of said obligations, except the note to Martin & Bush. The money received from them was delivered by her to her husband. All the notes and conveyances executed by her to Pollard and Stuart were immediately transferred by them to Irish-American Bank and National Exchange Bank to secure indebtedness due by Latimer, plaintiff's husband, to these banks, and to prevent his prosecution. On September 28, 1901, an application for partition was prepared by the attorney for the three administrators, and plaintiff, with her sisters, signed the same in person at the instance of said administrators. This petition for partition recited the indebtedness represented by the notes which plaintiff had signed, and the conveyances, and contained a prayer that the indebtedness represented by said notes and the liens of the instruments securing the same should be made a charge against petitioner's separate, segregated interest in said estates, instead of upon the one-fifth undivided interest in the whole, and also contained a consent for a trial at the first term by the judge without a jury. The two defendant banks and Martin & Bush were made parties on account of the charge requested in the lien of their conveyances.

All the defendants acknowledged service September 28, 1901. There was a joint answer by Martin & Bush and the two banks, stating only the amount of their indebtedness, and that they held a lien, and praying for judgment. But the character of indebtedness was not stated, neither the dates nor the maturity were given, and no allegation that it was due, and the answer does not appear to have ever been filed. There was an answer by the three administrators, which, in the last paragraph, stated the amount of indebtedness which Pollard and Stuart claimed against plaintiff, without more. This answer is not marked 'Filed.' Plaintiff never saw or heard of either of these answers until the filing of her present suit. On October 22, 1901, the first day of the October term of the court, nearly a month before the maturity of any of said indebtedness, without any notice whatever to plaintiff, the attorney for the three administrators and the attorney for the two banks took a decree from the judge alone, without the intervention of a jury, partitioning the property, assigning to plaintiff one-fifth of the same, and entering up judgment against her in favor of Martin & Bush and the two banks and Pollard and Stuart, the two administrators, in principal sums aggregating $3,763.02, which was $813.59 more than the aggregate amount of the notes which she had executed in September. No further steps were taken in the matter, and no effort made to enforce this decree, or the judgments rendered therein, until January 30, 1902, after the adjournment of the October term of the court, when executions were issued, and plaintiff for the first time knew that said judgments had been entered, when she immediately filed the present petition to set the same aside. Upon the maturity of the notes in November, 1901, after the decree had been rendered, the banks, holding these notes of plaintiff under transfer from Pollard and Stuart, had the same protested."

The court sustained a general demurrer and motion to dismiss the plaintiff's petition, and she excepted. On the argument of the case before this court, counsel for the plaintiff in error contended that the judgments rendered against her in the trial court on the original petition for partition, etc., should be set aside for the following reasons, which are set forth in the brief filed in her behalf:

"(1) Because the notes which she executed and the transfers of her property were obtained from her by her husband, brother, and brother-in-law, who are the administrators on her father's estate, and were transferred to the banks, for the purpose of suppressing criminal prosecutions against her husband, and that all these facts were known to and participated in by the banks. (2) Because the answer of Martin & Bush and the two banks and of the administrators, setting up indebtedness against plaintiff, were so meager and defective that no legal or valid judgment could be rendered upon the same. (3)

Because the petition filed, which was signed by plaintiff and her sisters, was a partition proceeding on its face, and contained nothing to indicate or suggest that judgments would be rendered therein in favor of the defendants, especially on notes not due, and the answers asking judgment were not germane to the same. (4) Because plaintiff had no notice, knowledge, or information of the existence of the pleadings in which judgments were asked for, and no reasonable grounds to suspect that such pleadings would be filed or judgments asked for on notes not due, until after the term at which the judgments were rendered had expired, and therefore she has never had her day in court so far as these judgments are concerned. (5) The judgments were rendered prematurely on October 22, 1901, on notes which did not mature until November 15th, 26th, and 27th thereafter. (6) Plaintiff never consented for a trial at the first term by the judge without a jury of any issue, except those expressly set forth in the petition for partition, which she signed. This consent did not cover the issues raised by the answers of the defendants, on which the judgments were rendered. (7) The pleadings were not sufficient to support the judgments, and the judgments aggregated in amount $813.59 in excess of all obligations signed by plaintiff."

In the original equitable petition filed by the plaintiff in error, with her sisters, for the partition of the landed estates of her father and mother and for other purposes, it appears, among other things, that these lands were set out and described; that she claimed a one-fifth undivided interest, on which she had executed incumbrances in the nature of security deeds to secure various debts; that these debts were set out as to amounts of principal and interest, were evidenced by notes and conveyances, but the dates and maturity of these obligations were not set out in the petition. She also alleged that certain banking institutions, defendants in that proceeding, to which said debts and securities had been transferred, threatened to complicate the landed estates by selling the undivided interest of the said Annie K. Latimer therein, which it was averred would, if done, result in a sacrifice; that it would be to the interest of all the parties that the interest of Annie K. Latimer should be severed from the rest; and that that interest, thus segregated, should be held liable for the indebtedness charged by her thereon, to which she expressly consented. The prayer of the petition, among other things, asked that her share be alone charged with the indebtedness above referred to, and that such other and further relief be granted as the nature and circumstances of the case might require and to the court might seem meet. Process was also prayed against the defendants named in the proceeding, together with the creditors of Annie K. Latimer; and she added a consent and request that the case be heard and determined at the first term, to wit, the October term, 1901, by the judge alone, without the intervention of a jury. This petition was signed, in their proper persons, by Annie K. Latimer and her coplaintiffs; also, by W. K. Miller, "Pet. Atty."

To this petition for partition an answer was filed by the creditors of Annie K. Latimer, defendants in error, in which they admit all the allegations contained in the petition; set out their claims as to amount, but not as to maturity; state their liens upon the interest of Mrs. Latimer; and pray judgment against her for the sums stated, and that the judgments be enforced against her interest in the property, in the order and priority stated in the answer.

At the appearance term of the case, a decree was rendered by his honor, Judge Brinson, reciting, in substance, that it appeared to the court that the plaintiffs were entitled to the partition prayed for, and further reciting that all parties were represented and consenting that the case be heard and decided at the first term of the court by the judge alone, without the intervention of a jury. The decree proceeded, fixing the various sums in which the plaintiff in error was indebted to her various creditors, whose liens she had asked to be transferred to her severed or segregated interest in the lands which she had inherited from her parents, for which said several sums judgments were rendered in the decree in favor of the creditors, respectively, the same to be specially enforced against the share of Annie K. Latimer thereafter described. In another portion of the decree, also, the part allotted in the partition to Mrs. Latimer was specially charged with the indebtedness in the said decree found to exist against her, and set out in the petition and answer.

To the statement of the case made by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, hereinbefore given, it should be added that in her new bill she prayed that the notes and the deeds to secure them, given to the defendants in error, who were also defendants in the original bill, should be declared void and surrendered to her, and that the part of the lands set apart to her by the decree in the original bill be turned over to her, as her property under said partition, and that the decree rendered on the original bill be reviewed and reformed, by declaring null and void the judgments rendered in favor of said defendants; that injunction issue to restrain defendants from enforcing the executions issued under said judgments, etc.

1. "The trial term for all causes for equitable relief shall be the second term after service has been perfected on all the parties. But parties to proceedings for equitable relief may, by consent, dispose of all equity causes at the first term, if service has been properly perfected." Civ. Code 1895, § 4848. The law, therefore, renders equity causes triable at the first term, in cases where the parties consent, as was done in this case. Any step which either party could take in the trial of the case could be taken, under these circumstances, at the first term. In other words, the statute and the consent of the parties advanced the trial, with all its incidents, from the second to the first term. It was therefore incumbent on the plaintiff, Annie K. Latimer, in the trial of the original case, to diligently attend it at the first term, by herself or counsel, and to meet every emergency which might grow out of the case. It is too late, after the trial, to complain that she has not been heard. "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the same parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which under the rules of law might have been put in issue, in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered." Civ. Code 1895, § 3742. This principle is fundamental, and without it there would be no limit to litigation. Even a third party, "who had full knowledge of the pendency of a case in which he had a direct pecuniary interest, and neither sought to become a party thereto nor made any effort to intervene therein, so as to protect his rights, cannot, after the rendition of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in such suit, maintain an equitable petition to set such judgment aside." Fitzgerald v. Bowen, 114 Ga. 691, 40 S. E. 735.

Having brought her creditors into court, and prayed that their claims should, by the decree of the court, be charged upon her separate share of the property partitioned, it would seem that the appropriate and proper time for Mrs. Latimer to attack these claims on any ground had then arrived. For these reasons, we think she is concluded by the decree rendered on the original bill. Whatever may be the fact as to her complaint that by these debts she assumed liabilities of her husband, and that the proceeds were used to compound a felony, she has passed the time when she could set up these matters in court, and cannot go behind the decree rendered, unless it appears that the court transcended its powers in rendering the decree. Glover v. Moore, 60 Ga. 189; Mashburn v. Gouge, 61 Ga. 512; Lewis v. Gunn, 63 Ga. 542; Jones v. Harrell, 110 Ga. 373, 35 S. E. 690. This court has held many times that a judgment is final, unless it can be shown that the party complaining of it had "a good defense, of which he was entirely ignorant, or unless he was prevented from availing himself of his defense by fraud, or accident, or the act of the adverse party, unmixed with negligence or fault on his part." (The italics are by Judge Nisbet.) Bellamy v. Woodson, 4 Ga. 181, 48 Am. Dec. 221; Bostwick v. Perkins, 1 Ga. 136; Stroup v. Sullivan, 2 Ga. 279, 46 Am. Dec. 389; Kenan v. Camp, 40 Ga. 698; Wingfield v.

Pittman*, 113 Ga. 166, 38 S. E. 315. And see, also, Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3984, 3988, 5370; 1 Black on Judg. § 330. In Lewis v. Gunn, 63 Ga. 542, this court held that a wife could consent to a judgment as part of a settlement of what she claimed was her husband's debt. For the foregoing array of authorities, as well as other authorities hereinafter cited, we are indebted to the able briefs of counsel for the defendants in error. The list of these authorities could be largely extended.

Furthermore, as to the matter of practice involved in this case, the Code requires that "The judge at each regular term of the superior court shall call all cases on the appearance docket, and hear and decide all objections made to the sufficiency of petitions and pleas, and may by order dismiss plaintiff's petition, or strike defendant's plea, for noncompliance with the requirements of law, unless the defect is cured by amendment." Civ. Code 1895, § 5045. Under the uniform procedure act, this section applies as well to equitable petitions as to other cases. It is also provided in the Code that "pleas and answers may be demurred to, and if new matter is set up by the defendant not controverting the plaintiff's petition, the plaintiff, in proper cases, may be required by the court to meet the same by appropriate written pleadings." Civ. Code 1895, § 5050; Ward v. Frick Co., 95 Ga. 804, 22 S. E. 899. The plaintiff, having failed to take advantage of these statutory remedies, seems to have had her day in court on these questions.

2. But it is insisted that the answers of the defendants to the original bill set up matters not germane, and that the judgments rendered by the court on that bill in favor of the defendants were not authorized by the pleadings. In considering this question, let it be remembered that our Civil Code of 1895 (section 4969) provides that "a petition in the nature of a cross-bill need not be filed in this state," but that the "defendant in every case may set up in his answer any matter which, under the English practice, should be the subject of a cross-bill." Following this reform in the practice in equity cases, it may be regarded as an established rule that matters which were appropriate to a cross-bill under the English practice can now be adopted as regular defenses, and that the complainant is as much bound to take notice of these matters as of any other matters which could be set up in the answer under the former practice. Let it also be remembered that Mrs. Latimer, one of the petioners in the original bill, set out the various debts on which judgments were rendered against her and her property in the decree, and asked that these debts be charged on her separate interest. There being nothing in her description of these debts implying that they were not immediately enforceable, it no doubt seemed to the chancellor who rendered the decree that there was no reason why the court should not do complete equity by providing the process by which these debts could be collected out of the property on which they were charged. Nor was there anything appearing which rendered a general judgment against Mrs. Latimer inappropriate to the case.

This court, in the case of Ray v. Home & Foreign Investment Co., 106 Ga. 496, 32 S. E. 603, after giving the rules which govern the filing of cross-bills, said: "Applying these rules to the present case, we think the court properly refused to dismiss the answer in the nature of a cross-bill on the ground that the matter set up therein was entirely independent of, or not germane to, the case made by the original petition. The petition sought to enjoin the defendants from exercising a power of sale in a deed given to secure the payment of certain notes. The defendant answered, denying the plaintiff's right to an injunction, and by way of cross-bill asked for a general judgment on the notes, and a judgment setting up a special lien on the land. This was not a new and distinct matter, entirely independent of that set out in the original petition. The subject-matter of the petition and the answer in the nature of a cross-bill was one and the same. The issues raised in each involved the same debt, the same deed, the same land, and the same controversy. The petition sought to enjoin the defendant from collecting the debt by pursuing a remedy given in the deed. The effect of the answer was to abandon the remedy sought to be enjoined, and rely upon a remedy to be given by the court into which the defendant had been drawn by the petition of the plaintiff. A mere statement of the case seems to us to be all that is necessary to show that the answer in the nature of a cross-bill 'did not introduce new and distinct matters not embraced in the original suit.'" Under this apt authority, it would seem that, even if Mrs. Latimer had appeared and objected to the cross-prayers in the answer, her objection might very well have been overruled. So far as the record discloses, she made no objection at all to the part of the answer which was in the nature of a cross-bill.

In the case of Crowley v. Crouch, 114 Ga. 137, 39 S. E. 904, this court held: "The ground upon which that part of the judgment of the court excepted to is alleged to be erroneous is that there were no pleadings to authorize the same. There is no merit in this ground. While the petition prayed only for Crouch's removal as trustee, it set out the will of Mrs. Crouch, and undertook to define his rights as to the property in question. His answer denied the construction put upon the will in the petition, and set up what he contended to be his rights in the property under the will, and then, converting his answer into a cross-petition, he prayed that his rights as life tenant should be protected by the judgment of the court. The court, therefore, properly had before it, not only the question of removal or nonremoval of Crouch as trustee, but also that of passing upon the prayer of his cross-petition." This court has also held: "It has long been the law that, where a court of equity obtains jurisdiction for one purpose, it will retain it until complete justice has been done to all parties"—citing Civ. Code 1895, § 3925; Mays v. Shivers, 7 Ga. 238; Martin v. Tidwell, 36 Ga. 332. This quotation is taken from Ray v. Home & Foreign Investment Co., 106 Ga. 497, 32 S. E. 606.

In the case of Carlton v. Insurance Co., 72 Ga. 393, after reciting that certain cross-prayers were made by the defendants relating to the fund in controversy, this court said: "The Code makes an answer in the nature of a cross-bill stand as a cross-bill. * * * So that the demurrer was not properly sustained on the ground that it [the answer] is not germane. Nor do we think that the ground is aided by stating that the cause arose for relief after the original bill was filed. It arose by the bill, and is germane to it; nay, it existed before. Knowledge may have come to defendants since the bill was filed. But for the allegations of the bill, it may not have been known or a suit been instituted; but if the bill uncovers facts transpiring before it was brought, and discovers equitable rights to the defendants, why should they not ask relief arising from those facts? Must they bring a separate suit in such a case? Equity does nothing by halves, but gives complete relief. He who seeks it must do it. Code 1882, §§ 3064, 3065; Walker v. Morris, 14 Ga. 323; Martin v. Tidwell, 36 Ga. 332. And he must do it, we think those cases rule, in the very case in which he himself seeks it, if the relief sought by the defendants be akin to the subject in regard to which he seeks relief for himself."

We therefore think that the case made by the original equitable petition filed by Mrs. Latimer and her coplaintiffs, and the case made by the answers thereto, were akin, were germane to each other, and that the chancellor who rendered the decree in that case might well have held that an objection to the cross-equity set up by the answers could not be sustained. Can it be assumed that the court, when asked to charge a debt upon specific property, by a debtor who in his petition sets out the debt and discloses no reason why it should not be paid, nor asserts that it is not due, would refuse, on the prayer of the creditor, also to decree a payment of the debt? Would the court by one proceeding charge the debt on the property, and then hold that a subsequent proceeding would be necessary to obtain a judgment on the debt, under the circumstances stated? We think not.

3. In the present bill, assailing the decree rendered in the former case, it is complained that the debts set out in the original bill were not in fact due until nearly a month after the decree was rendered; and it is to be assumed that if the chancellor had been informed, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the debts of the plaintiffs to the defendants were not due at the hearing of the partition proceedings, he would, in the exercise of his equitable powers, have given such a direction in the decree as would protect Mrs. Latimer against a premature enforcement of the judgments. Recurring to the question (which we have already considered) as to its being the duty of Mrs. Latimer to attend during the progress of her case and watch all of its incidents and emergencies, is it not true that she is herself at fault in not having disclosed in her original petition the fact that these debts had not matured, if she wished to insist that the judgments prayed for by the defendants should not be rendered because the debts were not yet due? Might not the court have assumed that she had no defense to the cross-prayers set forth in the answers of the defendants? Certainly, if she had any objections to urge against the granting of these prayers, she was guilty of negligence in not making known such objections before the court rendered its decree.

Our attention has been called to two cases (Sanner v. Sayne, 78 Ga. 467, 3 S. E. 651, and Dye v. Garrett, 78 Ga. 471, 3 S. E. 692) in which judgments rendered by the court without a jury were arrested, because it appeared that suit had been instituted upon a series of notes, one only of which appeared on its face to be due. But in each of those cases the plaintiff relied for a recovery upon a special contract, alleged to have been made at the time the notes were given, to the effect that, if default should be made in the payment of any one of the notes, all other notes of the series remaining outstanding should at once become due; and this court merely held that, as the suits were not based upon an unconditional contract in writing, the judge of the trial court was without jurisdiction to render judgment without the intervention of a jury on such of the notes as had not on their face reached maturity. In other words, it was held that the judge had no power, under the Constitution of this state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5848), to render a judgment in a case of that nature without the verdict of a jury, notwithstanding there may not have been filed any issuable defense under oath or affirmation. In neither of these cases was there any consent by the parties that the judge should hear and determine the issues involved without the intervention of a jury. In view of all these considerations, we do not think that the court below could, on this ground alone, reopen the decree in the partition proceedings. The debts are now due.

4. What has been heretofore said is a sufficient reply to the complaint that the pleadings in the original case were not sufficient to support the judgments rendered in favor of the defendants. Mrs. Latimer and her coplaintiffs were responsible for the filing of the equitable petition in that case. The defendants, by their answers, admitted all the facts set forth in the petition. Where a petition recites the rights of the defendants thereto, we know of no rule of practice which requires their answers to be fuller than the case which the plaintiff makes, except as to cross-prayers for the relief to which they are entitled. The creditors of Mrs. Latimer, who were made parties defendant to her equitable petition, confessed the case she stated, and based their prayers upon that case. The administrators of the estates in which she claimed an interest, who were also made parties defendant, likewise admitted the right of Mrs. Latimer and her coplaintiffs to the relief sought by them, and set forth, by way of an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, only such rights as they, in their capacity as the legal representatives of the estate, could justly assert against the plaintiffs.

It was also complained, on the argument before us, that the judgments rendered by the chancellor in the decree on the original bill and answers aggregated in amount $813.50 in excess of all obligations signed by Mrs. Latimer. If we understand this complaint, it grows out of the fact that the defendant administrators, who were called on by the plaintiff's petition to render an account of their administration, asked a judgment against Mrs. Latimer for her proportion of certain advances made by them in excess of the receipts realized by them in managing the estates which they represented. In the answer filed by these administrators, they specially prayed judgment against the plaintiff for these advances; and, this being so, we think it was entirely proper for the chancellor, when the accounting prayed for by the plaintiff was taken, to allow the administrators to assert their claim against the estates for the amount expended by them in excess of their receipts, and to make this claim a charge against the lands sought to be partitioned. Certainly this prayer and allowance were germane to the case made by the plaintiff's petition.

5. On the argument before this court, counsel for the plaintiff in error also directed our attention to the fact that the answers made by the defendants in the original case had not been marked "Filed." All that seems to be required of a defendant, under the statute regulating the practice in such cases, is that he shall appear at the return term of the cause and make his defenses in writing, signed by himself or by counsel. Civ. Code 1895, § 5052. Whether the clerk of the court did or did not make an entry of filing on the answers of the defendants to the petition to which Mrs. Latimer was a party plaintiff is a matter which cannot affect the validity of the decree rendered in that proceeding, if these answers were actually before the court and in its custody at the time the decree was made. These answers were not only in court, but were considered by the judge who rendered the decree, as appears from the decree itself.

6. While inadvertent errors in a decree may be corrected, the general rule is that a bill of review will not lie against a consent decree. Hargraves v. Lewis, 7 Ga. 119; Cunningham v. Schley, 68 Ga. 105, 113. The reasons for this rule are pithily stated in law Latin: "Consensus tollit errorem. Volenti non fit injuria."

7. And there is no specification of any fraud in the procurement of the decree.

ROUNTREE v. RENTZ, Mayor.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—ISSUANCE—INJUNCTION.

1. After a judgment validating an issue of municipal bonds, rendered in accordance with the terms of the act approved December 6, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82; Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6074 et seq.), an injunction will not lie to restrain the sale of the bonds on the ground that the notice of the election to authorize their issuance was not published the number of times required by the statute.

L. H. Rountree against George Rentz, mayor, to restrain the sale of bonds. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Herrington & Lee, for plaintiff in error.
F. H. Saffold, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The bill of exceptions complains of the denial of a petition for injunction to restrain the sale by the city of Swainsboro of bonds issued for the purpose of defraying the expense of building a schoolhouse. The case was tried in the court below on an agreed statement of facts, which was as follows: "On October 7, 1901, the mayor and council of the city of Swainsboro enacted an ordinance providing for an election to be held on November 7, 1901, authorizing the issuance of $12,000 bonds to build and equip a schoolhouse for Swainsboro. The election was held in pursuance of the ordinance, and resulted in a vote of 83 for bonds and 10 against bonds; more than two-thirds of the qualified voters of said city having voted for bonds. Within the time prescribed by law, the mayor and council of the city of Swainsboro notified B. T. Rawlings, solicitor general of the Middle Circuit (which judicial circuit embraces Swainsboro) of the result of said election, and said solicitor general, in terms of the statute, filed a proceeding to validate said bonds, complying in every particular with said statute; and on December 23, 1901, his honor B. D. Evans, judge of the superior courts of the Middle Circuit, passed an order validating said bonds—said order specifically set out in the answer." On hearing the petition for injunction, the plaintiff offered to prove that the advertisement of the notice of election was inserted in the newspaper only twice, instead of once a week for four weeks, as provided by the statute. "The defendant admitted the truth of the evidence offered, but objected to the admissibility of the same, on the ground that plaintiff could not go behind the judgment of validation." With this view the court concurred, and held that the judgment of validation "is res adjudicata of the question raised, and is conclusive as to all matters involved."

From the foregoing it will be seen that the sole question for our determination is as to the conclusiveness upon the taxpayer of a judgment, rendered in accordance with the provisions of the act approved December 6, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82; Van Epps, Code Supp. § 6074 et seq.), validating county or municipal bonds. In our opinion, this question is absolutely settled by the decision of this court in the case of Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 280, 43 S. E. 803, where it was said. "The act of 1897 . . . provides a method of ascertaining, before the bonds are issued and the debt incurred, whether the municipality or county can lawfully incur a debt of the amount sought to be incurred, and for the purpose for which it is to be incurred, and whether the assent of the qualified voters has been obtained in the manner required by law. A judgment of the superior court validating an issue of bonds concludes the municipality, its citizens, and every one else, on all the questions above referred to, as well as on all other questions which the Constitution and laws require to be determined before authority is granted to a municipality to incur a debt. One who holds a bond stamped as validated in compliance with the provisions of the act of 1897 has a right to presume not only that the municipality had authority to incur the debt for the purpose for which the bond was issued, but also for the amount represented by the bonds issued, as well as that the consent of the qualified voters had been obtained to the issue in the manner prescribed by law." In the present case it was agreed that all the proceedings leading up to the judgment of validation were regular, and that the law in regard thereto was complied with in every respect. It follows, therefore, that no taxpayer can go behind that judgment and obtain an injunction against the issuance and sale of the bonds on the ground that the notice of the election to authorize the bonds was not published as required by law. If that question could be raised now, it could just as well be raised 20 years after the issuance of the bonds, and when they became due. To allow this to be done would be absolutely to set at naught the statute under which the validation proceedings were had. The evident purpose of the statute was to set at rest, once and for all, by the medium of a judicial determination before the bonds are issued, all question as to the regularity and legality of the proceedings had prior to the rendition of that judgment. The advantage thus gained in securing for municipal and county bonds a ready sale at favorable prices is obvious, and that the act of 1897 was passed for the special purpose of facilitating the sale of such bonds when issued can scarcely be doubted. The wisdom of a policy which has a tendency to encourage small and struggling municipalities to rush blindly into debt in order to erect expensive public buildings and to secure metropolitan comforts and conveniences is open to grave question, but that is not germane to the present discussion. Swainsboro wants a fine schoolhouse, and has voted an issue of bonds for the purpose of satisfying that want. The General Assembly has provided a method by which the legality of the bonds and the regularity of the proceedings by which their issuance was authorized may be, by a solemn judgment, forever settled. This method, it is agreed, has been pursued in the present case in terms of the law; and the plaintiff cannot now call in question the validity of the election by reason of the alleged failure to advertise it in the manner required by the statute.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PALMER BRICK CO. v. CHENALL.

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—RES IPSA LOQUITUR—QUESTION FOR JURY—ACTION—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

1. The maxim res ipsa loquitur is applicable, under certain circumstances, in suits by a servant against his master for damages resulting from the latter's negligence. Simmons, O. J., dissenting.

2. The maxim is however, rarely applicable in such cases, and only where the manner of the occurrence producing the injury or the attendant circumstances are such that the jury could reasonably infer that the occurrence could not have taken place unless the master was lacking in diligence as to instrumentalities, place of work, or fellow servants.

3. Whether such an inference shall be drawn is a question exclusively within the province of the jury, who are to determine whether the circumstances are such as to authorize the inference; and the circumstances must show that the occurrence was of such an unusual and extraordinary character that an inference of negligence would arise, which would overcome the presumption of law in favor of the master that he had furnished proper instrumentalities, a safe place to work, and competent fellow servants.

4. In any case the inference is slight, and especially is this true where the suit is by a servant against his master; and the jury should disregard the inference in every case where there is the slightest evidence which would either adequately explain the happening of the occurrence upon some other theory than the negligence claimed, or which would satisfy the minds of the jury that the master was not negligent, notwithstanding the explanation of the master does not sufficiently account for the occurrence itself.

5. A petition claiming damages for negligence, which contains only general allegations of negligence, will be dismissed on special demurrer unless so amended as to set forth one or more specific acts of negligence.

6. It follows from the foregoing that when a petition sets forth general allegations of negligence, which are followed by an averment of a specific act of negligence, there can be no recovery by the plaintiff, unless the specific act of negligence is established to the satisfaction of the jury.

7. In a suit of the character above indicated, evidence of the circumstances attending the transaction which resulted in the injury, and constituting the res gestæ of the occurrence, may be properly admitted, although such evidence may show other acts of negligence on the part of the defendant than the one alleged. But such evidence will not authorize a recovery unless the specific act of negligence alleged is established to the satisfaction of the jury.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Saint Chenall against the Palmer Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and both parties bring error. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, for the Palmer Brick Co. Burton Smith and George Gordon, for Saint Chenall.

COBB, J. This is the second appearance of this case. See Chenall v. Palmer Brick Company, 117 Ga. 106, 43 S. E. 443. At the last trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict, and now the defendant complains that the court erred in refusing to grant it a new trial.

1-4. When the case was here before, there was a distinct ruling to the effect that the maxim res ipsa loquitur would be applicable in an action by a servant against a master. While we are aware that this is a proposition upon which the courts are not by any means agreed, and the older rulings are generally to the contrary, still there are many decisions by American courts holding that, under given circumstances, this maxim is applicable in cases of the character referred to; and the trend of American authority seems to be now in that direction, even if the current is not already that way. See 2 Labatt's Master & Servant, § 834, and citations in note 8. While the maxim is applied with great caution in any class of cases, greater caution must be exercised in determining its application in a suit by a servant against a master, on account of the burden resting upon the servant, as well as the presumptions which exist in favor of the master. A servant who sues his master for damages on account of alleged negligence takes upon himself the burden of showing not only due care on his own part, but also that the master was negligent. Except in a case where the master sued is a railroad company, the servant cannot, under any circumstances, call to his aid any presumption of law which will have the effect to relieve him from establishing the existence of negligence by proof of facts requisite for that purpose. On the other hand, the master has in his favor two presumptions of law: First, that he has discharged his full duty to his servant in regard to instrumentalities, place of work, and fellow servants; and, second, that the servant has assumed all of the usual and ordinary hazards of the business. Before the servant can recover, he must overcome, by proof of the facts necessary for that purpose, these two presumptions that the law raises in favor of the master. The servant is required to prove negligence, but he may carry this burden of proof which the law imposes upon him like any other litigant, and may satisfy the requirements of the law either by direct or circumstantial proof. If he can, by the proof of a series of circumstances, establish that he has exercised due care and that the master was negligent, he may rely upon the circumstances for a recovery, even in the absence of any direct proof on the subject of his own conduct, or that of his master. The maxim res ipsa loquitur is simply a rule of evidence.

The general rule is that negligence is never presumed from the mere fact of injury, yet the manner of the occurrence of the injury complained of, or the attendant circumstances, may sometimes well warrant an inference of negligence. It is sometimes said that it warrants a presumption of negligence, but the presumption referred to is not one of law, but of fact. It is, however, more correct and less confusing to refer to it as an inference, rather than a presumption, and not an inference which the law draws from the fact, but an inference which the jury are authorized to draw, and not an inference which the jury are compelled to draw. In the trial of an action by a servant against a master, where it has been shown that the servant was in the exercise of due care, and the manner of the injury or the attendant circumstances are such that injury could not have resulted unless the master had not been negligent in some respect in which the law required him to be diligent for the servant's safety, then the jury might be authorized to infer that the master had been negligent in respect of the matter which was the basis of the suit, and would be authorized to base a finding upon such an inference, in the absence of an explanation which would be satisfactory to them; and it is not necessary that this explanation should satisfy them as to the cause of the injury, but an explanation which satisfies them simply that the master has exercised all the diligence which the law requires of him would be sufficient to rebut the inference of negligence resulting from the happening of the occurrence, although the cause thereof might still be involved in an unsolvable mystery. Under our system, where every question of negligence is left for determination by the jury, even in cases where the maxim under consideration is applicable, the judge should not charge the jury that there would be an inference of negligence from a given state of facts, but should instruct them, in clear and unequivocal terms, that negligence must be proven, and it is for them to consider whether the manner of the occurrence and the attending circumstances are of such a character that they would, in their judgment and discretion, be authorized to draw an inference that the occurrence could not have taken place if due diligence on the part of the master had been exercised. And they should also be instructed that, while they are not required by the law to draw any inference of negligence from the matter, still it is within their province to determine whether the circumstances are such that such an inference might be properly drawn. If, in a given case, the jury see proper to draw an inference of negligence from the manner of the occurrence or the attendant circumstances, the drawing of this inference is not necessarily to result in a finding in favor of the plaintiff. It imposes upon the jury the duty of making further inquiry as to whether this inference has been overcome by a satisfactory explanation. If the jury have drawn the inference of negligence, and there is evidence which satisfies their minds, notwithstanding such inference of negligence, that the occurrence was really brought about by the negligence of a fellow servant, the inference is overcome, and the jury should find in favor of the defendant. So, if there is evidence that the master has fully discharged the duty which the law requires of him in reference to his servant, although he has not satisfactorily accounted for the occurrence, the inference should go for naught, and the finding should be in favor of the defendant. The application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur does not change one iota of the law of master and servant, but simply affords in some rare cases a means of proof to which the servant may resort to carry the burden which the law imposes upon him in a case where he sues his master for negligence. In these cases, which are of rare occurrence—for the maxim only applies in cases which do not ordinarily and usually happen—the maxim affords to the servant an opportunity to claim at the hands of the jury an inference drawn from facts which he may rely upon as proof of that which the law requires him to prove. The inference is only prima facie, is generally slight, and is easily overcome. The inference should be drawn by the jury only in extreme cases, and should be disregarded by them in every case where it reasonably appears that the evidence that the master has not been guilty of negligence as to instrumentalities, place of work, or fellow servants. The inference goes the moment it appears that a defect in machinery complained of is a latent defect that the master could not have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. In cases like the Nelms Case, 83 Ga. 70, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308; the Railey Case, 112 Ga. 288, 37 S. E. 360; the Baxley Case, 114 Ga. 720, 40 S. E. 730; the Stewart Case, 115 Ga. 624, 41 S. E. 981; the Portner Case, 116 Ga. 171, 42 S. E. 408; and the Reynolds Case, 117 Ga. 47, 43 S. E. 456—which were cases in which the defect was latent, and the master could not have discovered it by the exercise of ordinary care, or the defect was patent, and the servant had equal means with the master of ascertaining the same, the maxim res ipsa loquitur could have no application. In the case of Keith v. Iron Company, 81 Ga. 49, 7 S. E. 166, 12 Am. St. Rep. 296, which involved the falling of an arch, the maxim res ipsa loquitur might or might not have been applicable, according to the circumstances existing at the time of the fall; but, even if applicable, it would not in that case have availed the plaintiff, for the reason that, if the inference of negligence arose, it was immediately removed when the fact appeared that the plaintiff was injured as the result of the negligence of a fellow servant.

5-7. A petition claiming damages for negligence, which contains merely general allegations of negligence, is subject to special demurrer, and, upon the hearing of such a demurrer, should be dismissed, unless so amended as to set out one or more specific acts of negligence. Russell v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 705, 46 S. E. 858. It would follow from this that if a petition sets forth general allegations of negligence, followed by allegations setting forth specific acts of negligence, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the jury that the defendant has been negligent in one or more of the particulars alleged. What would be the right of the plaintiff if the defendant should see proper to go to trial upon a petition which contained mere general allegations of negligence, with no specific act of negligence set forth therein, is not material to the present discussion. Without reference to that question, it is certain that, if the plaintiff alleges a specific act of negligence, no recovery can be had, unless this act of negligence is established, without reference to other averments of negligence in the petition which are general in their nature. Georgia R. Co. v. Oaks, 52 Ga. 410 (5); Central R. Co. v. Nash, 81 Ga. 581, 7 S. E. 808 (2); Central R. Co. v. Hubbard, 86 Ga. 624, 12 S. E. 1020 (4). While all the circumstances of the transaction under investigation which constitute the res gestæ of the occurrence are admissible in evidence, and in this way evidence of acts of negligence not alleged may be received for consideration by the jury, still this is solely for the purpose of determining whether the specific acts of negligence alleged in the petition have been established. No matter how much evidence there may be of acts of negligence admitted under the operation of this rule, there can be no lawful recovery unless one or more of the specific acts of negligence set forth in the petition have been established to the satisfaction of the jury. The other acts of negligence admitted as a part of the res gestæ of the transaction may be looked to, to throw light on the question as to whether the specific acts of negligence relied on have been established; but, no matter how well established such other acts may be, the jury are not authorized to find in favor of the plaintiff unless at least one of the specific acts alleged has been proved to their satisfaction. Atlanta St. R. Co. v. Walker, 93 Ga. 462, 21 S. E. 48.

In the present case the petition alleged that the plaintiff was under the direction of one Montgomery, a boss in the employment of the defendant, "who ordered him to assist in the repair of a brick kiln." He "was directed to go inside of the kiln, which was undergoing repairs, to get certain bricks which were therein, and carry them to the masons who were at work on the outside of the said kiln." While at work within the kiln, the top of the same fell upon plaintiff, injuring him. The paragraphs of the petition which allege negligence on the part of the defendant are as follows:

"(10) Defendant was negligent in this: that it furnished an unsafe place in which plaintiff was required to labor.

"(11) The kiln which fell upon the plaintiff was constructed in a careless and negligent and unworkmanlike manner, and was unsafe and likely to fall at any time, and all this defendant well knew or should have known.

"(12) Defendant was negligent in this: that it maintained said kiln in an unsafe and dangerous condition, knowing it to be so, and in that it required plaintiff to work in such an unsafe and dangerous place.

"(13) The supports upon which the top or arch of the kiln had been built had been removed too soon, and time had not been allowed for the work to 'set,' and this too early removal of said supports caused the said arch to settle, crack, and fall."

Paragraph 10 is simply a general allegation that the defendant was negligent in furnishing the plaintiff with an unsafe place to work. Paragraphs 11 and 12 contain no specific allegation of negligence, but are simply general averments to the effect that the unsafety of the place was the result of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, both in the construction and maintenance. In none of the three paragraphs mentioned is there a specific act of negligence alleged either as to construction or maintenance. If the petition had contained no other allegations than these, it would have been subject to special demurrer, and would have been dismissed, unless some specific act of negligence had been alleged, relating either to the construction or maintenance of the place at which the plaintiff was put to work. The only specific act of negligence alleged in the petition is in paragraph 13, which is that the supports upon which the top or arch of the kiln had been built were removed too soon, and as a result of this removal the arch fell. While, under the rule above referred to, all evidence relating to the circumstances under which the arch fell would be admissible, and in this way other acts of negligence might be brought before the jury, still none of this evidence would authorize a finding in favor of the plaintiff, unless it appeared that the arch fell as a result of the supports having been removed too soon. Upon this specific act of negligence the plaintiff has seen fit to plant his case, and he cannot complain if the defendant insists that the case shall be determined solely upon the issue which he has tendered. If the jury should determine that the circumstances under which the arch fell were of such an unusual nature that they would be authorized to infer that the falling was due to negligence on the part of the master, such inference would establish only prima facie that the defendant was negligent in the manner specifically alleged in the petition; and if it appeared from the evidence that the falling of the arch was not due to the specific act of negligence alleged in the petition, but to something else, whether negligence or not, the inference of negligence arising from the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur would be unavailing to the plaintiff as the basis of a recovery. The application of the maxim in cases where it may be applied will result in an inference of negligence, upon which a recovery may be based, but this inference is simply that the defendant is negligent in the respect alleged. The inference takes the place of direct proof, and as direct proof, as a basis of recovery, would be limited to the specific act of negligence alleged, so the inference, under the operation of the maxim, would be in like manner limited; and, the moment that the jury are satisfied that the defendant is not negligent in the respect alleged, the inference of negligence resulting from the circumstances of the occurrence can no longer be looked to as the basis of a recovery.

As some of the rulings of the trial judge were not in entire accord with the views above presented, the judgment must be reversed. As some of the assignments of error are of such a character as to require a reversal on other grounds than that the evidence was not sufficient to withstand a nonsuit, we do not now express any opinion as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the evidence appearing in the present record. On the evidence as presented in the former record, it was held that the jury were authorized to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. It is contended that the evidence in the present record is materially different from what it was before. This may be true, but we cannot know that on another trial the evidence will be the same as it is in this record; and the case is therefore remanded, to be disposed of on another trial in accordance with the law as applicable to the facts as they then appear.

In the cross-bill of exceptions, complaint is made of certain instructions of the judge to the jury. As there is no special assignment of error upon any of these instructions, it is necessary to determine only whether they contain sound abstract propositions of law. Apparently they do, and we will not inquire whether they are adapted to the facts of the case.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; cross-bill affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

SIMMONS, O. J. I concur in the judgment, but dissent as to the proposition stated in the first headnote.

BANKS et al. v. McCANDLESS et al.

EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—CONVEYANCE OF TITLE.

1. While admissions by one in possession are not good as against a bona fide purchaser for value from him, yet so long as a debtor remains in possession of property which once belonged to him, and which his creditor is seeking to condemn as fraudulently conveyed, the res gestæ of the fraud, if any, may be considered as in progress, and his declarations, though made after he has parted with the formal paper title, may, by reason of the continuous possession which accompanied them, be given in evidence for the creditor against the claimant.

2. A plaintiff in a trover case is within the protection of the statute against fraudulent conveyances, even before judgment; and a surety on the defendant's bail bond in the trover case, who pays the judgment recovered by the plaintiff, is entitled to the same protection.

(a) The rights of creditors should be favored by the courts, and every remedy and facility afforded them to detect, defeat, and annul any effort to defraud them of their just rights.

3. It is not apparent to this court that the jury found contrary to the charge of the court, as contended by the plaintiff in error.

4. Under the evidence and pleadings, the charge of the court as to whether "John L. Conley rid himself of his property for the purpose of becoming indebted" to the defendants in error, "or of creating the liability and preventing its collection," was not error.

5. The court below did not err in refusing a nonsuit, or in refusing to direct a verdict for the plaintiff in error; nor can the reviewing court say that the verdict rendered was contrary to the evidence or contrary to law, as averred in the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by E. S. McCandless, administrator, and others, against James Banks, administrator, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Westmoreland Bros., for appellants. Arnold & Arnold, Burton Smith, and L. Z. Rosser, for appellees.

TURNER, J. John L. Conley was the administrator of the estate of Jonathan Broad, deceased, and became indebted to that estate in a large sum by reason of his appropriation of its assets, and was removed from his trust. McCandless became the administrator de bonis non of the same estate. An action of trover was brought against Conley by Marcellus E. Thornton for certain personal property, in which action bail was required, and A. E. Buck and another became sureties for Conley on the bond given by him in that suit. A judgment was rendered in that action against Conley and his sureties, and an execution issuing under that judgment was paid off by Buck and his co-surety. The co-surety having been reimbursed, Buck became the assignee of the execution by virtue of his payment of the balance due upon it, and in this way became the creditor of Conley. John L. Conley having died, James Banks was appointed administrator of his estate. Against Banks, as such administrator, McCandless, as administrator de bonis non of the Broad estate, and Buck filed an equitable petition to subject to their claims certain lands to which Morris J. Conley, who was also made a party defendant, asserted title. The contention of the plaintiffs was that these lands had belonged to John L. Conley at the time of his death, and that Morris J. Conley, his brother, had acquired them in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme designed to defeat the rights of creditors. The prayer of the petition was that the conveyances made to Morris J. Conley be declared null and void as to the plaintiffs, and that the property be subjected to the payment of their demands, etc. Pending this litigation, Buck died, and his executrix, Mrs. Buck, was made a party plaintiff in his stead. On the trial of the case now under review, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the deeds to the lands in controversy were null and void. The defendant Morris J. Conley moved for a new trial on various grounds, which the court below declined to grant, on condition that the plaintiffs would write off from the recovery some 25 acres of the lands covered by the verdict. This condition was complied with by the plaintiffs, whereupon Morris J. Conley excepted to the refusal to grant him a new trial, and brought the case to this court.

1. It is sufficiently obvious that the contest in this case involves the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, now embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2695. It is familiar law that "the rights of creditors should be favored by the courts, and every remedy and facility afforded them to detect, defeat, and annul any effort to defraud them of their just rights." Civ. Code 1895, § 2678. This court has said that "the true law, everywhere and at all times, delighteth in the payment of just debts." Robert v. Tift, 60 Ga. 571. The court below, in endeavoring to administer these legal principles, admitted the testimony of two witnesses that John L. Conley, after the date on which the deeds alleged to have been fraudulently made purport to have been executed, and while in possession of the lands covered by these deeds, made certain declarations to the effect that he was the owner of the lands. The motion for a new trial complains of the admission of this evidence, and it is urged that proof of these declarations was not competent. One of the vital issues in the case was whether John L. Conley had actually conveyed the lands to his brother, Morris J. Conley, at the time the deeds bear date. One of them, covering the major portion of the lands described in the verdict, recited a consideration of only $10, and, though purporting to have been executed in 1883, was not recorded until 1890. It was insisted by the plaintiffs that there were various other indications of fraud in connection with the execution of this conveyance which supported their contention that at the time John L. Conley made the declarations above referred to he was holding possession in his own right, and had not, in fact, made any deed to Morris J. Conley to the lands in controversy. In view of this contention, and of the evidence offered by the plaintiffs in support of it, we think the declarations of John L. Conley were admissible for the purpose of showing the capacity in which he held possession of the lands. The defendant Morris J. Conley claimed that he had become the owner of the land in 1883, and had leased it to Eliza T. Conley, the wife of John L., and that accordingly it was not competent for the plaintiffs to prove his declarations, made long thereafter, as to his ownership of the property. It was therefore a material inquiry whether or not, subsequently to the time the defendant Morris J. Conley claimed to have become the owner, John L. Conley, who remained in possession, held it in his own right or under and through his wife, as the lessee of Morris J. Conley. Was he holding in his own right? The evidence objected to illustrated this question. This court announced a similar conclusion in Ozmore v.

Hood, 53 Ga. 114, which was a claim case, involving the title to a tract of land which was in the possession of the person whose declarations were admitted. This court held that the sayings of the defendant in execution, while in possession, or of any other person in possession of the land, are evidence for the plaintiff in execution to show that the defendant, or such third person, was not the tenant of the claimant. In the case of Oatis v. Brown, 59 Ga. 711 (3), this court held that: "So long as a debtor remains in possession of property which once belonged to him, and which his creditor is seeking to condemn as fraudulently conveyed, the res gestæ of the fraud, if any, may be considered as in progress; and his declarations, though made after he has parted with the formal paper title, may, by reason of the continuous possession which accompanied them, be given in evidence for the creditor against the claimant." And this decision was literally followed in the case of Williams v. Hart, 63 Ga. 201 (4). We accordingly hold that the trial judge did not err in admitting in evidence the declarations of John L. Conley.

2. The inculpated deed from John L. Conley to his brother, Morris J. Conley, bears date July 12, 1883. The bail bond in the trover suit instituted by Thornton was given in June of that year. It is insisted in the motion for a new trial that though a judgment was had in the trover suit at a later date, yet at the date of the deed the plaintiff in the trover case did not stand to Conley as a creditor, under the statute of 13 Elizabeth, and that Buck, who subsequently paid a balance due on the execution issued on that judgment, did not, at the date of the deed just mentioned, occupy the relation of a creditor to John L. Conley, within the meaning of that statute. And it is complained that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: From the "date when the bail bond was given, the principal and sureties were bound to Thornton for the payment of the eventual condemnation money; and when a verdict was rendered finding that John L. Conley had been guilty of a conversion of Thornton's property, and a judgment was taken against John L. Conley and his sureties on the bail bond, and when execution issued upon such judgment, and Buck paid off a balance due on such execution, he was entitled to control such execution as Thornton could have done before it was paid off, for his (Buck's) reimbursement; [and] if, after the giving of such bail bond, John L. Conley made a conveyance or conveyances to his brother, Morris J. Conley, for the purpose of delaying or defrauding Thornton, or the sureties on his bond, as, to any liability on such bond, then Buck would be a creditor, within the meaning of the law, who could attack such deed, and his executrix, standing in his place, would have the same right." By the terms of the famous English statute (13 Eliz. c. 5) "for the avoiding and abolishing of feigned, covenous and fraudulent feoffments, gifts, grants, alienations, conveyances, bonds, suits, judgments and executions, as well of lands and tenements as of goods and chattels, more commonly used and practiced in these days than hath been seen or heard of heretofore; which feoffments," etc., "have been and are devised and contrived of malice, fraud, covin, collusion, or guile, to the end, purpose and intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries and reliefs, not only to the let or hindrance of the due course and execution of law and justice, but also to the overthrow of all true and plain dealing, bargaining, and chevisance between man and man, without the which no commonwealth or civil society can be maintained or continued"—it was "declared, ordained and enacted that all and every feoffment, gift, grant, alienation, bargain, and conveyance of lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, or of any of them, or of any lease, rent, common, or other profit or charge out of the same lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, or any of them, by writing or otherwise, and all and every bond, suit, judgment and execution at any time had or made sithence the beginning of the Queen's Majesty's reign that now is, or at any time hereafter to be had or made to or for any intent or purpose before declared and expressed, shall be from henceforth deemed and taken (only as against that person or persons, his or their heirs, successors, executors, administrators and assigns, and every of them, whose actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries and reliefs, by such gulleful, covinous or fraudulent devices and practices, as is aforesaid, are, shall or might be in anywise disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded) to be clearly and utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect; any pretence, colour, fained consideration, expressing of use, or any other matter or thing to the contrary notwithstanding." See 4 Bac. Abr. 401. Although this statute is strict, and even penal, the courts have long adopted a liberal construction of its provisions. "These statutes," said Lord Mansfield, "cannot receive too liberal a construction, or be too much extended in suppression of fraud." The statute of 13 Elizabeth was meant to prevent deeds "fraudulent in their concoction," declared Lord Ellenborough. As early as Twyne's Case (2 Coke, 219) it was resolved that, "because fraud and deceit abound in these days more than in former times, . . . all statutes made against fraud should be liberally and beneficially expounded to suppress the fraud." See Wait, Fraud. Conv. (3d Ed.) §§ 18-20. The North Carolina Supreme Court, in construing this statute, remarked that its provisions were so plain that "he that runs may read." Savage v. Knight, 92 N. C. 497, 53

Am. Rep. 423. The liberal rule of construction was adopted at an early day in this state by our judges, in a case in which they held that "statutes against fraud, when they operate upon the offense, are to be liberally construed, so as to avoid the fraudulent transaction." Cumming v. Fryer, Dudley's Rep. 183. Our statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 2695) declares that "the following acts by debtors shall be fraudulent in law against creditors and others, and as to them null and void"—followed by an enumeration of the acts. This court, in the case of Westmoreland v. Powell, 59 Ga. 256, held that though the words "and others," following the word "creditors," did not appear in the Code then of force, in that section in which the provisions of the statute of 13 Elizabeth were intended to be embodied the omission did not have the effect of limiting the operation of that statute upon fraudulent conveyances. In view of this decision, the compilers of our present Code deemed it proper to insert in the section just cited the important words which had in the former Codes been omitted. It is also to be noted that this court further said, in discussing that case, that "the statute of 13 Elizabeth, in so far as it embraced tortfeasors in its provisions," was still of force in Georgia; and the court accordingly held that a transfer by Westmoreland of property, made after he had committed an assault upon Powell, and with a view to defeating the collection of damages for such assault, was void. In other words, this court held that a person having a claim for unliquidated damages, because of an injury tortiously committed upon him, was, though not in a technical sense a creditor, nevertheless within the protection of the statute. In our present Code (section 2695) the relation of debtor and creditor is thus defined: "Whenever one person, by contract or by law, is liable and bound to pay to another an amount of money, certain or uncertain, the relation of debtor and creditor exists between them." This definition is much broader than is generally supposed, and would seem to include a liability for a wrongful conversion of property, for which trover would lie. "In a multitude of cases it has been repeatedly adjudicated that a party bound by a contract upon which he may become liable for the payment of money, although his liability be contingent, is a debtor within the meaning of the statute avoiding all grants made to hinder or delay creditors. * * * A surety is a creditor from the time the obligation is entered into, or the bond signed;" and a "person whose claim arises from a tort, such as libel or slander, is a creditor. The date the tort or injury was committed governs in determining the creditor's status, where the conveyance was made in pursuance of a fraudulent design to defeat the judgment which might be recovered upon it. * * * So a transfer to defeat a claim for deceit, * * * breach of promise to marry, seduction, bastardy, and assault and battery, may be annulled. And a wife may attack alienations intended to defeat claims for alimony. In Pendleton v. Hughes [65 Barb. 136], the defendants, at the date of the fraudulent alienation, had in their possession a 5-20 U. S. bond belonging to the plaintiff, which they afterward converted. The court held that plaintiff was equitably entitled to protection against the fraudulent transfer to the same extent as though the defendants had been indebted to her in that amount at the time of the fraudulent alienation." See Wait, Fraud. Conv. (3d Ed.) § 90, and the numerous cases cited in support of the text. Under these authorities it seems clear that Thornton, the plaintiff in the trover suit, was entitled to the protection of the statute; and under these same authorities it would seem that a surety on the bond given by Conley in the trover suit would also, as an original proposition, be entitled to this protection. But be this as it may, by an express provision of our law a surety who has paid the debt of his principal is subrogated, both in law and in equity, to all the rights of the creditor. Civ. Code 1895, § 2986. And it may be added that, without regard to this general rule of subrogation, the executrix of Buck undoubtedly had the right to proceed with the execution against John L. Conley, by virtue of the assignment thereof to Buck, in the same way as the plaintiff in execution, Thornton, could have done. For the reasons above stated, we have reached the conclusion that the charge of the court on this subject was not erroneous.

3. The court charged the jury as follows, with regard to the right of McCandless, as administrator, to attack the conveyances made by Conley: "If Conley became administrator of Broad in 1881, and gave bond as such, no actual indebtedness to the estate arose from such fact alone. Indebtedness to the estate arose upon misappropriation, or devastavit, as it is termed in law, of the assets of the estate by the administrator; and the estate would rank as an actual creditor from the date of such devastavit or misappropriation, and not from the date of the administration or the giving of the bond." It is complained that the verdict of the jury was contrary to this charge. We do not wish to be understood as entirely approving this charge, but, as no question touching its correctness is presented by the record before us, we make no ruling as to whether or not it was altogether sound. Suffice it to say that the jury might well have found, under the evidence submitted for their consideration, that the deed purporting to have been made on July 12, 1883, was not in fact executed until after the devastavit occurred. It cannot, therefore, be said that their verdict was contrary to that charge.

4. Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial that the court committed error in giving the following instruction to the jury:

"If the plaintiffs were not actual creditors at the time of these conveyances, but there was a prospective or possible liability, did or did not John L. Conley rid himself of his property for the purpose of being indebted to them, or of creating the liability and preventing its collection?" The complaint made of this charge is that it had no application to the case on trial. We think that, under the pleadings and the evidence in the case, the jury had a right to reach the conclusion that John L. Conley had stripped himself of all of his property with a view to avoid any liability accruing after, as well as before, the making of the conveyances alleged to have been fraudulent as to creditors.

5. When this case was here before (115 Ga. 48, 41 S. E. 256), this court held that the "judgment of nonsuit as to Banks, administrator, and Morris J. Conley was erroneous." And in no view of the evidence adduced at the last trial can it be said that the court below erred in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant Conley. In the formal grounds of the motion for a new trial, it is insisted that the verdict of the jury was contrary to law, contrary to the evidence, etc. On substantially the same evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs, introduced on the former trial above referred to, this court in effect held that they made out a prima facie case. As to the case being made out to this extent, at least, the plaintiff in error is concluded. It is true that on the last trial he undertook to meet the case of the plaintiffs by counter evidence. Whether or not this was done successfully was a matter peculiarly within the province of the appointed tribunal—the jury. The jury saw the witnesses and observed their tone and manner, and had before them, transpiring in their presence, all the significant incidents of the trial. Some of these matters were incapable of transmission to this court. The jury, therefore, had better facilities for weighing the questions of fact than this court can possibly have. In the exercise of their appropriate functions, they found a verdict for the plaintiffs. We cannot, from merely reading the transcript, come to a different conclusion from that reached by the jury.

This case has been the occasion of many interesting conflicts. It had numerous branches, including trover and bills in equity. It is a well-trodden field. Every part of the ground has been fought over. First there was a demurrer, which was overruled; then there was a trial at which a nonsuit was had; and this court, on exceptions to that judgment, held fast to the judgment on the demurrer, and decided that, rather than a nonsuit, the evidence warranted a verdict. A verdict has now been had by men of the vicinage, upon practically the same evidence for the plaintiffs, and a fair-minded and excellent judge, who presided at the trial, and had heard the evidence also on a former trial, and reviewed it again on this motion for a new trial, has given his approval to the conclusions of the jury. We agree with him. The case is now stratified, and will serve hereafter only to reward the diligence of those who dig deep for legal precedents.

GILLELAND & DILLINGHAM v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

CARRIERS — SHIPMENT OF STOCK — PLEADING — AMENDMENT — HARMLESS ERROR — DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. A declaration sounding in tort, seeking to recover from the defendant, as a common carrier, for the breach of its duty to furnish a suitable car for the transportation of live stock, cannot be amended by setting up as the basis of recovery a special contract between the parties for the equipment of the car.

2. The admission of immaterial evidence will not be held cause for a new trial, unless shown to have been harmful to the complaining party.

3. The undisputed evidence showed that a contract for the shipment of live stock was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant; that one of the plaintiffs, acting for his firm, objected to the car furnished by the defendant, and refused to allow the stock to be shipped in it under the terms of the contract; that the stock were unloaded from this car, but were afterwards reloaded on it, and shipped to their destination; that the plaintiff, who was accompanying the stock, knew, or had opportunity to ascertain, that they were being transported on the car to which he had objected; that while en route with the stock he reaffirmed the contract, claiming and accepting a benefit under it; and that the stock were injured in transit by reason of the omission of precautions which, under the contract, devolved upon the plaintiffs. Held, that there could be no legal recovery, and that it was not error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Culberson, Willingham & Johnson, for plaintiff in error. King, Spalding & Little, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action against a railroad company for damages to a shipment of horses, the negligence alleged being that the defendant "put and shipped said horses in a car which was wholly unfit and defectively equipped for the shipment of horses." The court directed a verdict for the defendant. To this ruling, to the refusal to allow an amendment to the declaration, and to the admission and rejection of certain evidence, the plaintiffs except.

1. The original declaration sounded in tort, and sought to recover on the defendant's common-law liability as a carrier, for failing to provide a suitable car for the transportation of the live stock. The amendment which was rejected set up that "the defendant railroad company made a special charge of two dollars against these plaintiffs for fitting and equipping said car, over and above its regular charge for carrying the horses." The effect of this amendment would have been to change the suit from an action in tort to one for damages for breach of a special contract for the equipment of the car. It was properly refused by the court. Cox v. Richmond R. Co., 87 Ga. 747, 13 S. E. 827.

2. We find no error in the admission of evidence as to the conductor's record concerning the condition of the stock in transit, or as to the rules and regulations of the defendant company. Even if this testimony was not technically relevant, it was not of sufficient materiality to injuriously affect the plaintiffs' rights, and its admission will not be held ground for a new trial. For reasons which will more fully appear in the next division of this opinion, we hold that it was not error to refuse to allow a witness to "testify that there was not the depth and quantity of sawdust bedding in the car that the defendant's witnesses had sworn there was."

3. The horses were shipped from Shelbyville, Ky., to Atlanta, under a special contract of affreightment between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the consideration of which, flowing to the plaintiffs, was the grant of a greatly reduced rate of freight, and free transportation to the shipper between the two points named. This contract recited that "the shipper has examined and found in good order and condition the car or cars provided by said carrier for the transportation of said animals, and hereby accepts the same and agrees that they are, as thus provided, suitable and sufficient for said purpose; and said shipper will at his own expense provide such bedding or other suitable appliances in said car or cars as will enable said animals to stand securely on their feet while in the same." According to the testimony of Dillingham, one of the plaintiffs, who looked after the loading and shipment of the stock in Shelbyville, and who executed the contract on behalf of his firm, the contract was signed by him before he had an opportunity to examine the car in which the stock were to be shipped. When he saw the car he objected to it, and refused to allow the stock to be shipped in it except at the carrier's risk. The agent of the railroad company "said he would try to fix it so they would go through all right," and the horses were turned out of the car, presumably for the purpose of either putting the car in a condition satisfactory to Dillingham, or of loading them on another car. Dillingham saw the stock no more until just before he left Shelbyville, when they were in the same car they had been in before, and that car was in the train on which he was to ride. He had no opportunity then to examine the car. His journey took him first from Shelbyville to Louisville. After leaving Shelbyville he ascertained that there was a mistake in the pass that had been given him to permit of his accompanying the stock. He testified: "When I got down to Louisville I found I didn't have any pass. I then went to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, showed them the contract, told them I had some stock, showed them the pass was not right, and they corrected it and gave me a pass to Nashville." How long he remained in Louisville before continuing his journey to Atlanta does not definitely appear, but the witness swore that from the time he left Shelbyville until he reached Atlanta he had no opportunity to examine the stock or ascertain the condition of the car in which they were loaded. Upon arriving in Atlanta the stock were damaged as set out in the petition, and it was then discovered that the floor of the car was not so prepared as to give the animals a proper foothold.

The court did right to direct a verdict for the defendant, as, under the evidence, there could have been no legal recovery by the plaintiffs. There is no contention that the injuries sustained by the horses were occasioned in any other way than through the failure to have upon the floor of the car bedding or slatting of such a character as to give them a firm foothold and enable them to stand securely; and, by the terms of the contract into which the plaintiffs entered, the equipment of the floor of the car for this purpose was a task which devolved entirely upon them. But it is contended that when Dillingham ordered that the horses be taken out of the car in Shelbyville, and declined to let them be shipped in a car in the condition in which it was, the contract was annulled, and from that moment the common-law relation of carrier and shipper existed between the parties. While it is true, according to Dillingham's testimony, that he refused to agree that the stock should be shipped in the car in which it was at first loaded, except at the railroad's risk, he himself makes it equally clear that before leaving Shelbyville he saw that they had been reloaded in the same car, and that upon arriving in Louisville, far from repudiating the contract, he reaffirmed it by demanding, upon the strength of it, that the mistake in his pass be corrected, and that he be given free transportation to Nashville in accordance with its terms. The contract was reasonable, and was supported by an ample consideration, to wit, the reduction of the rate of freight by one-half. See, in this connection, Central R. Co. v. Glascock, 117 Ga. 938, 48 S. E. 981. Having thus ratified it and accepted a benefit under it, he must stand by its provisions. As before stated, it is not disputed that the injuries sustained by the stock were due to the failure to so prepare the floor of the car as to enable them to stand securely while the train was in motion. That was a duty which, under the contract, devolved upon the plaintiffs, and it follows that they cannot recover from the railroad company for the damage done.

SAUNDERS v. MILLER.

SEDUCTION—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence objected to was irrelevant, but, while the court should not have allowed the question, the answer given by the witness was such as to render its effect harmless to the complaining party.

2. Where a verdict and judgment have been obtained by the plaintiff in an action for damages for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, the defendant is not entitled to a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence by reason of the fact that subsequently to the trial of the civil action he was tried under an indictment charging him with the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter and found guilty of fornication.

3. The evidence was conflicting, but that for the plaintiff, as to seduction, brought the case within the ruling of this court in Cherry v. State, 38 S. E. 341, 112 Ga. 871, and the verdict was warranted.

DADE COAL CO. v. PENITENTIARY CO. NO. 2 et al.

SAME v. PENITENTIARY CO. NO. 3 et al.

CONVICTS—LEASE—APPORTIONMENT—FORFEITURE—RIGHT OF ACTION.

A., B., C., D., and E. were members of a corporation, X., whose sole asset consisted of a lease of convicts for a limited period. The charter of X. named no capital stock, and none is alleged to have been fixed by action of the members. The company itself engaged in no business. By agreement between the corporators, and with the consent of the executive and penitentiary departments, the convicts were distributed in certain proportions between the members, who thereafter severally paid the hire to the state, and were treated by it as lessees in the proportion assigned each. After such partition the camp of A. was abolished by order of the Governor, the convicts then in its possession were taken away, and no further assignment was made to it. The convicts so taken were assigned, not to the corporation, but to B., C., D. and E., the other members of the original corporation, X. Held:

1. Regardless of the rights of others or of the public to complain thereof, such partition, and availing itself of the benefits thereof, estopped

A. from denying that it became a lessee, and as such subject to all the provisions of the act of 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 40).

2. The consent of the state, the company, and each of its incorporators to the segregation of the joint or corporate interest under the lease amounted to a partition which vested A. with title in severalty to its proportion of the former undivided interest in the lease.

3. Such partition vested A. not only with the then present, but with the future, rights under the lease.

4. The action of the Governor in abolishing the camp of A. amounted to a forfeiture of all its rights under the original and sub lease.

5. A. had no cause of action against X., or against B., C., D., and E.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Actions by the Dade Coal Company against Penitentiary Company No. 2 and its stockholders, and against Penitentiary Company No. 3 and its stockholders. Demurrers to both petitions were sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Dade Coal Company brought suit against Penitentiary Company No. 2 and its stockholders, and another suit against Penitentiary Company No. 3 and its stockholders. The allegations in the two cases were in many respects identical, and both, being controlled by the same principle, were argued together. In the suit against Company No. 2 it was alleged that petitioner is a corporation; that defendant is a corporation; that petitioner, the Chattahoochee Brick Company, and W. B. Lowe are the owners of all the capital stock of Company No. 2, petitioner owning 12½ per cent., the brick company 50 per cent., and Lowe 37½ per cent. of said stock; that on June 21, 1876, the Governor entered into a lease with Company No. 2, whereby it was entitled to receive from the state a certain proportion of the convicts sentenced to the penitentiary; that for many years, by agreement among the several stockholders of Company No. 2, and with the consent of the penitentiary department of the state, a division of the convicts awarded under the lease was made between the stockholders in proportion, to their holdings; that on July 23, 1896, petitioner was deprived of the use and control of any of the convicts awarded to Company No. 2 as aforesaid, and those then in its custody were, under the order of the Governor, taken away from it and delivered to Lowe and the brick company, the other stockholders in No. 2; that in 1896, 1897, and 1898 other convicts were assigned to Company No. 2 by the state authorities, and others will be up to April 1, 1899, when the lease expires; that petitioner is the owner of a coal mine, and the labor of the convicts is valuable; that Lowe and the brick company, though receiving the benefit of their labor, have paid nothing to petitioner or to Company No. 2 therefor; that the removal of the convicts did not in any wise affect its rights to the capital stock held by it in Company No. 2, nor deprive it of the right to an accounting; and that since the convicts were taken and delivered to the other stockholders their labor has been valuable to such stockholders. The petition was demurred to on many grounds, and the petitioner thereupon amended by alleging that it has from the beginning been the uniform and fixed policy of the stockholders of Penitentiary Company No. 2 to distribute the convicts assigned to it under the lease among its stockholders in proportion to the stock held by each. This plan or policy has been recognized and approved from the beginning by the state through its executive and penitentiary departments. Convict camps were established by executive order for and on behalf of said several stockholders, and such camps continuously recognized as legal, and each stockholder has from time to time paid to the state a part of the rental due under the lease proportionate to his or its holding. The stockholders being few in number, and the Penitentiary Company being without assets other than the lease aforesaid, and without camps or facilities for working or employing the convicts, the plan or policy of dividing out the convicts among the stockholders as above set out has always been pursued, and each stockholder has always paid directly and individually the expenses, including hire of the convicts, as assigned and employed by him or it. Said Penitentiary Company has never operated as a company, and has never in fact and true intent been a going concern, but each and all of the profits accruing to it, or which would ordinarily have accrued to it, have always, until the time set out in the original petition, been received directly by the stockholders in proportion to their holdings. The brick company and Lowe control Penitentiary Company No. 2, the right of action for the accounting is in the latter company, and it would be vain to seek redress at the hands of the officers and stockholders, whose interests are antagonistic to that of plaintiff. The Dade Company prayed for an accounting, and for a judgment for its proportion of the value of the labor of the convicts. Similar allegations were made in the suit against Company No. 3 and its stockholders; the main differences being that in it the Dade Coal Company claimed to own 81½ per cent. of the stock, having paid $20,000 therefor. Part it bought from C. B. Howard, and the balance it purchased through Joseph E. Brown from W. D. Grant. Said Grant was the owner of stock in Company No. 3, and, with others, gave a bond as required by the act of 1876. On April 23, 1894, said Grant sold said stock to Joseph E. Brown for the Dade Coal Company, and John W. Murphy, James W. English, and T. J. James, who, as a part of the contract of sale, obligated themselves to procure the release of said Grant from the bond given to the state, and, if that could not be done, to save him harmless on account of that bond and the convicts.
